3.6.14 The United Netherlands, or States of Holland, form a glaring example. Every state in the union has an equal voice, and yet is it not evident that Holland is as superior in influence as she is in wealth and extent? This arises from the nature of the thing. Although an equal voice is decreed by the constitution to each state, yet that of Holland has swallowed up the wealth, the power, and even the name.[12] Many more instances might be adduced, but the general system of things teaches us the propriety of admitting each state to an equal representation. It is said, however, that the small states will eagerly adopt the constitution proposed by the Convention. This I am inclined to doubt, but taking it for granted we can easily account for it. Their present situation is so bad, and their importance so inconsiderable, that of two evils they would willingly chuse that which is apparently the least. But let them have time to discuss and consider the matter, and recollect the probable perpetuity of it, and they will not so hastily embrace it. There are many reasons why small states would rather adopt this constitution, than run the risque of having none at all. In the former case, their importance would at least be nominal, in the latter it would dwindle away to nothing. It may be urged that the danger arising from the inequality of representation in the lower house, is sufficiently guarded against by the equality in the senate. Be that as it may, the thing is essentially wrong in itself. There is a mutual dependence between the two houses, and each has its proportion of influence. No circumstance can alter the intrinsic injustice of the thing. The more such inequality takes place, the more direct is the avenue to tyranny.

The other grand defect in the foregoing clause, we shall defer for the present, and treat it in the sequel.

3.6.15 In the third section of the first article it is said, that "the senate of the United States shall be composed of two senators from each state, chosen by the legislature thereof for six years."

Then follows a mode of division amongst them into three classes, of which the first is to resign its place at the expiration of the second year, the second the fourth year, and the third the sixth year. This may in itself be an excellent thing, and well adapted to preserve a proper degree of experiental wisdom in the senate at all times. That class which retains its seat for six years, will in many respects have a superiority.

This being the case, the manner of determining the classes should have been stated; otherwise the jealousy of the states may rouse the animosity of party division to such a pitch as to endanger the springs of government. If a proper mode of dividing were pointed out, the division itself might be of great use.

The fourth section of the first article says, that "the times, places and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time make or alter such regulations except as to the place of chusing senators."* Here the mode of expression seems to be designedly ambiguous. It carries in it, however, a controuling power to be vested in Congress over the states in those matters that do not at all concern the nation at large. The power is limited—"except as to the place of chusing senators"—This I suppose was excepted because the senators are to be chosen by the legislature of each state. Indeed it would be an odd affair to have the legislatures of the several states collected together for the purpose of chusing senators in any place that Congress should appoint. But why is not the same provision made in the case of representatives? They are to be chosen by the people at large in each state—but is it an easier matter to draw the body of the people in any state into one place than their legislative body only? There may be some hidden propriety in this distinction, which it requires political vision very much refined to discern. I could wish to see it clearly pointed out. This refers, however, only to place—but what is meant by the manner of holding elections? If we are to understand by it the mode of electing, to give Congress power to controul it, is infringing upon one of those privileges upon which freedom itself is suspended. The manner of electing is clearly pointed out by the excellent Montesquieu, and he considers it as a fundamental law in every republican state.[14] While the people of the several states, who are

*To give a circumstantial proof of the absurdity of this, we shall mention a [scene] that lately took place. A gentleman who was in company with a member [of] convention, with whom he was acquainted, and who had signed the constitution, was mentioning some of the most common objections to it. Among others was this: the member of convention replied, That there was no such [clause] in it. Did this arise from his ignorance or a consciousness that it was [unjust] and absurd? Justitia sese non condemnat.[13] alone concerned in it, have the free exercise of their will, they will adhere to this law; but to oblige them to resign it to a power whom it very little interests, is almost to oblige them to sell their birth right. A writer upon this subject, who signs himself an American Citizen, considers this matter very strangely; he supposes it to be a guard against the possibility of obstinacy in any state—as in the case of Rhode-Island.[15] This then is designed for a political antidote, in case of refusal in any one state to elect at all. But this is a very absurd supposition—for it is very evident that where there is no election, there can be neither time, place nor manner of holding it. The clause in the constitution takes for granted some election, but his construction supposes none at all.

3.6.17 The eighth section of the first article appears upon consideration to be big with unnecessary danger.

It seems to reduce humanity to too great a test. It bloats Congress with too much power, and leaves them without a guard to prevent the eruptions of human depravity. The very first clause contains every species of power that they could possibly be vested with. In it power is given them "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay debts, and to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." This power may, if exerted in its extent, reduce the several states to poverty and nothing. We would willingly pay a compliment to human nature by supposing the best, if experience did not rise up against us. The wisdom of many nations hath induced them to enlarge voluntarily the powers of their rulers: but we have no instances of such self-denial in governors as hath led them to restrain their own power and abridge their own authority. It was wisdom in this country to appoint a convention for the purpose of enlarging the powers of Congress; but it will be superior wisdom to give them no more power than is sufficient. Our situation taught us the necessity of enlarging the powers of Congress for certain national purposes, where the deficiency was experienced. Had these and these only been added, experience itself would have been an advocate for the measure. But in the proposed constitution there is an extent of power in Congress, of which I fear neither theory nor practice will evince the propriety or advantage. The power of internal taxation given to Congress in the foregoing clause, is a very unjust and improper one. It has been hinted in some publication, that impost will defray all our national expences.[16] This is a proposition perfectly absurd. Will not the support of a standing army, a navy, etc. be a prodigious addition to national expence? To say that this government will not be an additional expence to the country, is an assertion to which common sense would never assent. Let it be remembered, that this constitution, if adopted, will create a vast number of expensive offices. Most of them will be of the national character, and must be supported with a superior degree of dignity and credit; without regarding the enormous expence which Congress may incur if they please. The many places that will and must be created and paid for, will add much to the burden of our debts. In the legislative, executive, and particularly the judiciary department, there will be a multiplicity of officers hitherto unknown, and the salaries annexed to them must be very considerable. Besides, if the states are [to] retain even a shadow of sovreignty, the expence thence arising must also be defrayed. This combination will cause a greater demand than can easily be answered. The gentleman who remarks upon the address of the sixteen members, answers this objection with uncommon sagacity. "The first objection is, (says he) that the government proposed will be too expensive. I answer that, if the appointment of offices are not more, and the compensation or emoluments of office not greater than is necessary, the expence will be by no means burdensome, and this must be left to the prudence of Congress: for I know no way to controul supreme power from extravagancies in this respect."[17]

3.6.18 What does all this amount to, but an oblique confession, that Congress may, if they please, load us with many needless expences?

The taxation of the particular states for their own support will be overruled by Congress, or else it will be obliged to embrace a measure perhaps the most odius in the world, viz. excessive taxation. This would be widely different from the opinion of the ablest politicians. I am persuaded that if this constitution were to be adopted, Congress would be reduced to this alternative, either to oppress the people in the manner just hinted, or commit upon them a violent injury by depriving them of their rights.

3.6.19 Congress will be the judges of what is necessary for the general welfare of the United States, and this will open the door to any extravagant expence which they shall be pleased to incur. For this reason their power should have been accurately defined. Baron Montesquieu (B. 13, C.I) observes that "the real wants of the people ought never to give way to the imaginary wants of the state. Imaginary wants are those which flow from passion, and from the weakness of the governors, from the charms of an extraordinary project, from a distempered desire of vain glory, and from a certain impotency of mind that renders it incapable of withstanding the attacks of fancy. Often times has it happened, that ministers of restless dispositions have imagined that the wants of the state were those of their own little and ignoble souls." That this may happen here, we have a right, and indeed ought to suppose. Any man who carefully attends to that part of the constitution quoted above, must judge that the powers granted by it, are too indefinite. Indeed as it stands there expressed, it includes every other power afterwards mentioned.

3.6.20 We come now to speak of a standing army. By this constitution, the Congress have power to "declare war," as also to "raise and support armies; but no appropriation of money for that purpose shall be for a longer term than two years." We are to suppose that Congress is a representation of the people of the United States at large, if so, the nexus imperii even of the English constitution is lost. There the king has only the power of declaring war, and the house of parliament, that of raising money for the support of it. So that it seems to be wrong to give Congress this combined power independent of a check from a majority of the state legislatures. "No appropriation of money for this purpose shall be for a longer term than two years." This is not very moderate. The space of time is only as long again as that permitted in England, for the same purpose.

3.6.21 But a standing army in time of peace is strongly to be objected to. It always hath been and always will be the grand machine made use of to subvert the liberties of free states. Pisistratus and Caesar are not forgotten. It ought to be laid down as a principle that free states should never keep a standing army for the support of its laws. "They ought (as Brutus says) to depend for their support upon the citizens. And when a government is to receive its support from the aid of the citizens, it ought to be so constructed as to have the confidence, respect and affection of the people. Men who upon the call of the magistrate, offer themselves to execute the laws, are influenced to do it from affection for the government or from fear; when a standing army is at hand to punish offenders, every man is actuated by the latter principle, and therefore, when the magistrate calls, will obey." Fear however is a contracting principle of obedience. "But when this is not the case, the government must rest for its support upon the confidence and respect which the people have for their government and laws."[18] If therefore the government of the United States be just and equal, and the states are to retain their seperate powers, a standing army is useless and dangerous. It will inevitably sow the seeds of corruption and depravity of manners. Indolence will increase, and with it crimes cannot but increase. The springs of honesty will gradually grow lax, and chaste and severe manners be succeeded by those that are dissolute and vicious. Where a standing army is kept up, virtue never thrives. In this particular experience will abundantly testify what the nature of the thing would suggest. Whatever the refinement of modern politics may inculcate, it still is certain that some degree of virtue must exist, or freedom cannot live. Unless Mandervill's position be embraced, "that private vices are public benefits":[19] a standing army will work the destruction of these states. Virtue and simplicity of manners in an extensive country by their innate energy and vigour, create a healthy constitution, and command prosperity to accompany it; but vice like a sickly air, debilitates the nerves of the political body, and withers all its bloom. A standing army will increase vice, and that a disunion of interest and affections. It is this that weakens the force, and destroys the harmony of free states. These evils in process of time will be derived from a standing army, and when we shall have outlived our virtue, every effort to recover it, will be vain and abortive. The propriety and advantage of a standing army can be but poorly vindicated.

My fellow citizens, beware of such pretences, and while this tyrannical monster of depravity exists in the plan, do not adopt it, unless you are willing to entail upon your children the miseries of vice, and leave to posterity the corrupted relics of a shattered government.

3.6.22 The next thing which we proceed to, is the importation of slaves, contained in the ninth section of the first article. It says, that "the migration or importation of such persons as any of the states now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year 1808, but a tax or duty may be imposed upon such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person." ["]The truth is, (says a citizen of America) Congress cannot prohibit the importation of slaves during that period; but the laws against the importation of them into any particular state stand unrepealed. An immediate abolition of slavery would be ruin upon the whites and misery upon the blacks in the southern states. The constitution therefore hath wisely left each state to pursue its own measures with respect to this article of legislation during the period of twenty one years."[20] That the importation of slaves shall not be forbidden till that time may be very wise—but what hath that to do with the abolition of slavery? To prohibit the importation of slaves is not to abolish slavery. For all that is contained in this constitution, this country may remain degraded by this impious custom till the end of time.

3.6.23 The next thing that strikes our attention in a review of the constitution, is the disposition of the judicial powers. The first section of the third article says; that "the judicial powers of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as Congress shall from time to time establish. The judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." This is certainly too indefinitely comprehensive. What inferior courts Congress shall be pleased to establish, is not known, nor can be imagined Montesquieu is of opinion, that where the judicial power is not kept perfectly distinct from the legislative and executive, liberty is endangered.[21] The Centinel quotes a clause from Blackstone, much to the purpose,[22] which says, "that if the power of judging were entirely trusted with the magistrates, or any select body of men, named by executive authority, the[ir] decisions in spite of their own natural integrity would have a bias towards those of their own rank and dignity; for it is not to be expected, that the few will be attentive to the rights of the many.

3.6.24 ["]This therefore preserves in the hands of the people, that power which they ought to have in the administration of justice, and prevents the encroachments of the most powerful and wealthy citizens." If this be true, what may not the judiciary come to under this constitution? It may gradually grow corrupted, till the very power of judging become the readiest tool in the work of tyranny. Drowsy justice may e'er long sit nodding on her rotten bench, and a collective despot smile upon the harpies of ravenous ambition.

Such a despot must indeed have many friends, whose injustice in their way to glory, would readily be connived at.

3.6.25 It is worth our while to enquire how far the proposed constitution will tend to reduce the dignity and importance of the states. The several states are by this constitution, to have a republican government guaranteed to them; but where is the use of such a position, when the powers granted to Congress must inevitably make it void? That the republican form here decreed to each state will indeed be only form, human nature as well as experience will evince. Let us attend to the three first articles in the constitution of Poland. 1. "The crown of Poland shall be forever elective, and all order of succession provided; any person who shall endeavour to break this law, shall be declared an enemy to his country, and liable to be punished accordingly. 2. Foreign candidates to the throne, being the frequent cause of troubles and divisions shall be excluded; and it shall be enacted, that for the future, no person can be chosen king of Poland, and great duke of Lithuania, excepting a native Pole, of noble origin, and possessing land within the kingdom. A son or grandson of a king of Poland, cannot be elected immediately after the death of their father or grandfather; and are not eligible excepting after an interval of two reigns. 3. The government of Poland shall be forever free, independent, and of a republican form."[23] What frenzy to talk of freedom and independence after the two first articles. The height and extent of this freedom and independence, experience has shown and will show.

3.6.26 After a candid examination into the disposition of the legislative, executive and judicial authority of the United States, it will appear that the several states will have very little or no seperate internal policy, but will be all pressed into one compact system of government, of which they will only be parts. The want of responsibility to the people among the representatives in this constitution, would furnish matter for ample discussion, but we pass over it in silence, only observing that it is a grand and indeed a daring fault, and one that sanctions with security the most tyrannic edicts of a despotic voice. Here, my fellow citizens, is a wide avenue to corruption, of which time will evince the danger. "Which circumstance taking place, every species of venality must spread through the land with rapid progress. The contagion will not be confined to the higher classes; it will extend its baneful influence over all ranks and degrees of men.

3.6.27 ["]Thenceforward the security of property will be unhinged, and our most valuable rights will be held upon a precarious tenure.

["]The judges of our property are named by the supreme, and his favour will be confined on those persons who lend their support perhaps to tyrannical measures.

["]Hence the contagion of venal[i]ty will pervade the seats of justice. It will be kept alive by gainful prospects; and every occasion of solicitation in favour of a son or a brother, or any relation or friend, will be a fresh incitement to preserve the venal system in strength and vigor.

["]It will not escape notice, that the determination of our property in the last resort, will, by the power decreed to the supreme, by this constitution, be lodged with persons, whom, if corrupted, no dependence on the people will oblige to be just."[24]

The ministers of justice of all others should not be beyond the reach of the people. 3.6.28

The same thing is true of political as of other machines. The utility of them does not increase with the complication of their parts. But provided the effect be the same, the more simple the better.

The organization of this is evidently so complex that it will require much strength to put it in motion: and great care must be taken in the use of it, that the smaller parts be not broken to pieces.

But I fear that no care can prevent the extinction of independence among the several states. The judicial power proposed to be granted by this constitution, goes far to produce this effect. The powers of the supreme courts and of such inferior courts, as Congress shall be pleased to ordain, are exceedingly comprehensive. It comprises all civil cases, except those which arise between citizens of the same state. That the judicial power of each state will sink into nothing, will easily be seen. Suppose, for instance that Congress be pleased to ordain or establish one of these inferior federal courts in each state. The consequence will be that the others will be nullified. The courts are to be under the sanction of the United States of America, not of a particular state. They must be supported with dignity, and their judges and other necessary officers will have their salaries stated by Congress which will be paid out of the treasury of the United States. In this situation, we can easily foresee that in the common and unavoidable course of things, the courts established by subordinate power supported with less splendor and dignity, will at length dwindle into nothing. 3.6.29

Another circumstance should be attended to: The States will be exceedingly strained to support them. 3.6.30

Most of the ways and means as they are called are entirely shut out from the State governments.

The tenth section of the first article says, "No state shall, without the consent of Congress lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, etc. etc. the net produce of all such imposts and duties laid by any state on imports or exports, shall be for the use of the treasury of the United States, and all such laws shall be subjected to the revision and controul of Congress." What then is to be the mode of raising money for defraying the expences of the state? It is reducing them to the necessity of laying direct taxes, which is egregiously abusive. Most of the states are already groaning under their taxes. Here the very idea of state is entirely done away. But on the other hand, the government of the United States has an enormous power of raising money in every way as well as that of contracting debts at plea- 3.6.31 sure. To give them the power of laying taxes, duties, imposts and exise, by way of providing for the welfare of the United States, and then constitute them judges of what is necessary for these purposes, is giving them power to satisfy at the expence of the states, any whim which ambition or the love of ostentation might suggest to them. But yet every law thus made will be binding; for they have an additional power expressly granted them, "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all the powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof."

3.6.32 This may from the mode of expression be construed into a tyrannical grant to enforce tyranny itself. Have the states in this predicament any kind of consequence or power, or are they not rather reduced to inactive parts of the same grand empire? But the very last clause but one in the constitution proves clearly that the whole country is to be comprised into one large system of lordly government. A tight system indeed. They say that "this constitution and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound by them or any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." Here is at once created a fruitful source of contention and error. What end will there be to the confusion that will arise from the many laws or ordinances of Congress with respect to revenue, viz. taxes, duties, imposts, etc. when those of the seperate states are to be controulled by them? But what judges are to be bound by them in all cases whatever, notwithstanding any laws to the contrary, that may have been promulgated by any particular state? The judges not only of those inferior federal courts which Congress may from time to time establish in any or all the states; but also the judges of the courts immediately dependent on the states themselves. They are to be over-ruled by the laws of Congress in "every state," and the laws of every state must be prejudiced in their favor.

3.6.33 Can any state, or the citizens of any state think themselves secure when they are conscious that their own laws will not avail them in competition with those of Congress? Suppose Congress in making its provision for the general welfare of the United States, and framing those laws which shall be deemed necessary and proper for carrying into execution all their powers, should, in the complex body of them, oppose the general system of state policy, what must be the consequence? It must be laid prostrate in the dust, and yield to the ordinances of Congress, and that according to their own mode of construing them. If this does not open the door to violent oppression, it at least pours upon us a load of inconveniencies. I know it is said that all the powers of Congress must be exercised for the general welfare, and have for their object general concerns only. But what are these general concerns? May they not without difficulty be construed to the prejudice of particular concerns?

Such a construction will certainly follow from the present indefinite mode 3.6.34 of expression in this constitution. There is a writer upon the subject who attempts to explain the intentions of the convention in constituting the powers of Congress.[25] He says that, "the first object of the constitution is to unite the states into one compact society for the purpose of government. If such union must exist or the states be exposed to foreign invasion, internal discord, reciprocal encroachments on each other's property—to weakness and infamy, which no person will deny—what powers must be collected and lodged in the supreme head or legislature of these states? The answer is easy. The legislature must have exclusive jurisdiction in all matters where the states have a mutual interest. There are some regulations in which all the states are equally concerned—there are others which in their operations are limited to one state. The former belong to Congress, the latter to the respective legislatures. No one state has a right to supreme controul in any affair in which the other states have an interest; nor should Congress interfere in any affair which respects one state only. This is the general line of division which the convention have endeavoured to draw between the powers of Congress and the rights of individual states.["] The states in their seperate capacity cannot provide for their common defence, nay, in case of a civil war, one state cannot secure its existence. The only question therefore is, whether it is necessary to unite and provide for the general welfare?

For this question being once answered in the affirmative, leaves no room 3.6.35 to doubt the propriety of constituting a power over the United States, adequate to these general purposes. This was spending time in vain, for it is known, and are invincibly acknowledged that the power of Congress should extend to every case where the interests of the United States are clearly found to be mutual. But pray cannot Congress, after having ascertained this union of interests, and constituted proper powers in all cases to which it applies, proceed one step farther and from an over-ruled system of government in the country, in this compact situation? Is there not a wide difference between just constituting powers adequate to general purposes, and proceeding regularly beyond it to the establishing of a supreme authority over the states in this collective view? The distinction is wide and apparent. Upon a candid examination it will be found that the combination of them both exists in the constitution.

It hath been said that the objection with respect to the freedom of the 3.6.36
Press is not valid, because the power of controuling that is lodged with the several states.

A little consideration will show that this, though perhaps just in itself, is but a specious pretext. Congress have power to lay all duties of whatever kind, and although they could not perhaps directly bar the freedom of the Press, yet they can do it in the exercise of the powers that are expressly decreed to them. Remember there are such things as stamp duties and that these will as effectually abolish the freedom of the press as any express declaration.

3.6.37 It is said however, that the legislatures of the several states will not dwindle away, because they have the sole right of electing the senate. This indeed is all, and such as it is, it will not last long. "Ladislaus of Poland, who was elected emperor after the temporary reign of Sigismund, having relinquished the right of imposing taxes, called an assembly of prelates, barons, and military gentlemen, in their respective provinces, in order to obtain an additional tribute. The provincial assemblies gave birth to the dietines; which now no longer retain the power of raising money in their several districts, but only elect the nuncios or representatives for the diet."[26] And is it expected that when the legislatures of the states are reduced to mere boards of electors, they will long continue so? No, this last dreg of power will at length vanish. Nominal power is always a disgrace unsupported by reality.

3.6.38 That our boasted republic will ere long wear the face of an aristocracy may easily be seen. The foundation of the Venetian aristocracy is well known. "The city was divided into six districts, called festiers. The council of forty proposed that each of these partitions should name two electors, amounting to twelve in all, who should have the power of choosing from the whole city four hundred and twenty, who should have the whole power of the general assembly, and be called the grand council. The people were amused with fine promises and order of regularity, and consoled with assertions that their right of election still continued, and that those who should not be chosen one year, might be the next, and not perceiving that this law would be fatal to their power, suffered that aristocracy to be thus founded, which exists to this hour. The next proposal was that a committee of eleven should be appointed to name the doge. Though the design of reducing the people to nothing might have been easily seen in these manoeuvres, yet the people wearied, irritated, and discouraged by eternal discords, agreed to both."[27] Thus easy may be the gradation of these states.

3.6.39 The proposed constitution is evidently not calculated to coalesce with human nature in another respect. The executive, as vested in the president is too pointedly supreme. The fears of the people will and ought easily to be agitated by such an extent of power in a single man; particularly, if the situation of that man be such as will easily permit any gratification of partiality or ambition.

3.6.40 Suppose we ask the question, whether it would not be better to substitute in the room of a single executive magistrate, a sovereign executive council, consisting of one counsellor chosen from each state by the executive thereof, with a president of such council, who should be only primus inter pares to be chosen from among themselves by the joint ballot of the council and senate, or the former only?

This council to have the appointment of all officers under the federal government, instead of the senate and president, the former of which should have no executive or other powers whatever in that department; but should act merely in a legislative capacity, in conjunction with the house of representatives. There is another idea to be suggested, that in just policy no money bill should be altered or amended in any way by the senate. 3.6.41

But the correction of one part is precluded by an error in another; for here the inequality of representation in the lower house rises into view, and prevents our observing any thing further.

Upon the whole, it is evident that this constitution carries in its figure the strongest features of political ambition, beneath the charming delusion of a fair complexion.

It hath been made an objection to this constitution, that the legislative and executive are not kept perfectly distinct and seperate. 3.6.42

This, I think, is not valid. The executive should have a check on the legislative for this simple reason—that the executive hath its own limits—but the legislative independent of it, would have none at all.

To make laws is unconfined and indefinite, but to execute them when made, is limited by their existence.

But from the executive's having an undue influence over the legislative, I must confess, I have a great aversion.

*The division among the senators is unintelligible,

The next thing that we come to speak of, is the mode of laying taxes. All direct taxes are to be apportioned among the several states according to their respective numbers. 3.6.43

This is a great and a fundamental error. Direct taxes should always be apportioned according to extent of territory. In framing the present confederation in 1778, this was held to be an essential point. Article 8th says, "all charges of war and other expences which shall be incurred for the common defence and general welfare, and allowed for by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of the common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several states in proportion to the value of land in each state, etc." The value of land in a country increases with its riches, and therefore forms a just criterion. There are many reasons which might be offered to show that the number of inhabitants in any state is an improper measure of apportioning taxes. The inhabitants of some states may be numerous and poor, and those of another, few and wealthy.

The truth is, the ratios both of inhabitants and wealth, conspire to shew that the extent of territory is the only proper measure in apportioning taxes 3.6.44

*What was observed on the division of the senate in page 13 [3.6.15] refers only to the four first years after the establishment of this constitution, if it should ever be ratified. But whether they are not the most important, and whether what in consequence of it begins ill, will not continue so, ought to be considered.

among the several states. Commerce creates wealth, but at the same time luxury and high life, and these again a decrease of inhabitants.

3.6.45 The luxury that is derived from commercial wealth always tends to stop population. From this it clearly appears that the apportioning of taxes according to numbers is not just. On the contrary, the state of agriculture is more favourable to population, but not to wealth. Indeed land must, in the nature of things, afford a just measure. It is true that the value of land is dependent on circumstances. But the richer the country grows, the more valuable the land. The extent of land in Massachusetts is small in proportion to its inhabitants, but yet it is more valuable—in Virginia it is very great in proportion to the inhabitants, but yet it is not so valuable.

Let direct taxes be apportioned according to the value of land in each state, and it must be just for this reason, that the value of land always increases in an exact proportion to the riches of the country.

3.6.46 Hitherto we have been considering the blemishes of the constitution as they statedly exist—other objects are derived from omission. Among these the grand one, upon which is indeed suspended every other, is the omission of a bill of rights.

The remarker upon the address of the sixteen members has answered their objection with much force. "I answer (says he) this is not true, it contains a declaration of many rights, and very important ones, i.e. that people shall be obliged to fulfil their contracts, and not avoid them by tenders of any thing less than the value stipulated—that no ex post facto laws shall be made, etc."[28]

3.6.47 The gentleman has here very wittily mistaken the sense of the two terms right and obligation.

They are correlative terms, and between two parties, whenever the former applies to the one, the latter of necessity applies to the other. Whatever any one has a right to expect from me, I am obliged to render him. He might as well have said that the constitution gave the people a right to submit to Congress in every thing, and that we have a right to pay the last farthing of compliance to their despotic whims.

What he mentions is the enforcing of obligation and not the declaring of right.

3.6.48 One of the learned members of the late convention—the honorable Mr. Wilson observes in his speech, that all powers which are not by the constitution given up to Congress, are reserved for the disposition of the several states.[29] This observation is wise and true, because properly speaking it should be so. In entering into the social compact, all rights which are not expressly given up to the governors are reserved to the people. That it is so from a just construction it is easy to discover.

3.6.49 But notwithstanding, if the people are jealous of their rights, where will be the harm in declaring them? If they be meant as they certainly are to be reserved to the people, what injury can arise from a positive declaration of it? Although in reasoning it would appear to be unnecessary, yet if the people prefer having their rights state[d]ly defined, it is certainly reasonable, that it should be done. I am well acquainted with the logical reason, that is general[ly] given for it.

3.6.50 It is said that the insertion of a bill of rights, would be an argument against the present liberty of the people.

To have the rights of the people declared to them, would imply, that they had previously given them up, or were not in possession of them.[30]

This indeed is a distinction of which the votaries of scholastic philosophy might be proud—but in the political world, where reason is not cultivated independently of action and experience, such futile distinctions ought not to be agitated.

In fact, it does not exist, for I should think, it is as rational to declare the right of the people to what they already possess, as to decree to them any new rights. If the people do really possess them, there can be no harm in expressing what is meant to be understood.

A bill of rights should either be inserted, or a declaration made, that whatever is not decreed to Congress, is reserved to the several states for their own disposal.

3.6.51 In this particular, the articles of the present confederation have an evident advantage. The second article says, that "each state retains its sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this confederation expressly declared to United States in Congress assembled."

This will appear the more proper, if we consider that these are rights in which all the states are concerned. It is thought proper to delegate to Congress supreme power on all occasions where the natural [mutual?] interests of the states are concerned, and why not for the same reason grant and declare to the states a bill of those rights which are also mutual?

At any rate it is certain that no injury can arise from it, and to do it, would be satisfactory and wise.

3.6.52 On the whole, my fellow-citizens, this constitution was conceived in wisdom; the thanks of the United States are justly due to the members of the late convention.

But let their productions pass again through the furnace.

Do not give them even the opportunity of depriving you of your rights and privileges, and that without breaking over any restraint imposed by the constitution.

Because this once granted they will be fully enabled in the present age to lay the gentle foundation of despotic power, and after a temporary interval of seeming humanity between you and succeeding generations, to rivet upon them the chains of slavery beyond the possibility of a rupture.

To guard against this, I could wish to see the proposed constitution revised and corrected.

3.6.53 If the States are not to be confederated, let them be reduced to one compact body.

And if a perfect consolidation of the States is to take place, if the people are to become the source of power, and if Congress is to represent them as the head of this grand body politic, in the name of all that is dear to freemen, permit not the veins through which the life of government itself is to flow from the heart to the head, be any way obstructed—let the passages be free and open that vital heat may animate every limb.

That if all the States were to offer their objections, the constitution would be reduced to nothing, is an ill founded idea.

3.6.54 The good natured simularity which the citizen of America discovered between this constitution and a piece of painting, is perfectly erroneous.[31]

All painting is addressed to the sense and relished by taste which is various and fluctuating—but this constitution is addressed to the understanding, and judged of by reason which is fixed and true.

The constitution is for the most part good, and perhaps many of the objections which have been made to it arise from our not being able to discern clearly the collective interest of the states.

Some of them however, in all probability exist beyond contradiction.

3.6.55 Let the convention of each State make its exceptions, then let a future and general one receive them all, and reconcile them with as much wisdom as possible.

This would certainly be some refinement.

It could do no harm, but might do much good.

3.6.56 To conclude, my friends and fellow-citizens, have the proposed constitution revised, corrected and amended—have every dubious expression be made plain and clear—have every power accurately defined and well understood, and your own rights and privileges clearly stated, or a declaration made that all powers that are not by this constitution delegated to Congress, are reserved for your own disposal.

Then and not till then, will impartial justice rule over our land, and America become the theatre of equity and wisdom, as she has already been the field of patriotism and bravery.

This once obtained, we shall be happy and free, and having enjoyed the blessings of peace and plenty under the ample shade of the tree of liberty, we shall deliver them down unimpaired by the corrosive influence of time to the latest posterity.

There is no doubt in Convention every possible objectionable clause was removed by the august body who had the management of the business, as far as was any way compatible with the good of the great whole, that being the leading object of all their deliberations." Massachusetts Centinel 17 October 1787 (One of the People).

This was a common Federalist theme, though it was seldom put quite so strongly. See for example the remarks of A Citizen of New York (John Jay) and A Citizen of America (Noah Webster): "Gentlemen out of doors therefore should not be hasty in condemning a system, which probably rests on more good reasons than they are aware of, especially when formed under such advantages, and recommended by so many men of distinguished worth and abilities." Ford, Pamphlets 75. ". . . [W]hen we reflect on these circumstances [of the distinguished men involved in the framing], it is impossible to resist impressions of respect, and we are almost impelled to suspect our own judgements, when we call in question any part of the system, which they have recommended for adoption. Not having the same means of information, we are more liable to mistake the nature and tendency of particular articles of the constitution, or the reasons on which they were admitted." 10. The Spirit of Laws XIX, ch. 27. A Citizen of America (Noah Webster) is cognizant of the point; his discussion is important and fuller than A Federal Republican gives him credit for. Defining tyranny as "the exercise of some power over a man, which is not warranted by law, or necessary for the public safety," A Citizen of America contends that "a people can never be deprived of their liberties, while they retain in their own hands, a power sufficient to any other power in the state." In the United States, there is no basis for a tyranny based on patrician-controlled religion or on military force (the people being armed); the source of power lies in the people, and that power consists in property. Viewing briefly Roman and English history, the writer concludes:

"Wherever we cast our eyes, we see this truth, that property is the basis of power; and this, being established as a cardinal point, directs us to the means of preserving our freedom. Make laws, irrevocable laws in every state, destroying and barring entailments; leave real estates to revolve from hand to hand, as time and accident may direct; and no family influence can be acquired and established for a series of generations—no man can obtain dominion over a large territory—the laborious and saving, who are generally the best citizens, will possess each his share of property and power, and thus the balance of wealth and power will continue where it is, in the body of the people.

"A general and tolerably equal distribution of landed property is the whole basis of national freedom: The system of the great Montesquieu will ever be erroneous, till the words property or lands in fee simple are substituted for virtue, throughout his Spirit of Laws.

"Virtue, patriotism, or love of country, never was and never will be, till men's natures are changed, a fixed, permanent principle and support of government. But in an agricultural country, a general possession of land in fee simple, may be rendered perpetual, and the inequalities introduced by commerce, are too fluctuating to endanger government. An equality of property, with a necessity of alienation, constantly operating to destroy combinations of powerful families, is the very soul of a republic—While this continues, the people will inevitably possess both power and freedom; when this is lost, power departs, liberty expires, and a commonwealth will inevitably assume some other form." Address of John Humble

(PHILADELPHIA) INDEPENDENT GAZETTEER
29 October 1787

This crude satire charges that the new Constitution is an engine of the rich in their perennial struggle to enslave the poor. It does not purport to be a reasoned criticism of the Constitution but to display the feelings of the many, the largely inarticulate "John Humbles" of America.

The humble address of the low born of the United States of America, to their fellow slaves scattered throughout the world—greeting.

Whereas it hath been represented unto us that a most dreadful disease 3.7.1
hath for these five years last past infected, preyed upon, and almost ruined the government and people of this our country; and of this malady we ourselves have had perfect demonstration, not mentally, but bodily, through every one of the five senses: For although our sensations in regard to the mind be not just so nice as those of the well born; yet our feeling, through the medium of the plow, the hoe, and the grubbing axe, is as accute as any nobleman's in the world. And whereas a number of skilful physicians having met together at Philadelphia last summer, for the purpose of exploring, and if possible removing the cause of this direful desease, have, through the assistance of John Adams, Esquire, in the profundity of their great political knowledge, found out and discovered, that nothing but a new government consisting of three different branches, namely, king, lords, and commons, or in the American language, president, senate, and representatives, can save this our country from inevitable destruction.—And whereas it hath been reported that several of our low-born brethern have had the horrid audacity to think for themselves in regard to this new system of government, and, dreadful thought! have wickedly began to doubt concerning the perfection of this evangelical constitution, which our political doctors have declared to be a panacea, which (by inspiration) they know will infallibly heal every distemper in the confederation, and finally terminate in the salvation of America.

Now we the low born, that is, all the people of the United States except 3.7.2 600 or thereabouts, well born, do by this our humble address, declare, and most solemnly engage, that we will allow and admit the said 600 well born, immediately to establish and confirm this most noble, most excellent and truely divine constitution: And we further declare that without any equivocation or mental reservation whatever we will support and maintain the same according to the best of our power, and after the manner and custom of all other slaves in foreign countries, namely by the sweat and toil of our body: Nor will we at any future period of time ever attempt to complain of this our royal government, let the consequences be what they may.—And although it appears to us that a standing army, composed of the purgings of the jails of Great Britain, Ireland and Germany, shall be employed in collecting the revenue of this our king and government; yet, we again in the most solemn manner declare, that we will abide by our present determination of non assistance and passive obedience; so that we shall not dare to molest or disturb those military gentlemen in the service of our royal government. And (which is not improbable,) should any one of those soldiers when employed on duty in collecting the taxes, strike off the arms (with his sword,) of one of our fellow slaves, we will conceive our case remarkably fortunate if he leaves the other arm on.—And moreover because we are aware that many of our fellow slaves shall be unable to pay their taxes, and this incapacity of theirs is a just cause of impeachment of treason; wherefore in such cases we will use our utmost endeavours, in conjunction with the standing army, to bring such attrocious offenders before our federal judges, who shall have power without jury or trial, to order the said miscreants for immediate execution; nor will we think their sentence severe unless after being hanged they are also to be both beheaded and quartered.—And finally we shall hence forth and forever, leave all power, authority, and dominion over our persons and properties in the hands of the well born, who were designed by Providence to govern. And in regard to the liberty of the press we renounce all claim to it forever more, Amen; and we shall in future be perfectly contented if our tongues be left us to lick the feet of our well born masters.

Done on behalf of three millions of low born American slaves.
John Humble, Secretary.

Letter by An Officer of the Late Continental Army

(PHILADELPHIA) INDEPENDENT GAZETTEER
6 November 1787

This short essay was written, according to Paul Leicester Ford, by William Findley. It is taken here from its first publication, in the Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer, but it was widely reprinted in newspapers and was republished both as a broadside and as a short pamphlet.[1] The essay is not of major importance and lacks a sustained argument; but it does contain a list of twenty-three typical Anti-Federalist objections: that the government is not a confederation, which will lead either to violence or the swallowing up of the states in a universal aristocracy (nos. 1–5); that there is no Bill of Rights reserving the rights of individuals and estates and no provision for trial by jury and liberty of the press (nos. 6–9); that Congress is given power to keep up a standing army and to command the militia (nos. 10, 21); that the legislative and executive powers are not kept separate (nos. 11–12); that the executive power is in the hands of an elected king to whom, nevertheless, the people will turn in case the Senate is corrupted (nos. 15–16); that the representation in the national legislature is too small and responsibility insufficiently secured (nos. 13–14, 17–19); that the slave trade may not be abolished until 1808 and slavery will probably be reintroduced into Pennsylvania (no. 20); that the new government will be expensive, of a monarchial and aristocratic character, and destructive of liberty (nos. 22–23). In conclusion, the Officer strongly criticizes James Wilson as a self-serving aristocrat, contends that no adequate defense of the Constitution has been made, and urges that the people not be blinded by the splendor of the name put forward in its defense.

The essay was answered in detail by Plain Truth in the Independent Gazetteer, 10 November 1787.[2] The most interesting points in the reply are given in the notes below.

2. Plain Truth's essay is reprinted in McMaster and Stone 187–95.

Mr. Oswald,

By inserting the following in your impartial paper, you will oblige yours, etc.

To the Citizens of Philadelphia.

Friends, Countrymen, Brethren and Fellow Citizens,

3.8.1 The important day is drawing near when you are to elect delegates to represent you in a Convention, on the result of whose deliberations will depend, in a great measure, your future happiness.

This convention is to determine whether or not the commonwealth of Pennsylvania shall adopt the plan of government proposed by the late convention of delegates from the different states, which sat in this city.

With a heart full of anxiety for the preservation of your dearest rights, I presume to address you on this important occasion—In the name of sacred liberty, dearer to us than our property and our lives, I request your most earnest attention.

3.8.2 The proposed plan of continental government is now fully known to you. You have read it I trust with the attention it deserves—You have heard the objections that have been made to it—You have heard the answers to these objections.

If you have attended to the whole with candor and unbiassed minds, as becomes men that are possessed and deserving of freedom, you must have been alarmed at the result of your observations. Notwithstanding the splendor of names which has attended the publication of the new constitution, notwithstanding the sophistry and vain reasonings that have been urged to support its principles; alas! you must at least have concluded that great men are not always infallible, and that patriotism itself may be led into essential errors.

3.8.3 The objections that have been made to the new constitution, are these:

1. It is not merely (as it ought to be) a CONFEDERATION of STATES, but a GOVERNMENT of INDIVIDUALS.

2. The powers of Congress extend to the lives, the liberties and the property of every citizen.

3. The sovereignty of the different states is ipso facto destroyed in its most essential parts.

4. What remains of it will only tend to create violent dissentions between the state governments and the Congress, and terminate in the ruin of the one or the other.

5. The consequence must therefore be, either that the union of the states will be destroyed by a violent struggle, or that their sovereignty will be swallowed up by silent encroachments into a universal aristocracy; because it is clear, that if two different sovereign powers have a co-equal command over the purses of the citizens, they will struggle for the spoils, and the weakest will be in the end obliged to yield to the efforts of the strongest.

6. Congress being possessed of these immense powers, the liberties of the states and of the people are not secured by a bill or DECLARATION OF RIGHTS.

7. The sovereignty of the states is not expressly reserved; the form only, and not the SUBSTANCE of their government, is guaranteed to them by express words.[1]

8. TRIAL BY JURY, that sacred bulwark of liberty, is ABOLISHED IN CIVIL CASES, and Mr. W[ilson], one of the convention, has told you, that not being able to agree as to the FORM of establishing this point, they have left you deprived of the SUBSTANCE. Here are his own words—The subject was involved in difficulties. The convention found the task TOO DIFFICULT for them, and left the business as it stands.[2]

9. THE LIBERTY OF THE PRESS is not secured, and the powers of congress are fully adequate to its destruction, as they are to have the trial of libels, or pretended libels against the United States, and may by a cursed abominable STAMP ACT (as the Bowdoin administration has done in Massachusetts) preclude you effectually from all means of information.[3] Mr. W[ilson] has given you no answer to these arguments.

10. Congress have the power of keeping up a STANDING ARMY in time of peace, and Mr. W[ilson] has told you THAT IT WAS NECESSARY.

11. The LEGISLATIVE and EXECUTIVE powers are not kept separate as every one of the American constitutions declares they ought to be; but they are mixed in a manner entirely novel and unknown, even to the constitution of Great Britain; because,

12. In England the king only, has a nominal negative over the proceedings of the legislature, which he has NEVER DARED TO EXERCISE since the days of King William, whereas by the new constitution, both the president general and the senate TWO EXECUTIVE BRANCHES OF GOVERNMENT, have that negative, and are intended to support each other in the exercise of it.

13. The representation of the lower house is too small, consisting only of 65 members.

14. That of the senate is so small that it renders its extensive powers extremely dangerous: it is to consist only of 26 members, two-thirds of whom must concur to conclude any treaty or alliance with foreign powers: Now we will suppose that five of them are absent, sick, dead, or unable to attend, twenty-one will remain, and eight of these (one-third, and one over) may prevent the conclusion of any treaty, even the most favorable to America. Here will be a fine field for the intrigues and even the bribery and corruption of European powers.

15. The most important branches of the EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT are to be put into the hands of a single magistrate, who will be in fact an ELECTIVE

KING. The MILITARY, the land and naval forces are to be entirely at his disposal, and therefore:

16. Should the senate, by the intrigues of foreign powers, become devoted to foreign influence, as was the case of late in Sweden, the people will be obliged, as the Swedes have been, to seek their refuge in the arms of the monarch or PRESIDENT GENERAL.[4]

17. ROTATION, that noble prerogative of liberty, is entirely excluded from the new system of government, and great men may and probably will be continued in office during their lives.

18. ANNUAL ELECTIONS are abolished, and the people are not to reassume their rights until the expiration of two, four and six years.

19. Congress are to have the power of fixing the time, place and manner of holding elections, so as to keep them forever subjected to their influence.

20. The importation of slaves is not to be prohibited until the year 1808, and SLAVERY will probably resume its empire in Pennsylvania.

21. The MILITIA is to be under the immediate command of congress, and men conscientiously scrupulous of bearing arms, may be compelled to perform military duty.[5]

22. The new government will be EXPENSIVE beyond any we have ever experienced, the judicial department alone, with its concomitant train of judges, justices, chancellors, clerks, sheriffs, coroners, escheators, state attornies and solicitors, constables, etc. in every state and in every country [county?] in each state, will be a burden beyond the utmost abilities of the people to bear, and upon the whole.

23. A government partaking of MONARCHY and aristocracy will be fully and firmly established, and liberty will be but a name to adorn the short historic page of the halcyon days of America.

3.8.4 These, my countrymen, are the objections that have been made to the new proposed system of government; and if you read the system itself with attention, you will find them all to be founded in truth. But what have you been told in answer?

3.8.5 I pass over the sophistry of Mr. W[ilson], in his equivocal speech at the state house.[6] His pretended arguments have been echoed and re-echoed by every retailer of politics, and victoriously refuted by several patriotic pens. Indeed if you read this famous speech in a cool dispassionate moment, you will find it to contain no more than a train of pitiful sophistry and evasions, unworthy of the man who spoke them. I have taken notice of some of them in stating the objections, and they must, I am sure, have excited your pity and indignation. Mr. W[ilson] is a man of sense, learning and extensive information, unfortunately for him he has never sought the more solid fame of patriotism. During the late war he narrowly escaped the effects of popular rage, and the people seldom arm themselves against a citizen in vain. The whole tenor of his political conduct has always been strongly tainted with the spirit of high aristocracy, he has never been known to join in a truly popular measure, and his talents have ever been devoted to the patrician interest. His lofty carriage indicates the lofty mind that animates him,[7] a mind able to conceive and perform great things, but which unfortunately can see nothing great out of the pale of power and worldly grandeur; despising what he calls the inferior order of the people, popular liberty and popular assemblies offer to his exalted imagination an idea of meanness and contemptibility which he hardly seeks to conceal—He sees at a distance the pomp and pageantry of courts, he sighs after those stately palaces and that apparatus of human greatness which his vivid fancy has taught him to consider as the supreme good. Men of sublime minds, he conceives, were born a different race from the rest of the sons of men, to them, and them only, he imagines, high heaven intended to commit the reins of earthly government, the remaining part of mankind he sees below at an immense distance, they, he thinks were born to serve, to administer food to the ambition of their superiors, and become the footstool of their power—Such is Mr. W[ilson], and fraught with these high ideas, it is no wonder that he should exert all his talents to support a form of government so admirably contrived to carry them into execution—But when the people, who possess collectively a mass of knowledge superior to his own, inquire into the principles of that government on the establishment or rejection of which depend their dearest concerns, when he is called upon by the voice of thousands to come and explain that favorite system which he holds forth as an object of their admiration, he comes—he attempts to support by reasoning what reason never dictated, and finding the attempt vain, his great mind, made for nobler purposes, is obliged to stoop to mean evasions and pitiful sophistry; himself not deceived, he strives to deceive the people, and the treasonable attempt delineates his true character, beyond the reach of the pencil of a West or Peale, or the pen of a Valerius.

3.8.6 And yet that speech, weak and insidious as it is, is the only attempt that has been made to support by argument that political monster THE PROPOSED CONSTITUTION. I have sought in vain amidst the immense heap of trash that has been published on the subject, an argument worthy of refutation, and I have not been able to find it. If you can bear the disgust which the reading of those pieces must naturally occasion, and which I have felt in the highest degree, read them, my fellow citizens, and say whether they contain the least shadow of logical reasoning, say (laying your hands upon your hearts) whether there is any thing in them that can impress unfeigned conviction upon your unprejudiced minds.

3.8.7 One of them only I shall take notice of, in which I find that argument is weakly attempted. This piece is signed "AN AMERICAN CITIZEN" and has appeared with great pomp in four succeeding numbers in several of our newspapers.[8] But if you read it attentively, you will find that it does not tell us what the new constitution IS, but what it is NOT, and extolls it on the sole ground that it does not contain ALL the principles of tyranny with which the European governments are disgraced.

3.8.8 But where argument entirely failed, nothing remained for the supporters of the new constitution but to endeavor to inflame your passions—The attempt has been made and I am sorry to find not entirely without effect. The great names of WASHINGTON and FRANKLIN, have been taken in vain and shockingly prostituted to effect the most infamous purposes. What! because our august chieftain has subscribed his name in his capacity of president of the convention to the plan offered by them to the states, and because the venerable sage of Pennsylvania, has testified by his signature that the majority of the delegates of this state assented to the same plan, will any one infer from this that it has met with their entire approbation, and that they consider it as the master piece of human wisdom? I am apt to think the contrary, and I have good reasons to ground my opinion on.

3.8.9 In the first place we have found by the publication of Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, Esquire, one of the signing members of the convention, who has expressed the most pointed disapprobation of many important parts of the new plan of government, that all the members whose names appear at the bottom of this instrument of tyranny have not concurred in its adoption.[9] Many of them might conceive themselves bound by the opinion of the majority of their state, and leaving the people to their own judgment upon the form of government offered to them, might have conceived it impolitic by refusing to sign their names, to offer to the world the lamentable spectacle of the disunion of a body on the decisions of whom the people had rested all their hopes. We KNOW, and the long sitting of the convention tells us, that, (as it is endeavoured to persuade us) concord and unanimity did not reign exclusively among them. The thick veil of secrecy with which their proceedings have been covered, has left us entirely in the dark, as to the debates that took place, and the unaccountable SUPPRESSION OF THEIR JOURNALS, the highest insult that could be offered to the majesty of the people, shews clearly that the whole of the new plan was entirely the work of an aristocratic majority.

3.8.10 But let us suppose for a moment that the proposed government was the unanimous result of the deliberations of the convention—must it on that account preclude an investigation of its merits? Are the people to be dictated to without appeal by any set of men, however great, however dignified? Freedom spurns at the idea and rejects it with disdain—We appeal to the collective wisdom of a great nation, we appeal to their general sense which is easily to be obtained through the channel of a multitude of free presses, from the opinions of thirty-nine men, who secluded from the rest of the world, without the possibility of conferring with the rest of their fellow-citizens, have had no opportunity of rectifying the errors into which they may have been led by the most designing among them. We have seen names not less illustrious than those of the members of the late convention, subscribed to the present reprobated articles of confederation, and if those patriots have erred, there is no reason to suppose that a succeeding set should be more free from error. Nay the very men, who advocate so strongly the new plan of government, and support it with the infallibility of Doctor Franklin, affect to despise the present constitution of Pennsylvania, which was dictated and avowed by that venerable patriot—They are conscious that he does not entirely approve of the new plan, whose principles are so different from those he has established in our ever-glorious constitution, and there is no doubt that it is the reason that has induced them to leave his respected name out of the ticket for the approaching election.

Now then my fellow-citizens, my brethren, my friends; if the sacred flame 3.8.11 of liberty be not extinguished in your breasts, if you have any regard for the happiness of yourselves, and your posterity, let me entreat you, earnestly entreat you by all that is dear and sacred to freemen, to consider well before you take an awful step which may involve in its consequences the ruin of millions yet unborn—You are on the brink of a dreadful precipice;—in the name therefore of holy liberty, for which I have fought and for which we have all suffered, I call upon you to make a solemn pause before you proceed. One step more, and perhaps the scene of freedom is closed forever in America. Let not a set of aspiring despots, who make us SLAVES and tell us 'tis our CHARTER, wrest from you those invaluable blessings, for which the most illustrious sons of America have bled and died—but exert yourselves, like men, like freemen and like Americans, to transmit unimpaired to your latest posterity those rights, those liberties, which have ever been so dear to you, and which it is yet in your power to preserve.

An Officer of the late Continental Army.

Philadelphia, November 3, 1787.

1. Plain Truth replied: "When man emerged from a state of nature, he surely did not reserve the natural right being the judge of his wrongs, and the executioner of the punishments he might think they deserved. A renunciation of such rights, is the price he paid for the blessings of good government; and for the same reason, state sovereignty (as I have before observed) is as incompatible with the federal union, as the natural right of human vengeance is, with the peace of society." McMaster and Stone 189. Cf. Federal Farmer VI, 2.8.80 n. 55.

3. Acts and Laws of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts (Boston 1784) III (1784–85). Plain Truth's reply is interesting in its movement from narrow (and probably indefensible) to broader and better grounds: "The liberty of the press in each state can only be in danger from the laws of that state, and it is everywhere well secured. Besides, as the new Congress can only have the defined powers given, it was needless to say anything about the liberty of the press, liberty of conscience, or any other liberty that a freeman ought never to be deprived of. It is remarkable in this instance, that among all the cases to which the federal jurisdiction is to extend (art. 3), not a word is said of 'libels or pretended libels.' Indeed, in this extensive continent, and among this enlightened people, no government whatever could control the press. For after all that is said about 'balance of power,' there is one power which no tyranny on earth could subdue if once roused by this great and general grievance, that is, the people. This respectable power has preserved the press in Great Britain in spite of government; and none but a madman could ever think of controlling it in America." McMaster and Stone 190–91. Cf. Madison's letter to Jefferson, 17 October 1788, Madison, Writings (ed. Hunt) V, 269–75; see Federal Farmer X, 2.8.139 n. 91.

4. Plain Truth answers in terms that anticipate the defense of the large republic fully enunciated by Publius in The Federalist no. 10: "The comparison of a little kingdom to a great republic, cannot be just. The revolution in Sweden was the affair of a day, and the success of it was owing to its confined bounds. To suppose a similar event in this extensive country, 3000 miles distant from European intrigues, is, in the nature of things, a gross absurdity." McMaster and Stone 193. See Agrippa IV, 4.6.16 n. 10.

5. See Centinel III, 2.7.76 n. 39. Plain Truth argues that men conscientiously scrupulous of bearing arms are not forced to do so in any state and that "whatever redress may be wished for, or expected, can only come from the State Legislature, where, and where only, the dispensing power, or enforcing power, is in the first instance placed." McMaster and Stone 194.

6. See above, n. 2.

7. According to Plain Truth, Wilson's " 'lofty carriage,' is very like to be the effect of habit; for I know by experience that a man who wears spectacles, must keep his head erect to see through them with ease, and to prevent them from falling off his nose." McMaster and Stone 187.

8. [Tench Coxe] An Examination of the Constitution for the United States of America . . ., 1788; Ford, Pamphlets 133–54. The pamphlet version, which Ford reprints, is substantially the same as the newspaper version to which An Officer refers and which appeared in numerous newspapers in the late months of 1787.

9. The author is probably referring not to Charles Cotesworth Pinckney but to Charles Pinckney, whose Observations on the Plan of Government Submitted to the Federal Convention appeared in October 1787 (see Farrand III, 106–23); Pinckney's Observations, an edited version of his speeches and proposals in the Philadelphia convention, does not support the Officer's contentions, however.

Essays of Philadelphiensis

(PHILADELPHIA) INDEPENDENT GAZETTEER
November 1787–April 1788

The essays of Philadelphiensis appeared between November 1787 and April 1788 simultaneously (or, in the case of those published in 1788, a day or two apart) in two Philadelphia newspapers, the Independent Gazetteer and the Freeman's Journal, except for three essays (V, VII, XI), which appeared only in the former journal. Some of them were reprinted in several northern papers. The series is taken here from the Independent Gazetteer. The author was a mathematics instructor at the University of Pennsylvania, Benjamin Workman, who had recently emigrated to the United States from Ireland. He was identified as the author by Francis Hopkinson, who suggested that the trustees of the University of Pennsylvania might wish to consider "whether the legislature hath so munificently endowed that institution to make it the hot-bed of sedition; or whether, after this narative, it will be prudent in them to continue in their service, as an instructor of youth, a man who is so wickedly endeavoring to disturb the public tranquility." He suggested to parents the question "whether the principles of youth are likely to be improved under the tuition of an hackneyed, hired party scribbler." Workman replied in kind and the little fire raged for several weeks.[1]

The essays have no clear order, but they contain some substantial arguments. A brief summary follows.

Essay I (3.9.1–7). Federalist attempts to stifle free discussion of the proposed Constitution are an indication of what government under that Constitution would be like.

Essay II (3.9.8–16). Addressed primarily to the Pennsylvania Quakers: (1) good government tends to promote religion and morality; (2) there is no provision in the Constitution for exempting conscientious objectors from bearing arms, and indeed the military president will despise and distrust them; (3) the absence of any provision for liberty of conscience indicates either an indifference to religion or a wish to compel conformity to one belief; (4) it is strange that some Quakers, foes of all forms of slavery, should support this constitution of despotism.

Essay III (3.9.17–22). It is now clear that the great men of America who took an active part in independence were acting in behalf of their own ambition rather than of patriotism. While we do want an efficient federal government, the proposed Constitution cannot provide it: (1) there is no protection of the liberty of conscience, press, and jury trials; (2) taxes must be so high as to take our whole produce; (3) the government will not be able to protect against foreign enemies because a government to be strong must be free and patriotic and the people wealthy and well affected, whereas under the Constitution the case will be the reverse.

Essay IV (3.9.24–30). (The argument of the latter part of essay III is repeated and elaborated. Then:) Because of the great love Americans have for their country, many are willing to overlook deficiencies in the Constitution, believing that it will promote American respectability and greatness. But this is a delusion. The standing army will be needed to keep the country in submission, could not conveniently be called to meet an emergency, and would in any case not fight; the militia would be dispirited and weak. Nor can a navy be built under a system which deprives the states both of resources and incentive and which ensures that the federal government will be too expensive to build a navy. (This is a rather unusual Anti-Federalist argument.)

Essay V (3.9.31–36). This essay adds little or nothing to the argument, consisting entirely in warm denunciation of the scorn with which the well-born proponents of the Constitution treat the opinion of the people and the tyranny that this foreshadows. Fortunately the tyrants revealed the plan prematurely, and in that Providential mistake lies the cause of their forthcoming defeat.

Essay VI (3.9.37–43). Only a system of perfect freedom is consistent with the principle of the American Revolution; only a free America can be strong and respectable; and the Constitution will destroy that freedom. Those who suggest, as a compromise, the addition of a declaration of rights do not understand that such a declaration would effectually annihilate the Constitution; but the proponents understand that and consequently refuse to accept any such declaration.

Essay VII (3.9.44–48). A navy is necessary to maintain United States national commerce and respectability, but all the available resources will go to support the standing army, which will be needed to maintain the new government and benefit the well-born governors.

Essay VIII (3.9.49–57). Philadelphiensis dilates on the importance of the liberty of the press, especially in an extensive country, where it is the chief means of rousing free men to guard their liberties, exposing the tyrant, and rewarding the patriot. A new trick to get Anti-Federalist writers to expose their names will doubtless be resisted; anonymity promotes genuine political debate. Despite attempts to stifle the freedom of the press, there is no sign that the Anti-Federalists will cease their opposition even if nine states ratify.

Essay IX (3.9.58–72). Writers against the Constitution are called incendiaries, but they seek only to prevent the destruction of American liberties and the consolidation of our thirteen free commonwealths into one despotic monarchy. The "president-general" will be an elected king with command of a standing army. The government will be a combination of aristocracy and monarchy, with no real democratic part. The citizen will be left without the protection of a bill of rights. Every patriot should exert himself to secure a new convention which could form a government consistent with the principles of the American revolution.

Essay X (3.9.73–81). The Federalists hasten the decision before the people can be alerted to the danger, as in Pennsylvania and Maryland. In Massachusetts the minority is large, and the proposed amendments leave the main principles of the Constitution untouched. A halt should be called to ratification proceedings and a second convention called. A purely democratic America would be a happier and stronger nation, but what is proposed here is a government of an elected king and a standing army. The new Congress, unlike the state legislatures, will not be the immediate representatives of the people; its numbers are too small, its powers too great.

Essay XI (3.9.82–92). Members of the Convention betrayed their trust, intending to avoid rendering an account of public monies fraudently retained. Pennsylvania will get no credit for past payments, but the delinquent states will not gain either, because the taxes henceforth will be as oppressive as tyranny can make them. The struggle over the proposed Constitution is not like the healthy party controversies in Britain, because it involves the fundamental question whether the principles of the revolution are to be discarded or not. It is a delusion to suppose that amendments will be made after ratification. (See XI, 3.9.90–91 for important arguments on parties.)

Essay XII (3.9.93–98). While some futile attempts have been made to defend the size and power of the national legislature, no one has been so bold as to attempt to defend the President-General. An American Citizen attempted a feeble defense, by a false comparison with the King of Great Britain, but the weakness of the argument is obvious and there has been nothing since. Let another Convention be immediately called and a form of government consistent with the principles of the Revolution be formed; then America will be both free and respectable.

1. Hopkinson's first essay, over the signature "A.B." appeared in the Independent Gazetteer 11 March 1788; Workman wrote a series of replies and justifications, which appeared in the same journal (26 March, 1 April, 15 April, 24 April, 29 April 1788). See letter from Hopkinson to Thomas Jefferson, 6 April 1788, Documentary History of the Constitution IV, 562–64. See Centinel XI, 2.7.144.

I

3.9.1 When the advocates of a cause use their endeavours to stop a free and thorough investigation of the subject, we as naturally and as justly infer that the cause is a bad one, as that two and two make four. A good cause, like pure gold may be tried in the fire, and yet retain its full weight and value; or like the utensils of husbandry, grow brighter and fitter for use the more it is handled. The application of this observation in regard to the friends of the new constitution, is easy. They see, that the more this new scheme of government is discussed, the more tyrannical and ill-adapted to the present circumstances of America does it appear. We find, say they, that to reason in favour of the constitution, is only to give its enemies more latitude to condemn: for although we could call in to our aid a sufficient stock of sophistical arguments and circumstances, by which we might dispose the incautious part of the people to join us in establishing this government; yet we have already experienced that by such means, we defeat ourselves; as we thereby give a greater scope for those of more penetration, to write against the constitution. The advocates of this government have also tried an expedient which has been known to succeed upon some occasions, namely, to answer reason and argument with scurrility and personal invective; but even here they have failed; for the magnitude of the object is so great, as to reduce every little circumstance of this kind, to a mere point. In little matters, this kind of procedure might do well enough; but in an affair of such vast importance to the whole Continent of America, its operation is nugatory.

3.9.2 In this desperate situation of affairs, it need not to be wondered at, that the friends of this despotic scheme of government, were driven to the last and only alternative from which there was any probability of success; namely, the abolition of the freedom of the Press. And accordingly, we find in the Independent Gazetteer of the 29th of October, a writer who signs himself a Pennsylvania Mechanic, says, "It appears by a late eastern paper, that the publisher of the Massachusetts Gazette, is determined to publish no sentiments on this important subject, (viz. the new constitution) unless the writers leave their names with the printer; that any one who may be desirous of knowing the author, may be informed. No honest man, no true friend to America or to the liberty and happiness of mankind, can object to this—For your imitation, gentlemen, I humbly propose the conduct of this your worthy brother, the publisher of the Massachusetts gazette."[1] This Pennsylvania Mechanic one would take to be a blacksmith, whose true employment, is to construct chains to confine to perpetual slavery, the freemen of America; but be that as it may, we find that he can soon call in more of his fellow craftsmen to his assistance, who even seem to be more expert at their occupation than our mechanic above-mentioned: One of these tradesmen has given us a small portion of his skill of chain-making, in the Independent Gazetteer of the 31st of October, under the signature of Galba; which small scrap of his workmanship, I beg leave to transcribe, that we may be the better able to judge of its excellency: He says, "Mr. Oswald, The hint in your paper of last Monday, that every one ought to leave his name with the printer who writes for or against the new form of government proposed by the honorable convention, is only, in my opinion, true[2] in part; for what reason is there that the patriotic gentlemen who write in favour of a scheme of government that holds forth peace, happiness and prosperity to our distressed country, should by leaving their names with the printers, be exposed to the malevolence of those wretches who pretend to find fault with it. Indeed I think it perfectly right that those who wantonly write against it should leave their names, that they may be justly exposed to the contempt and indignation of their fellow citizens, as enemies and traitors to their country; and I hope every patriotic printer in the union, will for the future pay proper attention to the justness and absolute propriety of this hint."

Stop and pause a little Galba, I really believe you were not in your right 3.9.3
senses when you wrote this your hint; for if you had been studying for seven years how you might effectually injure the new constitution, you could not have hit upon a thought more to your purpose: Your zeal has transported you so far beyond the bounds of propriety and discretion, that the haughtiest lordling and friend to arbitrary government in America, must hang down his head and blush upon reading your ill-timed hint.—I assure you sir, I think you have explained yourself right cleverly: You have given us a specimen of the genius and spirit of our new government: Here we see pretty plainly through your excellent regulation of the press, how things are to be carried on after the adoption of the new constitution: All the writings must be on ONE SIDE. The new constitution appears so glorious and immaculate to Galba, that all those who have sufficient spirit to avow their sentiments on the occasion, are to be called traitors and enemies to their country, if they do not think just as he does: And to render them still more odious and execrable, he would have the printers throughout the union, to publish their names with their pieces, should any of them have the imprudence of writing on the subject.—I wonder that Galba did not propose a suit of tar and feathers; but as the taylors have of late become a little bashful about trying on this sort of apparel, and the conceit is therefore a little stale, he would have those obnoxious writers to leave their names with the printers, that they may be cloathed by their fellow citizens with indignation and contempt as with a garment; whilst he would have the patriotic writers in favor of the constitution, entirely exempted from such an abstracted kind of a coat and jacket.—We thank you Galba for your kind and very liberal hint; for it certainly merits our attention. I make no doubt but it is the wish of a thousand of our well born as well as of yourself, that the printers would comply with your request: Such a thought is natural enough;—it must na-

tively be the wish of every little petty tyrant in the United States.—But most of the printers in Philadelphia are men of sentiment; they are lovers of liberty and the rights of mankind, and will necessarily despise such hints, and treat them with the contempt they deserve: There is such a degree of meanness in the requisition especially in that of Galba longhead, as must insult the understanding and integrity of every independent printer who sees it.

3.9.4 Galba your hint was rather calculated for the meridian of Boston, than that of Philadelphia; and I doubt not, but you and the Boston printers have one and the same object: Self is an old fellow: This trite saying will apply.—In Boston the liberty of the press is now completely abolished; and hence all other privileges and rights of the people will in a short time be destroyed: No wonder then that the printers in Boston would exert themselves in favor of this new government: Their present condition is a drawing in miniature of that[3] in which the adoption of the new constitution will certainly place the whole union; so that after the nature of the prince of darkness, they wish to have all their fellow citizens in the same dreadful situation with themselves.—Russell, the printer of the Massachusetts Centinel, has the effrontery to insult the freemen of America so far, as to say in his paper of October the 10th, "That aiming thereby to be just, he is determined not to give place to any piece against the new constitution except the writers leave their names to be made public if desired."[4]—Russell I would not hire a mob to bear you aloft as an object of hatred and contempt, nor would I bribe them to hang you in effigy, although you really deserve it; I am sensible of the danger of inflaming the multitude under a free government; for when a public tumult has once been raised, justice has often been sacrificed to appease it; so that I do not intend to raise a fatal prejudice against you; my intention is to consider the nature and consequences of your conduct, as an advocate for the new constitution, which as far as it respects the liberty of the press, has done more prejudice to your cause, than its enemies can do by the violence of their accusations, however well they may be founded.

3.9.5 On so momentous a subject as the new constitution, it is as plain as any axiom in geometry, that it is of no importance whether or not a writer gives his name; it is with the illustrations and arguments he affords us, and not with his name, we have any concern: Besides this practice would tend to draw off the mind of the writer from the calm investigation of the subject, to recriminations and personal invective: And moreover men of ability, of a modest, timid, or diffident cast of mind, would be detered altogether from publishing their sentiments.[5]—Of what use could it be to the public to know the name of the writer of the piece signed Lucius, that Russell refused to publish? Certainly of no use at all. Non quis sed quid: It was not with the author of Lucius that the freemen of Massachusetts had anything to do, but with his reasoning, which if it were just ought not to be suppressed, and if it were fallacious should be refuted.—Let candor and impartiality be the characteristics of our printers, in respect to this new government which involves in its consequences the happiness or misery of millions yet unborn: This is the line of conduct which men of honor and integrity will naturally pursue, and I find an unspeakable satisfaction, when I every day behold the printers of Philadelphia following this path almost to a man: And hence I am led to conclude that the Pennsylvania mechanic and his successor Galba, must find their hints to be a little premature; such doctrine might have been suited finely about the time of the mock ringing of the bells in this city, for joy and gladness that Congress had recommended the adoption of this new plan of government to the different states, which, by the by, they unluckily forgot to recommend to this present hour.

3.9.6 The gentlemen who are friends to the new constitution had better not blab so freely; especially in regard to the freedom of the press; they ought to wait until this government of governments is once established; and then instead of a coat and jacket of indignation and contempt, they may speak boldly about a gallows, a gibbet, or at least a dungeon, for such writers as the Old Whig, or Centinel, who have dared to speak like freemen.[6] I wonder that our well born should allow such mean fellows to write against this their government; such base wretches ought not to live in the same country with gentlemen; and as soon as our new government is confirmed, these vile enemies to its splendor and dignity, shall quit their cap[e]ring,[7] I'll warrant them; a federal soldier with a fixed bayonet will soon give such daring dogs their quietis. Ah! what glorious days are coming; how I anticipate the brilliancy of the American court! Behold that gilded chariot, set with diamonds, and drawn by eight Arabian horses; off with your hats you poltrons, here is the president going in state to the senate house to confirm the law for the abolition of the liberty of the press. Men and brethren will not these things be so? Yes most assuredly if we adopt the new constitution in its present form, these things will be so. Rouse then; rouse my fellow-citizens, and show yourselves to be freemen: This is the most important object that ever presented itself to your understanding: The independence of America, which God himself vouched safe through his infinite mercy to confer upon us, must end in a curse, if this tyrannical government be suffered to be established. But forbid it Heaven![8]

3.9.7 I was told, last Saturday evening, by a gentleman of veracity whom I met at the meeting at the state-house, that several persons had waited that day on Mrs. Oswald,* for the purpose of requesting her not to publish any pieces against the new constitution, at the same time intimating, that if she persisted, she would forfeit their interests; and that in consequence of her spirited reply, several had that very day withdrawn their subscriptions for the paper. This is truly an alarming circumstance. Where is the freeman in America that this is not sufficient to rouse from a state of supineness? My brethren, be circumspect on this momentous occasion,—"And, take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all to stand. Stand therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness. And your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace. Above all, taking the shield of fath, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked."[10] Amen.

Philadelphiensis.

II

3.9.8 My fellow citizens, the present time will probably form a new epoch in the annals of America: This important, this awful crisis, bids fair to be the theme of our posterity for many generations. We are now publicly summoned to determine whether we and our children are to be freemen or slaves; whether the liberty, which we have so recently purchased with the blood of thousands of our fellow countrymen, is to terminate in a blessing or a curse.

3.9.9 The establishment of a new government is a matter of such immense magnitude, that any other human transaction is small indeed, when compared to it. Great circumspection is therefore necessary on this interesting occasion: The temporal, and in some measure, even the eternal happiness of millions of souls is involved in this important work: I say even in some measure, our eternal happiness is concerned; for, that a good, or a bad government naturally influences religion and morality, is a principle indisputably confirmed by fact: Under a free and patriotic government, the bulk of the people will necessarily be virtuous; but under a tyrannical and unjust one, the greater part of the people will as necessarily be wicked: The complexion of the governing is ever the colour of the governed.

3.9.10 Every freeman possessed of the smallest portion of patriotism and general philanthropy, ought, at this critical juncture, to think seriously, to deliberate cooly, and to determine cautiously. All that is dear to him, nay all that constitutes life itself happy or miserable, is at this very moment about to be unalterably fixed: The rivet of tyranny may now be clenched, that will bind forever the freedom of America in the indissoluble chains of cursed slavery. In the adoption of the new constitution in its present form, we will lose more than all that we have fought for and gained in a glorious and successful war of seven years; yea, and still more than all this, our very character of citizens and freemen will be changed to that of subjects and slaves. In this act the bright orb of glorious liberty will go down under the horizen of cruel oppression, never, never to illuminate our western hemisphere again! How much better that she had never cast a ray on Columbia, than thus to blaze for a moment, and then to vanish forever!

3.9.11 In regard to religious liberty, the cruelty of the new government will probably be felt sooner in Pennsylvania than in any other state in the union. The number of religious denominations in this state, who are principled against fighting or bearing arms, will be greatly distressed indeed.[11] In the new constitution there is no declaration in their favor; but on the contrary, the Congress and President are to have an absolute power over the standing army, navy, and militia; and the President, or rather Emperor, is to be the commander in chief. Now, I think, that it will appear plain that no exemption whatever from militia duty shall be allowed to any set of men, however conscientiously scrupulous they may be against bearing arms. Indeed from the nature and qualifications of the president, we may justly infer, that such an idea is altogether preposterous: He is by profession a military man, and possibly an old soldier: Now such a man, from his natural temper, necessarily despises those who have a conscientious aversion to a military profession, which is probably the very thing in which he principally piques himself. Only men of his own kind will be esteemed by him; his fellow soldier he will conceive to be his true friend, and the only character worthy of his notice and confidence.

3.9.12 Since in the new constitution no provision is made for securing to these peaceable citizens their religious liberties; it follows then by implication, that no such provision was intended. Their influence in the state of Pennsylvania is fully sufficient to save them from suffering very materially on this account; but in the great vortex of the whole continent it can have no weight. How can we expect that a special law will be made by the new Congress merely on their account; and yet it will be absolutely necessary that such a law shall be made, before this privilege is secured to them. Can any man rationally suppose the president will give his assent to a law in favor of the men whom he heartily despises; a law also that in its operation must curtail his own dignity and splendor, by reducing the number of his military? No certainly. There is not probably a military man on earth who could bear the thought; so that such a supposition is absurd. The friends of this scheme of government may possibly attempt to say, that this religious liberty is sufficiently secured by the constitution of the state. But I say not; for, this is a case in which the United States are a party; and every case of this kind, according to the new plan, must be determined by the supreme law of the land; that is by the Congress and President, who are to have the sole direction of the militia. This will be a matter then in which a particular state can have no concern.

3.9.13 From the proceedings of the convention, respecting liberty of conscience, foreign politicians might be led to draw a strange conclusion, viz. That the majority of that assembly were either men of no religion, or all of one religion; such a conclusion naturally follows their silence on that subject; they must either have been indifferent about religion, or determined to compel the whole continent to conform to their own. For my own part, I really think, that their conduct in this instance is inexplicable: It is impossible to divine what might have been their intentions.

3.9.14 Before I dismiss this subject, I cannot help taking notice of the inconsistency of some Pennsylvanians, in respect to this new government. The very men, who should oppose it with all their influence, seem to be the most zealous for establishing it. Strange indeed! that the professed enemies of negro, and every other species of slavery, should themselves join in the adoption of a constitution whose very basis is despotism and slavery; a constitution that militates so far against freedom, that even their own religious liberty may probably be destroyed by it. Alas! What frail, what inconsistent beings we are! To the catalogue of human weaknesses and mistakes, this is one to be added!

Ah, my country-men our situation is critical indeed! Let us make a solemn pause then! The eyes of the world are upon us, the patriots and friends of America in Europe are now anxiously concerned, lest the whirlwind of tyranny should raze from its tender root the hallowed plant of Columbian liberty.

3.9.15 Before we confirm this new constitution let us ask ourselves this question. For what did we withdraw our allegiance from Great-Britain: Was it because the yoke of George the third was not sufficiently galling, that we cast it off, at the expence of so much blood and treasure, in order to accommodate ourselves with one of our own construction more intolerable: Or was it because the tyrant was three thousand miles off, that we revolted, in order to appoint one at home, who should correct us with scorpeons instead of whips? If this was your design, I congratulate you on your success: Hesitate not a moment then in the adoption of the new constitution: It is a perfect model, and answers your intentions completely: It certainly is capable of carrying tyranny and despotism to their ne plus ultra: No second revolution will be necessary: No further attempt need be made on this head; for this government will answer the end proposed to all intents and purposes.

3.9.16 Are these groundless conjectures, mere declamations unsupported by evidence, or affirmations without proof? No truly. Read the Old Whig, read the Centinels, read Brutus—Cincinnatus,[12] &c. and then say if you can, that these things are not real: perhaps better arguments were never advanced in the demonstration of any truth, than these writers have given to illustrate this matter; whilst the writers on the opposite side, have not been able to refute them in a single instance.

I shall close this essay with one observation, viz. that should this despotic scheme of government be overthrown, which God grant; To what cause then are we to attribute this glorious triumph? The answer is obvious; to that palladium of liberty, that inestimable privilege of freemen, that scourge of tyranny, the freedom of the press.

Joel, 2d and 15th [2:15–17]. "Blow the trumpet in Zion, sanctify a fast, call a solemn assembly. Gather the people, sanctify the congregation, assemble the elders: Gather the children and those that suck the breasts; let the bridegroom go forth of his chamber, and the bride out of her closet. Let the priests, the ministers of the Lord, weep between the porch and the altar, and let them say, spare thy people O Lord, and give not thine heritage to reproach, that the heathen should rule over them."

My Fellow Citizens,

Are you disposed to hear plain arguments, simple truth, and pure facts? If 3.9.17 you are, then let me tell you through the voice of reason, that the preservation of your little ones and yourselves, the love of mankind in general, and the liberty of your dear country, now demand your most serious attention. The peace, the freedom and the happiness of the present generation and possibly many succeeding ones, are the great subjects now under discussion. Was there ever then such an important time for America as this is; can there possibly be greater objects, than these are, presented to the human understanding? I say there cannot; and I affirm it, that there is not a man in the United States, except some base assassin or mean coward, who can be indifferent on this momentous occasion. Is there any one now among us who can remain unconcerned or neutral? If there be, I say he is not a man; no certainly he is unworthy of that character; such a wretch can have no claim to the title of a free citizen of America, he is a pitiful sycophant, a cringing spaniel, a menial slave.

The independence of America, with great propriety, was thought, during 3.9.18 our late glorious struggle, an object of such immense value, that we could scarce pay too high a price for it; an object that even dignified human nature; and that thousands of our countrymen magnanimously and chearfully paid their blood for its purchase. But great as this was, I say that the adoption of the new constitution is an object of much greater concern. The parents of a child may rejoice at its birth, as a happy circumstance, but his conduct and character in manhood only can give them real and permanent pleasure; if these be bad, their pain is encreased by disappointment, the recollection of their former joyous hopes now augment their misery; yea, the misconduct of a son has frequently compelled his parents to curse the very day of his nativity. In this relation, the independence of America and the new constitution exactly coincide. For if we adopt this plan of government in its present form, I say we shall have reason to curse the day that America became independent. Horrid thought! that the greatest blessing that God ever bestowed on a nation, should terminate in its misery and disgrace. Strange reverse this! that the freemen of America, the favored of heaven, should submit to a government so arbitrary in its embryo, that even a bill of rights cannot be obtained, to secure to the people their unalienable privilege.

3.9.19 It was a common saying among many sensible men in Great Britain and Ireland in the time of the war; that they doubted whether the great men of America, who had taken an active part in favor of independence, were influenced by pure patriotism; that it was not the love of their country they had so much at heart, as their own private interests; that a thirst after dominion and power, and not to protect the oppressed from the oppressor, was the great operative principle that induced these men to oppose Britain so strenuously. This seemingly illiberal sentiment was however generally denied by the well hearted and unsuspecting friends of American liberty in Europe, who could not suppose that men would engage in so noble a cause through such base motives. But alas! the truth of the sentiment is now indisputably confirmed; facts are stubborn things, and these set the matter beyond controversy. The new constitution, and the conduct of its despotic advocates shew that these men's doubts were really well founded. Unparelleled duplicity! that men should oppose tyranny under a pretence of patriotism, that they might themselves become the tyrants. How does such villainy disgrace human nature! Ah, my fellow citizens, you have been strangely deceived indeed; when the wealthy of your own country assisted you to expel the foreign tyrant, only with a view to substitute themselves in his stead.

3.9.20 But we want an efficient federal government; we want an efficient federal government: this is the constant theme of the day. Well, my friends, I grant this. But what is the ultimate end of an efficient government: in what should it be efficient? I hope you anticipate my answer. The only thing in which a government should be efficient, is to protect the liberties, lives, and property of the people governed, from foreign and domestic violence. This, and this only is, what every government should do effectually. For any government to do more than this, is impossible, and every one that falls short of it is defective. Let us now compare the new constitution with this legitimate definition of an efficient government, and we shall find that it has scarce a particle of an efficient government in its whole composition.

3.9.21 In the first place then, it does not protect the people in those liberties and privileges that all freemen should hold sacred;—the liberty of conscience, the liberty of the press, the liberty of trial by jury, &c. are all unprotected by this constitution. And in respect to protecting our property, it can have no pretensions whatever to that; for the taxes must and will be so enormously oppressive, for supporting this expensive government, that the whole produce of our farms would not be sufficient to pay them.

As to this government being efficient, or rather sufficient to protect the people from the violence of a foreign enemy; the idea is so absurd that it offends common sense; it can neither have strength, energy, nor respectability, in the great scale of nations. For a new country to become strong and energetic, so as to be able to repel a foreign foe, the government must be free and patriotic, and the people must be wealthy and well-affected to it. Now if these requisites be wanting, that country is in jeopardy every moment, in fact it is on the direct road of falling a prey to the surrounding nations. In this miserable predicament then, must America stand, if we adopt the new constitution: for the government will neither be free nor patriotic; but on the contrary, despotic and oppressive; and the people will be abject slaves, toiling to support a government, which they curse in their hearts; a government composed only of an emperor and a few lordlings, surrounded by thousands of blood-suckers, and cringing sycophants. And in respect to the standing army, it will only be made up of profligate idle ruffians, whose prowess will chiefly consist in feats of cruelty exercised on their innocent fellow citizens; but in facing a foreign foe, they will prove themselves to be a body of mean cowards; like the Turkish Janissaries, better acquainted with plundering their country than fighting for its protection. In regard to a militia defending the country, the thing is still more absurd if possible: who in his senses could suppose that people, with their spirits broken by oppression, would voluntarily fight for that government, to which they are necessarily disaffected? No truly: common sense would point out to government that its safety could not be the object of the people arming; and hence it is plain that even were the militia willing to act, such a government would not trust them.—Lastly in respect to a navy, it is a matter of mere moonshine, such an expensive government as this would be, could not spare as much money in fifty years, as would build three ships of the line. This is a short portrait of the efficiency of our efficient federal government. What think you of it, my fellow citizens? 3.9.22

Mr. Oswald,

Russell, the printer of the Massachusetts Centinel, has attempted to answer a remark I make on his conduct in refusing to publish a piece signed Lucius in his paper:[13] Yet he allows that my observation was just; namely, "that it was not with the author of that piece that the freemen of Massachusetts had any thing to do, but with his reasonings." Now let him make 3.9.23

this his rule in future, and then his paper will be free and patriotic; let his conduct quadrate with the sentiment that he admits to be just, and I am perfectly satisfied: All I wished for, or intended, was to have our presses unshackled in respect to the new constitution, the liberty of America required, that they should be open to all parties, but influenced by none; and this impartiality was certainly better observed in Philadelphia, when I wrote, than at Boston, and therefore I made the remark, which I hope will have the desired effect: Indeed from his own concessions I have good reason to believe that my animadversions have been useful in setting the presses free in Boston; and this is as much as I wanted.

He is now obliged to let the scrap of Lucius appear, which probably would never have been the case, if I had not taken notice of the matter: But he has artfully given us no more than the thesis and smothered the rest; well this is still better than nothing.

I. Samuel, 8th and 18th [8:18]. And ye shall cry out in that day, because of your King which ye shall have chosen you: And the Lord will not hear you in that day.

My Fellow Citizens,

3.9.24 I do not write to inflame your minds, but to inform them: I do not write with a view to excite jealousies, and exhibit imaginary evils, but to promote your peace: I have no intentions of encouraging you to oppose or alter your present free government; but on the contrary, I advise you, yea, I entreat you, not to change it for one that is worse: If you cannot procure a better, why be doing [away?] with the old bad one. Except you are tired of freedom; except you are determined to entail slavery on yourselves and your posterity; for God's sake reject with that dignity becoming freemen, that tyrannical system of government, the new constitution. If you adopt it in toto, you will lose every thing dear to freemen, and receive nothing in return; but misery and disgrace.—Were some additional powers for regulating commerce, and the impost duties for a limited time, granted to the present Congress; this would probably answer all our purposes: But before Congress should be vested with greater powers than they now have, their number ought at least to be tripled,—suppose two hundred and sixty; that is, twenty members for each state. But this matter I shall leave for the discussion of our next federal convention; if we should have the good luck to see their High Mightinesses once more locked up in the State-house, guarded by Captain M'Clain's Old Battle-Axe battalion.

Among the schemes and collusions that the friends of the new constitution have made use of to dupe the people into its adoption; that of making them believe that such a government would raise America to an eminent rank among the nations of the earth, seems to have been one of the most successful: There is not a writer that I have seen on the subject, that has called the truth of this matter into question; no wonder then that the less informed should be imposed on; when men of more enlightened understanding seem even to have swallowed the bait. 3.9.25

No people in the world have more of the genuine amor patriae than the citizens of the United States; that noble ambition, that laudable love for the dignity and character of his country, is so implanted in the breast of an American, that he is willing not only to contribute generously and largely of his property; but likewise to expend his blood to support that government that should establish the national respectability of his country.—This truly grand principle is so copiously infused into the hearts of our countrymen, that, I really believe, there is scarce an inconvenience to which they would not chearfully submit, provided this great point could be obtained. On this account then there are many who, although they are thoroughly persuaded that the new constitution is defective in many striking and material instances, yet through their national pride, would magnanimously overlook these, to have their country on a respectable footing as a nation. But ah my fellow citizens you are even disappointed here! It is a mere delusion! nothing but the basest deception; for, in the adoption of this constitution we will probably lose that small portion of national character which we now enjoy, instead of gaining an accession to it. What compensation then are you to receive in return for the liberties and privileges belonging to yourselves and posterity that you are now about to sacrifice at the altar of this monster, this Colosus of despotism? Why really the return you deserve, if you are mean enough to submit to be gulled after this manner; poverty, slavery, and broken-heads.—But, probably you will say, these are groundless conjectures; and we are perfectly convinced, that our new government, however it may be imperfect in some matters of an inferior nature, yet it must and will be powerful; yea a government that will make its enemies tremble. If you mean by its enemies the helpless widow, and orphan, the hard-working husbandman sunk down by labour and poverty: I grant it; but if you mean a foreign enemy; you insult your own understanding. No my friends; instead of becoming formidable, we will be the scorn and contempt of the whole world, during the existence of this contemptible government. Let us take but a rational view of its strength and respectability, and then we shall see that we have really nothing to depend on in this new constitution that 3.9.26 can raise the national character of America, but on the contrary, we will sink into a state of insignificance and misery.

3.9.27 The number of inhabitants in the United States is now probably about three millions and an half.—These are scattered over a continent twelve hundred miles long and eight hundred broad. Now to keep such an extensive country in subjection to one general government, a standing army by far too numerous for such a small number of people to maintain, must and will be garrisoned in every district through the whole.—And in case of immergency, the collecting of these scattered troops into one large body, to act against a foreign enemy, will be morally impossible. Besides they will have too much business on hand at their respective garrisons, in awing the people, to be spared for other purposes: There is no doubt, but to carry the arbitrary decrees of the federal judges into execution, and to protect the tax gatherers in collecting the revenue, will be ample employment for the military; indeed with all their strength and numbers, I am afraid, that they will find this a job of some difficulty, perhaps more than they will get through decently. Upon the whole, I think it is pretty obvious, that our standing army will have other fish to fry than fighting a foreign enemy; there is work enough cut out for them of a domestic nature, without troubling them on other occasions. Moreover such of them as might be brought into action, could not be depended on; for they will principally consist of the purgings of the European prisons, and low ruffians bred among ourselves that do not like to work.—And who could suppose that such vile characters as these, should be trusted to protect our country, our wives, our daughters, and our little ones? No my friends: God deliver us from such protectors.—Their mean souls wanting that amor patriae, that love of virtue, that noble love for the welfare and happiness of their fellow men, which animates the man of courage and constituted him the soldier; would fail them at the approach of an enemy. Yea they would either fly e're the battle commenced; or submit on the first charge; and probably turn their arms against the country that expected their protection. What I advance here, are truths founded on reason and the nature of things, and the experience of all ages affords ample examples for their illustration.

3.9.28 Very little need be said respecting the militia defending the country; perhaps what I have advanced in my last essay, is enough on that head: Indeed the thing itself carries its own evidence along with it: A person that has judgement sufficient to compare two ideas together, must see, that an oppressed people, reduced to a state of abject vassalage, by a despotic government, will never voluntarily venture their lives for it. When people are once slaves it is a matter of little concern to them who their masters are. The fable of the sensible ass is so pertinent to our purpose, that I cannot forbear reciting it. "An old fellow was feeding an ass in a fine green meadow, and being alarmed with the sudden approach of the enemy, was impatient with the ass to put himself forward, and fly with all the speed he was able. The ass asked him, whether or no he thought the enemy would clap two pair of panniers upon his back? The man said, no, there was no fear of that. Why then, says the ass, I'll not stir an inch; for what is it to me who my master is, since I shall but carry my panniers, as usual."

There is not the most distant hope, that we ever shall have a navy under 3.9.29
this constitution which annihilates the state governments; for, if each state were to retain its sovereignty, I am well convinced, that we might have a considerable fleet in a few years: The larger states might each build a ship of the line every year, and the lesser states would furnish us with frigates: A noble emulation among the states would be the consequence; one state would vie with another; and public spirited individuals would contribute generously to raise the character of their own state. But this consolidation of all the states into one general government, renders this project impossible; the federal government having an unlimited power in taxation, which no doubt, they will exercise to the utmost; leaves the states without the means of building even a boat. But had they money, they dare not use it for that purpose; for, Congress are to have an absolute power over the standing army, navy and militia; so that it is out of the question whether a particular state be, or be not, able to build a ship of war; she must meddle with no such matter; it only belongs to the Emperor and our well-born Congress to build and maintain a navy. Now if we give ourselves time to think but for a moment, we must be convinced in our minds, that Congress having a large national debt already accumulated, the Emperor, themselves, their judges, lawyers, revenue-collectors, dependants, flatterers, &c. &c. and above all the standing army, at least double officered, to provide for, will find themselves at their wits-end to devise ways and means for all these purposes. In short, the industry of three millions of people were it all applied to this use, would be little enough. Where then will the navy come from, where will Congress find money even to build and maintain cutters to prevent smuggling on the extensive coast of America? No where truly: Such a supposition is farsical indeed: And should the new constitution be established, a federal navy is a mere finesse, an absolute nonentity.

The Congress must procure money to pay the standing army punctually, 3.9.30 come of other matters what will; their very existence depends on this. For a neglect of payment might, and really would, cause a mutiny in the military; and then down tumbles the federal constitution, whose mighty basis was said to be at the center of the earth: The standing army will be its grand supporters.—now if these give way, the building itself will be instantly levelled to the ground. And Heaven grant that Columbia may never see such another erected again on her domain. Amen.

This is true liberty, when free born men
Having to advise the public may speak free;
Which he who can, and will, deserves high praise;
Who neither can, nor will, may hold his peace;—
What can be juster in a state than this?[14]

My Fellow Citizens,

3.9.31 If the arbitrary proceedings of the convention of Pennsylvania do not rouse your attention to the rights of yourselves and your children, there is nothing that I can say will do it. If the contempt and obloquy with which that body (whose legality even may be questioned) has treated your petitions, can not bring you to think seriously, what then will? When a few Demagogues despising every sense of order and decency, have rejected the petitions of the people, and in the most supercilious manner, triumphed over the freemen of America, as if they were their slaves, and they themselves their lords and masters. I say that if such barefaced presumption and arrogance, such tyrannical proceedings of the men, who, if acting constitutionally, were the servants of the people, be not sufficient to awaken you to a sense of your duty and interest, nothing less than the goad and the whip can succeed: your condition must be like that of the careless and insecure sinner, whom neither the admonitions nor entreaties of his friends, nor even the threatnings of awaiting justice, could reclaim or convince of his error; his reformation is neglected until it is too late, when he finds himself in a state of unutterable and endless woe.

3.9.32 It may be asserted with confidence, that besides the petitions that Mr. Whitehill presented to the convention from Cumberland county against the adoption of the new constitution, there is not a country [county?] or town in the state that should not have followed the example, if a reasonable time had been allowed for the petitions to come in. Now if we consider but for a moment how contemptuously the people were treated on this occasion, we may form some idea of the way in which they are hereafter to be governed by their well born masters. "The petitions being read from the chair. Mr. M'Kean said he was sorry that at this stage of the business so improper an attempt should be made; he hoped therefore that the petitions would not be attended to." (Pennsylvania Herald.)[15] Where is the freeman in America that can tamely suffer such an insult to his dignity to pass with impunity; where is that pusillanimous wretch who can submit to this contumely? Is not this the language of Britain, in the years 1775 and 1776, renewed. What said George the third and his pampered ministers, more than this, to the petitions of America? Is it improper for freemen to petition for their rights? If it be; then I say that the impropriety consisted only in their not demanding them.

Propriety requires that the people should approach their representatives with a becoming humility; but the governors of a free people must ever be considered as their servants, and are therefore bound to observe decency towards them, and to act according to their instructions and agreeably to conscience. If the petitions of the freemen of America, couched in decent and respectful terms, will not be attended to; then be it known, that their demands must and will be granted: If no better will do, the ultima ratio regum must secure to the people their rights. God in his providence has crowned them with success once already on this head; and there is little doubt, with the same assistance, but a second attempt will terminate just as much in favor of liberty.

3.9.33 The indignity offered to the people and their petitions, by the haughty lordlings of the convention, proclaims the chains of despotism already firmly riveted; like a herald it cries aloud, hush ye slaves, how dare you interrupt your mighty rulers, who alone have a divine right to establish constitutions and governments calculated to promote their own agrandizement and honor. Ah my friends, the days of a cruel Nero approach fast; the language of a monster, of a Caligula, could not be more imperious. I challenge the whole continent, the well born and their parasites, to show an instance of greater insolence than this, on the part of the British tyrant and his infernal junto, to the people of America, before our glorious revolution. My fellow citizens, this is an awful crisis; your situation is alarming indeed; yourselves and your petitions are despised and trampled under the feet of self-important nabobs; whose diabolical plots and secret machinations have been carried on since the revolution, with a view to destroy your liberties, and reduce you to a state of slavery and dependence: and alas! I fear they have found you off your guard, and taken you by surprise: there aspiring men having seized the government, and secured all power, as they suppose, to themselves, now openly browbeat you with their insolence, and assume majesty; and even treat you like menial servants, your representatives as so many conquered slaves, that, they intend to make pass under the yoke, as soon as leisure from their gluttony and rioting on the industry of the poor, shall permit them to attend such a pleasing piece of sport.

3.9.34 But I trust, these petty tyrants will soon find to their confussion, that their own imprudent zeal has defeated their designs. Providence has ordered, that they should begin to carry their arbitrary schemes too soo[n] into execution, that, their boundless ambition should precipitate their destruction, and that the glory of God should be made perfect in the salvation of the poor. Blessed be his name, "He hath shewed strength with his arm; he hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts. He hath put down the mighty from their seat, and exalted them of low degree. He hath filled the hungry with good things, and the rich he hath sent empty away."[16] As a villain, who, secreted to rob and murder in the silent hour of night, issues forth from his lurking place before the people have retired to sleep, and thus frustrates his infernal design by impatience; so in like manner the lust of dominion has urged these despots on to the adoption of measures that will inevitably, and, I hope, immediately unhinge every part of their conspiracy against the rights of their fellow-men, and bring on themselves infamy and disgrace.

3.9.35 Figure to yourselves, my brethren, a man with a plantation just sufficient to raise a competency for himself and his dear little children; but by reason of the immoderate revenue necessary to support the emperor, the illustrious well born Congress, the standing army, &c. &c. he necessarily fails in the payment of his taxes; then a hard-hearted federal officer seizes, and sells, his cows, his horses, and even the land itself must be disposed of to answer the demands of government: He pleads unfruitful seasons, his old age, and his numerous, and helpless family. But alas! these avail him nothing, his farm, his cattle, and his all are sold for less than half their value to his wealthy neighbour, already possessed of half the land in the county, to whom also himself and his children must become servants and slaves, or else perish with hunger and want. Do I exaggerate here? No truly. View the misery of the poor under the despotic governments of Europe and Asia, and then deny the truth of my position, if you can. It is a common saying among the poor of Indostan, that to lie is better than to stand, to sleep is better than to wake, but death is best of all; for it delivers them from the cruelty of their nabobs. Even in the freest country in Europe, a lady's lap-dog is more esteemed than the child of a poor man. O God, what a monster is man! that a dog should be nourished and pampered up by him with dainties; whilst a being, possessed of knowledge, reason, judgement, and an immortal soul, bought with no less a price than the blood of our divine Redeemer, should be driven from his door, without admitting him even for a moment to assuage his hunger with the crumbs that might fall from his table.

3.9.36 But the members of the Federal Convention were men who have been all tried in the field of action, say some; they have fought for American liberty: Then the more to their shame be it said; curse on the villain who protects virgin innocence only with a view that he may himself become the ravisher; so that if the assertion were true, it only turns to their disgrace; but as it happens it is not true, or at least only so in part: This was a scheme taken by the despots and their sycophants to bïass the public mind in favor of the constitution; for the convention was composed of a variety of characters; ambitious men[,] Jesuites, tories, lawyers, &c. formed the majority, whose similitude to each other, consisted only in their determination to lord it over their fellow citizens; like the rays that converging from every direction meet in a point, their sentiments and deliberations concentered in tyranny alone; they were unanimous in forming a government that should raise the fortunes and respectability of the well born few, and oppress the plebians.

Philadelphiensis, No. 5.

VI

Distress'd Columbia, must thou lie so low?
Must all thy conquests, glories, triumphs, spoils,
End in thine own disgrace?[17]

My Fellow-Citizens,

If America is to become a respectable nation, the people must retain their freedom in the fullest extent possible; this is the sine qua non of our respectability; on this alone must the strength, honor, and national character of this country depend. Indeed, any other system defeats the intention of the revolution; freedom was the ultimate object of the war with Britain, and must, from the nature of things, be the object as long as America remains an independent country. The Turkish empire was established by cruelty and dominion, by the swords of bigotted infidels, whose religion taught them to murder without remorse: probably then, that empire should have been extinct long ago, if the same system of despotism and cruelty had not been preserved; (although there are some authors who affirm that even in Turkey great and valuable privileges have always been enjoyed) but be that as it may, the case is widely different with us; nothing short of pure liberty is consistent with revolution principles; the temple of freedom that was raised in America, was intended by Providence to be the asylum of the poor and the oppressed of every nation and every clime. If then we prostitute this hallowed edifice, to purposes for which Providence never designed it, our ruin is inevitable. Our national independence will probably not survive the loss of our liberties a single day. As darkness brings the night, so despotism will obliterate the very name of the American empire. 3.9.37

It is a principle almost universally confirmed by the joint evidences of reason and experience, that that nation which is most free, is always most victorious; people who enjoy their civil and religious liberty, according to the true sense and meaning of the phrase, are laborious and brave. As the nature of a free government is to protect the lives, liberties, and property of the people, that each may enjoy what he hath by honest industry acquired; so it will be the temper and nature of that people, voluntarily to fight in defence of that government; for its interests and preservation is the same as their own. Hence, under a free constitution which secures the rights and privileges of the people, we will find courage, fortitude, and an unshaken loyalty to that government: but on the contrary, where despotism and tyranny prevail, the people are indolent and pusillanimous, backward to toil and fight in support of a government which their interest must lead them rather to see annihilated than preserved. If we take a view of ancient or modern history, we will find that freedom and superiority have ever gone hand in hand. The history of England affords us many striking instances to 3.9.38 illustrate this truth; the party that fought for the country, in civil broils, has always been victorious over the faction that endeavoured to enslave it. But why need I advance examples to prove a point, that the bare mentioning of the American revolution seems to put beyond controversy. If the history of the Turkish empire does not afford an exception to this principle, that freedom and victory are inseparable, there can be none found that I know of, without the conquest of the island of Corsica, by the French, be admitted as one; which certainly ought not, for it rather shows that freemen contending for their liberties are invincible.

3.9.39 Since it is obvious from what has been said, that the energy and national strength of America are concomitant with her freedom; it follows then that the adoption of the new constitution which ncessarily destroys the latter, must of consequence destroy the former: This constitution, in the first instance, will lop off above one half of our sacred rights and privileges, for which we bled and conquered; and the remainder are generally left insecure, and therefore must eventually be lost too; for the cursed lust of dominion can never be satisfied until it is in possession of all power, yea, it even then will be discontent, for it is insatiable. If America is to be great she must be free; freedom is her heart, her very life-blood; and the liberty of the press, like the great aorta, the prime artery, must convey it to the remotest parts of the extremities. That the adoption of this new constitution, in toto, will destroy the freedom of the press, and every other right and liberty that should adorn the freemen of America, has been proved in a clear and masterly manner by many patriotic writers, even before the dissent of the virtuous minority of the convention of Pennsylvania appeared;[18] but this gives the matter a finishing stroke: he who denies the evidence of their positions is either a designing villain, or one who insults his own reason, and declares himself incapable of judging right from wrong, or freedom from slavery, and consequently unworthy of enjoying American liberty.

3.9.40 The political alchymist, Dr. Rush, in his fulsome speech, that he has so assiduously published, patched, and re-published in all our newspapers, says, that our adoption of the new constitution will "produce paleness and distress at the court of St. James's."[19] From such a fallacious assertion, one would imagine that the Doctor must suppose the people of the United States are already as blind as he would wish to make them, if he thinks they will swallow this his bolus of deceit; such a declaration may probably work upon the prejudices of an American reader, but can never convince his reason. The assertion is false, take it in what sense you will; whether the Doctor meant that the adoption of this system of government will produce our misery or prosperity, he is equally wrong. That our establishing a despotic government possessed of every necessary power and qualification for annihilating the freedom of the people, and reducing them to the lowest state of slavery and wretchedness, should excite paleness and distress at the court of London is truly paradoxical; the sentiments of that nation must have undergone a great change indeed; a greater change certainly than any man of common sense can credit. I know there are many good men of patriotic hearts and friends of American liberty in Britain, who will feel the most poignant grief when they hear of its adoption; but that these are of the court party, I can scarce believe: and I question much whether we should not doubt the sincerity of a positive and official declaration of the court, sympathizing with us in our sorrow. So that, upon the whole, I think it is pretty obvious, that the court of St. James's will not be much distressed at our misery. And that the British government should be distressed on account of our prosperity that must result to this country from our adoption of this system of government is a sophistical faslehood, that a grain of reason is sufficient to detect: Britain will never be distressed by reason of our prosperity under this constitution; for the truth of the matter is, we cannot prosper under it, but on the contrary, we will sink into misery and contempt; and probably cease to be an independent nation: This is a consequence that every politician will necessarily and quickly draw, and that the British, or any other government, must comprehend in an instant: Neither energy, strength nor respectability can exist a moment in America after the adoption of this tyrannical government.

3.9.41 There are several who have imagined that this government will for some time be a moderate aristocracy,[20] but end in a despotic monarchy; but this is a mistake; for it must commence in despotism: if ever it has a beginning. A large standing army will be absolutely necessary to set it in motion; I say a large standing army, for a small military force would only excite opposition in its enemies, and encourage them to attempt its destruction, by an appeal to arms. The impolitic conduct of Britain at the commencement of the American war, is a lesson for despotic governments in future; a decisive blow must be struck at once, otherwise liberty may triumph.

3.9.42 The advocates of the new constitution must be pretty well convinced by this time, that there are in every state a considerable number of people, perhaps one half of the whole, disaffected to it: now if nine states should really come into the measure, would it be prudent to compel the rest. I think not; although it is already whispered about, that if Virginia or any of the southern states should not adopt it, that force will certainly be applied; but this is Utopian altogether, nor can I conceive even if every state in the union should adopt it, how this faction can be crushed, and crushed it must be effectually, before this government is firmly established: I even doubt, whether all the military that the well born and their parasites can raise, will compleat this piece of business to their satisfaction. Has not America already shewn to the world that no power on earth can overcome a phalanx of freemen defending their sacred liberties?

3.9.43 Many patriotic writers wishing to compromise matters between the friends and enemies of the proposed government, have imagined that the difference might be amicably settled, if a declaration of rights were prefixed to the constitution, so as to become a part of it; and therefore have recommended this to the parties as a necessary measure to reconcile them again to each other: But these good men did not consider that a declaration of rights would effectually annihilate the constitution; of this however, its advocates were well aware, and consequently could not consent to the amendment. No, no, the haughty lordlings and their sycophants must have no limits set to their power; they alone should rule; yes, and rule as they list too; why should any poor paltroon speak of rights? Why, to work as a slave for his well born master. Ah, my fellow citizens, this is a trying moment! an awful time indeed! Is it possible that the freemen of America should lose their liberties so soon? I hope not; and I trust, that the Lord, who is the friend of the poor and oppressed, will defeat the purposes, and confound the counsels of their haughty enemies; so that "they shall take them captives whose captives they were, and they shall rule over their oppressors."[21] Amen.

3.9.44 Common sense said, that, in case America became an independent nation, neutrality would be a safer convoy than a man of war:[22] Probably Mr. Paine thought so, when he wrote; but if he did he thought wrong: For the position ought to be reversed.—A man of war is a safer convoy than neutrality; or at least, without a naval convoy there is no safety in neutrality. If America is to be a commercial neutral power, she ought to have some naval strength to intitle her to the appellation. We all know that the armed neutrality of the northern European powers injured the trade of Britain more, during the late war, than the combined fleets of her open enemies. If a war should now commence between Britain and France or any of the nations who have possessions in America; can America remain a neutral power, or join in an armed neutrality for the protection of her commerce? No. Neutral she may be, and neutral she must be, and nothing else; and as for her being called a power it is a mere solecism, as long as she has no navy: Her trade may be destroyed with impunity; her seamen taken to man the fleets of her enemies, without the possibility of redress; and her government insulted and her cities laid in ashes by her enemies ships riding triumphant in her rivers and harbours, without being able to help herself, or retaliate.

3.9.45 But however necessary a fleet may be for the protection of our seamen, commerce, and national honor, it is pretty plain, that as long as the proposed government would exist, (if ever it should be established) we must do without one: That government must at least for some years be administered by a standing army. Nothing short of despotism can reduce the disaffected part of the people to submit to it, who are the friends to liberty and the rights of human nature. Those who say that its enemies are a few insignificant individuals, talk something like the British ministry at the commencement of the war, who represented the American discontents, as a parcel of cowardly paltroons, whom they would soon bring to obedience, by a handful of military; but a short time convinced them of their mistake.

3.9.46 As the spirit of the new constitution admits of a standing army, and the opposition absolutely must be crushed by strength, every nerve of power must be strained, and every way and means of collecting money devised, for raising an efficient army for this purpose, in the first instance. This is a system of procedure that the despots must pursue, if they have any hopes of success. Either moderation or delay would effectually defeat them.

3.9.47 I question whether all the hard money, that the well born can procure at this juncture, will be sufficient to support their government and army for six months; without expending a single shilling on building a federal navy. The greater part of that junto are extremely poor; and have their hopes of agrandizement on the new government; now if a part of the people refuse to pay taxes to that government, as they certainly will, how will they provide for the national debt; how will these poor gentlemen make their fortunes; how will they pay their standing army, to whom they owe their existence; a few interogatives of this sort must shew clearly, that a single ship of war will never be built while this great government is in operation.

3.9.48 It is generally said, that the present distresses of America are in consequence of the want of the states delegating sufficient powers to congress: This is right in part, for the powers of congress were certainly too limitted to promote the general good of the union; but little power as that body had, they have not managed it well; indeed if they had had any more and the number of members so small, we would have had a tyrannical aristocracy established long ago; and the country involved in more misery. That body never attempted to build a navy; but, on the contrary, to complete our disgrace, sold the only ship of war we had, the Alliance frigate, for a mere song: They have found money however, to pay their well born ambassadors at the different European courts, and squandered away money on guilded swords, presents to Baron ____,[23] &c. &c. &c. and they have even had credit to negociate loans lately; but not a farthing could be spared to employ our poor mechanics to build a few frigates, by which a thousand honest families might have been saved from starving, and prevented from emigrating from the country, and our commerce and national respectability preserved. This is a specimen of the plan of our new system of government. When the present peddling and limited congress have taken such arbitrary steps, so diametrically opposite to the interest of the public good, what may we not expect from the friends of the new constitution? The poor workingman is not to be thought of except his work will add to the character and dignity of the lordling nobility.

This is true liberty; when freeborn men,
Having to advise the public, may speak free;
Which he who can, and will, deserves high praise,
Who neither can, nor will, may hold his peace—
What can be juster in a state than this?[24]

3.9.49 Hail, immortal genius!—hail, thou friend of freedom, and of thy fellow-men, whose patriotic pen first wrote this divine sentiment, "Let it be impressed upon your minds, let it be instilled into your children, that the liberty of the press is the palladium of all civil, political, and religious rights of freemen."[25] This is the scourge of tyrants, oppressors, villains, and blood-suckers; the bulwark of freedom, that causes the haughtiest lordling to tremble; an inestimable jewel, that places the poorest citizen on a level with the richest demagogue. In America the freedom of the press is peculiarly interesting: to a people scattered over such a vast continent, what means of information or redress have they, when a conspiracy has been formed against their sacred rights and privileges? None but the press. This is the herald that sounds the alarm, and rouses freemen to guard their liberty. From this scourge, the parricide, the knave of power and his cringing sycophants have every thing to fear; it hurls fury on the guilty heads of such base characters, and drags them to the public altar—And through the medium of the press, the good and the patriotic citizen receives the thanks of his grateful countrymen.

3.9.50 The sons of freedom who framed the constitution of Pennsylvania, expressly declared this to be one of the unalienable rights of the people, and therefore it ought not to be restrained. That some evils attend an unrestrained press, is obvious; but these are infinitely overbalanced by its advantages. The very salvation of America, I trust, will be wrought out by it; and the conspirators be taken by their own snares, which they so artfully set to seize the liberties of their fellow citizens, to their extreme mortification and disgrace.

3.9.51 In my first number, I took notice of some attempts, made by some of the well born or their parasites, to destroy the freedom of the press. A scheme was then proposed, that every writer, for or against the constitution, should leave his name with the printer, to be published if required. This plan was first set on foot in Boston, and adopted by some of the printers there; in consequence of which, a gentleman under the signature of A Pennsylvania Mechanic, recommends a similar conduct to the printers of Philadelphia—And a few days after, another, under the signature of Galba, carries the system something higher; for he must have the villains only who wrote against the new government to leave their names for publication, while the patriotic gentlemen who wrote in favour of it, might walk at large.

3.9.52 Either through my reply, the terrors of a guilty conscience, or probably both, we heard no more of these press-fettering gentlemen until Monday last, when a writer in the Independent Gazetteer, under the signature of One of the whigs of 1776, comes forth with an improvement upon the original plan.[26] As he says "he has been bred a mechanic," I conceive he is the identical Pennsylvania Mechanic, who, we formerly observed, must be a blacksmith, employed in the service of the well-born to construct chains for confining to perpetual slavery the rest of his fellow-citizens. As his method of obtaining the names of the patriotic writers is tolerably clever, it deserves our particular notice. He says that he has left his name with the printer, and hopes the opposite writers will have no objections to do the same, to the end that he may have a private interview with them, and probably they may then make a convert of him. This is a pretty decent kind of a trap of the blacksmith's construction; but let him recollect the old proverb, There is no catching old birds with chaff; and then, I think, he will soon find that his interviews and conversions are rather visionary.

3.9.53 Tyrannical men are generally cunning, and hence they use deceitful arguments, with all the appearance of plausible equality. The author of a piece, say they, ought to give his name, for no man should write what he is ashamed to own. There is an appearance of candour in this argument, which renders it dangerous; but if we consider the thing more attentively, we shall find, that such a system would be subversive of truth and free enquiry, and eventually annihilate the freedom of the press.

3.9.54 When a political writer gives his name with his piece, he then shews where the opposite party may aim their shafts of malice, falshood, and scurrility, with certainty and success. Will a man, for his own sake—or if he has friends, family and endearing connections in life, still more for their sake; venture to expose his interest, his property, and perhaps his life, to the mercy of a revengeful, and probably a powerful party? He certainly will not, if he has common sense; and yet if he gives his name, this would necessarily be the consequence—All investigation of the subject would cease; the whole attention would be drawn off to another object; reason and argument must give place to personal invective and scurrility. When a person writes upon a national subject, he appeals to the public, who have nothing to do with the man himself, but with his sentiments: If his arguments and illustrations are well founded, they ought by all means to be published, as they tend to promote the general good; but if they are of a false or dangerous nature, let them be refuted.

3.9.55 The friends of the new constitution have used every method and device, that their power, their cunning, or their influence could have access to, in order to restrain the liberty of the press respecting that despotic scheme of government; but to their confusion be it remembered, that there were printers in Philadelphia beyond their influence or corruption: No city in the Union has afforded such illustrious instances of independence and patriotism among printers. While such a noble spirit exists among these men, there is little danger of the new government ever being established. The despots and their parasite are well aware, that if they could restrain the freedom of the press, all would be their own; hence they have pursued the object with unremitting zeal, and have in some measure succeeded. They have, I am told, by threats and by withdrawing subscriptions, stopt the publication of the debates of the Convention in the Pennsylvania Herald, and otherwise injured that paper so far, that the printer must cease publishing.[27] If such conduct as this be not sufficient to rouse the people of America to a sense of their duty, they must become the scorn of the whole world—a mere bye-word of contempt.

3.9.56 The advocates of this government say, that if nine states come into it, they will proceed to organize and put it in operation. They hug themselves up in the idea, that its enemies will cease their opposition and submit peaceably. How they came to make such a silly conclusion, is to me matter of surprise, as I never have observed the smallest change of sentiment among the patriotic gentlemen with whom I have conversed. From some of the writings of its friends, it seems probable, that this idea sprang from the circumstance of the Declaration of Independence. That measure was carried by a bare majority in some of the states, yet the minority gave way and joined cordially in it.—If there were any similarity between the circumstances of the Declaration of Independence and the adoption of the proposed Constitution, this argument would have some weight; but the premises are widely different, and consequently the inference inconclusive. The whole body of the people were determined to defend their liberties, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, against the tyranny of the British government; so that there was a union of sentiment in respect of the great object, the only difference was in the means of obtaining it; in this case, then, common sense must have pointed out the expediency of the minority accommodating their private sentiments to those of the majority.

3.9.57 But the matter now in debate has no relation to that: the men opposed to the new constitution have the same cause to defend, that the people of America had during the period of a seven years war. Who is he so base, that will peaceably submit to a government that will eventually destroy his sacred rights and privileges? The liberty of conscience, the liberty of the press, the liberty of trial by jury, &c. must lie at the mercy of a few despots—an infernal junto, that are for changing our free republican government into a tyrannical and absolute monarchy. These are what roused the sons of America to oppose Britain, and from the nature of things, they must have a similar effect now.

TRANSLATION.
Thus we, by madness blinded and o'ercome,
Lodge the dire monster in the sacred dome.[28]

My Fellow-Citizens,

Before martial law is declared to be the supreme law of the land, and your character of free citizens be changed to that of the subjects of a military king, which are necessary consequences of the adoption of the proposed constitution, let me admonish you in the name of sacred liberty, to make a solemn pause. Permit a freeman to address you, and to solicit your attention to a cause wherein yourselves and your posterity are concerned. The sun never shone upon a more important one: It is the cause of freedom—of a whole continent—of yourselves and of your fellow men. 3.9.58

Men who have so gloriously asserted the rights of human nature, and overcome tyranny, one ought reasonably to suppose could not have their spirits so much broken as peaceably to submit to it a few years afterwards. By the declaration of peace, wherein Britain acknowledged the independence and sovereignty of the United States, the people of America became citizens of the freest country under heaven. But under the proposed plan of government the least fragment of liberty cannot exist. 3.9.59

The writers against the proposed constitution are denominated, by the aristocratics, incendiaries, and enemies to America, men whose writings tend to involve this devoted country in anarchy, and in all the horrors of a civil war. Now, in reply to this charge; let me ask the friends of this government, is that man an incendiary who advocates the unalienable rights of the people? Is he an enemy to America who endeavors to protect the oppressed from the oppressor; who opposes a conspiracy against the liberties of his country, concerted by a few tyrants, whose views are to lord it over the rest of their fellow citizens, to trample the poorer part of the people under their feet, that they may be rendered their servants and slaves? If such a writer is an incendiary, and an enemy to America, then I glory in the character. A conspiracy against the freedom of America, both deep and dangerous, has 3.9.60 been formed by an infernal junto of demagogues. Our thirteen free commonwealths are to be consolidated into one despotic monarchy. Is not this a position obvious? Its evidence is intuitive; and the address and dissent of the minority of the convention of Pennsylvania add such strength to its illustration, that no man of common sense can refuse his assent.[29] But why need I attempt to prove a point, that that honest man and firm patriot, Mr. MARTIN, says the monarchy men of the federal convention declared was their intention.[30]

3.9.61 Who can deny but the president general will be a king to all intents and purposes, and one of the most dangerous kind too; a king elected to command a standing army? Thus our laws are to be administered by this tyrant; for the whole, or at least the most important part of the executive department is put in his hands.

3.9.62 A quorum of 65 representatives, and of 26 senators, with a king at their head, are to possess powers, that extend to the lives, the liberties, and property of every citizen of America. This novel system of government, were it possible to establish it, would be a compound of monarchy and aristocracy, the most accursed that ever the world witnessed. About 50 (these being a quorum) of the well born, and a military king, with a standing army devoted to his will, are to have an uncontrouled power over our lives, our liberties, and property, in all cases whatsoever. Is he an incendiary who abhors the thought of such a government, who declares it his opinion, that none but a sycophant or a slave could submit to it? I think not; and there is no power under heaven that could cause me to change my opinion; which has the joint evidences of reason and experience for its foundation.

3.9.63 There is not a tincture of democracy in the proposed constitution, except the nominal elections of the president general and the illustrious Congress be supposed to have some colour of that nature; but this is a mere deception, invented to gull the people into its adoption. Its framers were well aware that some appearance of election ought to be observed, especially in regard to the first Congress; for without such an appearance there was not the smallest probability of their having it organized and set in operation. But let the wheels of this government be once cleverly set in motion, and I'll answer for it, that the people shall not be much troubled with future elections, especially in choosing their king, the standing army will do that business for them.

3.9.64 The thoughts of a military officer possessing such powers, as the proposed constitution vests in the president general, are sufficient to excite in the mind of a freeman the most alarming apprehensions; and ought to rouse him to oppose it at all events. Every freeman of America ought to hold up this idea to himself, that he has no superior but God and the laws. But this tyrant will be so much his superior, that he can at any time he thinks proper, order him out in the militia to exercise, and to march when and where he pleases. His officers can wantonly inflict the most disgraceful punishment on a peaceable citizen, under pretence of disobedience, or the smallest neglect of militia duty.

Among the substantial objections to the great powers of the president, 3.9.65 that of his negative upon the laws, is one of the most inconsiderable, indeed it is more a sound than any thing else; For, if he be a bold enterprising fellow, there is little fear of his ever having to exercise it. The two branches of the legislature, will be at his service; no law contrary to his sentiments, however salutary in its operation, dare be mentioned by them. As a body, and as individuals, they will be his sycophants and flatterers. But, if on the contrary he should not be a man of spirit, a thing very improbable, as none but an ambitious man, well versed in the ways of men, could have the address to be raised to that elevated station; if, however, I say, he should not be a man of an enterprising spirit, in that case he will be a minion of the aristocratics, doing according to their will and pleasure, and confirming every law they may think proper to make, without any regard to their public utility.

Every idea of such unlimited powers being lodged in so small a number of 3.9.66 the well born, elevated so far above the rest of their fellow citizens, and supported by a king with a standing army at his disposal, ought to cause the blood of a free citizen to boil with indignation: the very mentioning of it shocks my whole frame. I abhor the thought from my soul: And I flatter myself that the people of this continent will not suffer such a government to be placed over them. Indeed it astonishes me, that the conspirators who framed it, had not the most dreadful apprehensions of their personal safety, from the just resentment of the freemen of an insulted country.

To such lengths have these bold conspirators carried their scheme of 3.9.67 despotism, that your most sacred rights and privileges are surrendered at discretion. When government thinks proper, under the pretence of writing a libel, &c. it may imprison, inflict the most cruel and unusual punishment, seize property, carry on prosecutions, &c. and the unfortunate citizen has no magna charta, no bill of rights, to protect him; nay, the prosecution may be carried on in such a manner that even a jury will not be allowed him. Where is that base slave who would not appeal to the ultima ratio, before he submits to this government?

If the despots persist in pushing it on, let them answer the consequences; 3.9.68 they may fall a sacrifice to their own obstinacy; for liberty will triumph over every obstacle, even were a standing army opposed to it.

To preserve the peace of the country, every patriot should exert himself at this awful crisis, and use his influence to have another federal convention called as soon as possible; either to amend the old articles of confederation, or to frame a constitution on revolution principles, that may secure the freedom of America to the remotest time.

If the State of Massachusetts should reject the proposed constitution, of 3.9.69 which there is a strong probability, what a contemptible figure must its advocates make, who, after it made its appearance from the dark conclave, affirmed that there was but five men opposed to it in the United States.[31] The convention of that state was chosen in the moment of blind enthusiasm, and yet we find it so much divided that the issue is doubtful. The sentiments of the people are changing every day, and were that convention to be elected now, I doubt not but four fifths would be against it. In the back counties of Pennsylvania, where the well born have no influence, the opposition is said to have become so powerful that a person would be in danger of losing his life, if he ventured to speak a word in its favor.

3.9.70 The conspirators saw clearly, that such a system of government could never be established over freemen, except they were taken by surprize; and hence they hurried matters forward with that view; in short, the people were made to believe, that they were all dead men, if they did not adopt it immediately. Even still they are endeavoring to hold up the idea of anarchy being the consequence of rejection: But he must have very weak intellects indeed, and [be] little acquainted with the spirit of freemen, to whom it is not obvious that adoption will produce anarchy and ruin.

3.9.71 No evil can result from calling another general convention, but much good would be the consequence. The distresses of America are not of that nature to be healed all of a sudden; some of them indeed have arisen from the defects in the general government; but there are others of a different kind, that must be removed by time, and by the prudence of the people at large.

3.9.72 Ye patriots! ye lovers of peace, of liberty, and of your fellow men! Ye are called upon at this solemn juncture, to stand forth and save your country; before the breach is too wide, and while the parties may still be reconciled to each other; before anarchy stalks through the land; and before the sword of civil discord is unsheathed. For the sake of every thing that is great and good, and as you shall answer for it at the great tribunal, use your influence to procure another general convention with all possible speed, as the only way left to preserve the union of America, and to save your fellow citizens from misery and destruction.

Philadelphiensis. (No. IX.)

X

My Fellow-Citizens,

3.9.73 If stupid irony, falsehood, scurrility, and abusive language, be sufficient to silence a writer in the cause of freedom, my sentiments must have been suppressed long ago; but that old saying, that nothing cuts like the truth, has encouraged me to address you once more. Probably this essay may be more obnoxious to the friends of the proposed plan of government than any of my former publications; and if so, the above saying is farther confirmed. A freeman must have a little soul indeed, whose attention can be diverted from its proper object, by the schemes practised by the friends of unlimited dominion. His own happiness, as being connected with the happiness of his fellow-men, ought to be his chiefest good. The divine founder of our religion and his beatified followers had no aim but this, and they pursued it with a zeal consistent with its excellence.

If the proposed plan be a good one upon the whole, why should its friends 3.9.74 endeavour to prevent investigating its merits or defects? Why should they hurry it on us before we have even read it? Does not this look suspicious like? Is it not a proof that it is the works of darkness, and cannot bear the light? Why should they summon a Convention in Pennsylvania, before the tenth part of the people had time to judge for themselves, or to know whether it was a free or a tyrannical system of government? Why employ bullies to drag some members of the Assembly per force to the House to make a quorum, in order to call a Convention?[32] The answers of these interrogatives are obvious, and the conclusions deduced from them will in time have their proper effect.

The principles of its framers are now clearly understood; the proceedings 3.9.75 of the dark conclave have undergone an ordeal in Maryland, that exhibits the monarchy-men in convention as a set of the basest conspirators that ever disgraced a free country.[33] At the time that these men were plotting the ruin of their country, and forming a system of national cruelty unequalled in the annals of time, the unsuspecting freemen of America were blessing them, were praying for them in their private families, and in their public churches, and looking up to them for relief; they even called the federal convention an august body, the most excellent assembly of men that ever appeared in the world.

The President-general, who is to be our king after this government is 3.9.76 established, is vested with powers exceeding those of the most despotic monarch we know of in modern times. What a handsome return have these men made to the people of America for their confidence! Through the misconduct of these bold conspirators we have lost the most glorious opportunity that any country ever had to establish a free system of government. America under one purely democratical, would be rendered the happiest and most powerful nation in the universe; but under the proposed one, composed of an elective king and a standing army, officered by his sycophants, the starvelings of the Cincinnati, and an aristocratical Congress of the well-born, an iota of happiness, freedom or national strength cannot exist. What a pitiful figure will these ungrateful men make in history; who, for the hopes of obtaining some lucrative employment, or of receiving a little more homage from the rest of their fellow creatures, framed a system of oppression that must involve in its consequences the misery of their own offspring? There is but one rational way remaining to prevent themselves from being eye witnesses of a dreadful scene, and that is for them to cease immediately every operation that respects the establishing of this plan of government; and then all parties will join heartily in calling another federal convention, and the peace of the country will be preserved.

3.9.77 One of the members of the virtuous minority of the convention of Massachusetts openly declared in that assembly, that pushing on this accursed system would produce a civil war:[34] the freemen of New-England, the best soldiers on the continent, have had their eyes opened, and begin to see through the conspiracy; that sacred palladium of liberty, the freedom of the press, has dispelled the cloud, and cleared their understandings. In that state, through the influence of the tyrants of Boston, very little information has reached the people; the press, generally speaking, was devoted to the well-born and their tools; yet out of near 400 members, of which that convention consisted, only a majority of 19 could be procured, notwithstanding every possible method of overawing, threatening and bribing was practised.

3.9.78 I conceive that carrying it by so small a majority, is little better than a rejection; in fact it may prove worse, for the breach is only widened so much the more by it, and truly it was wide enough before. The freemen of Massachusetts will never cowardly surrender their sacred rights and liberties into the hands of one man, or any body of men whatever. They know what freedom is, and they will support it at the risque of their lives and fortunes. Their courage, fortitude, and achievements in the late war have rendered their character, as friends to liberty, immortal.

3.9.79 The amendments proposed by the president will be another source of mischief; the people cannot be so ignorant as to be deceived by so pitiful a manoeuvre. Here is a positive acknowledgement made by one of its advocates, who hopes to be appointed the little king if not the big one, that it is objectionable; and his amendments are introduced as a blind; the weighty ones are untouched: not a whimper of the extraordinary powers of the President-general, the standing army, the liberty of the press, &c. No, no! if these glorious parts be lopped off, what would become of the monarchymen? And respecting internal taxation, is not his amendment a disgrace to himself, and an insult to the understanding of the people? Mr. Hancock knows, or ought to know at least, that the liberties of the citizens of America are not to be trifled with: his schemes are too flimsey not to be seen through.

3.9.80 The allegiance of freemen to government will ever be a consequence of protection; the Congress of America withdrew their allegiance from the king of Great Britain when he changed his protection into acts of cruelty; and on the same account the citizens of these United States will not chearfully bear allegiance to the new government; which, instead of protecting them in their sacred rights and privileges, will be a system of tyranny and oppression. The unlimited powers of the new Congress in respect to taxation, are abundantly sufficient to alarm the people. While the state assemblies retained the right of internal taxation, the country farmers could not be burdened beyond their abilities; these men being the true representatives of the people, would never attempt to levy an oppressive tax; their own feelings and interests being congenial with those of their constituents, their consent must be withheld when a measure was proposed subversive of public good.

3.9.81 That the new Congress will not be the immediate representatives of the people, that their number is too small, their powers too great, their accountability to the people not properly secured, and above all the executive dangerously placed in the hands of one man, who is really a king, have been fully illustrated by many able writers, and ably proved in the conventions of this state and Massachusetts by worthy patriots whose names will be revered as long as time shall remain. Upon the whole, my fellow citizens, if the great characters, who are said to advocate this system of government, wish to act consistently, the greatest proof they can give of their love for their country, is to join the rest of their fellow citizens in endeavouring to call another federal convention.

XI

My Fellow Citizens,

3.9.82 Every day opens a new scene of the baseness of the conspirators, their intentions of screening themselves from rendering an account of the public money so fraudulently detained, will rank them among the meanest traitors, that ever dishonoured the human character.[35] How must their consciences condemn them, when avarice and lust of dominion are suffered for a moment to subside, and reason and reflection take their place? Let these men but cooly consider the misery that must inevitably befal millions of their countrymen, in consequence of their treachery in framing this system of fraud and oppression; and remorse and deep anguish of soul must await them! Humanity brings a tear of sympathetic pity from the eye of their fellow men, whose ruin they had secretly projected. As our holy religion expressly enjoins it as a duty, not to return evil for evil, but to overcome evil with good; consequently our resentment against these ungrateful men should be moderated by christian charity: Yet as freemen and citizens, determined to hand down to posterity sacred liberty unimpaired, we are solemnly bound, at the hazard of our fortunes and lives, to oppose this base attempt of theirs to enslave our country.

3.9.83 If on the broad basis of equity and justice, crimes and punishments have their proper proportion: What punishment then, on the scale of moderation, could counterpoise, or atone, for a crime so aggravated as that charged to the majority of the members of the late federal convention? I assert roundly, that another assembly of men never met in this, or any other country, possessing so fully the confidence of so many freemen: and to their shame be it said, they abused this confidence; their own private interest, private emolument, and hopes of dominion, overcame every consideration of duty, honor, and gratitude.

3.9.84 The citizens of Pennsylvania have nobly shown their love for liberty, and attachment to the true interests of the union, by their generous exertions in favor of public credit. They have rigidly fulfilled their engagements in regard to the general debt; the requisitions of Congress have been strictly attended to, and fully answered. Add to this, that we have sunk a considerable part of the domestic debt, and in fact assumed a larger portion of it than in justice belonged to us. These spirited exertions, while they contributed to the general welfare of the union, and raised the reputation of the state, did not fail however to distress our farmers and every other class and description of citizens, very sensibly indeed.

3.9.85 But what is the result of their unshaken loyalty to the cause of liberty, and the honor of their country? What recompence will the honest and industrious Pennsylvanians receive for their patriotism, if the new government be established? Such a return as perhaps history does not afford a single instance similar to. So base a violation of public justice and plighted faith, is certainly a novelty in politics, and begins a new epoch in history. Pennsylvania, instead of receiving credit for the immense sums she has paid into the general treasury, will be placed on a footing with the most delinquent state in the union; and which is highly probable she and all the other states will be taxed hereafter in an exact ratio of the sums they have hitherto raised. Consequently our former acts of generosity, in support of public faith, is to terminate in a two-fold loss to our citizens. In the first place we have nearly ruined ourselves already, through our punctuality in paying our quota of the public debt; and secondly, to complete the scene, our future quotas of continental revenue will be apportioned to the exertions we have heretofore made: That is in plain terms, Pennsylvania will be much worse under this cruel system of tyranny in consequence of her fidelity and honor, than she would have been had she never attempted to pay a shilling of public debt; or if she be not worse, the uniformity of internal taxation through the union, which is expressly stipulated by the constitution, necessarily places her citizens on a parallel with those of that state which has not paid a shilling of public debt since the peace.

The people of the delinquent states might inconsiderately be induced to triumph in the new system of government; for they may conclude, now our public debts are paid as far forward as those of any other state, but attentive consideration will soon convince them of their mistake. Although the new constitution advances them as high in the public scale as if they had strictly and honorably made good the requisitions of the old Congress: yet the unbounded powers of the new Congress in respect to internal taxation, must eventually fleece them of their all; and from their inability heretofore to pay their just quotas as levied by Congress, we may rationally conclude, that, even the states of Pennsylvania and New-York, which are in advance at present, will still be above them, supposing the extra payments of these two states not to be carried to the credit of their account, which they certainly will not, on the principles of this constitution. 3.9.86

The truth of this matter is simply this; the taxes will hereafter be uniform in all the states, and as oppressive as tyranny can make them. In every state the face of the poor must be ground to dust; and where any appearance of prosperity or wealth is observed, an additional tax will be devised; for so complicated and uncontrouled a government, will find ways and means to apply all the revenue that America can raise; indeed the whole produce of the lands cultivated by three millions and an half of people, could not satiate the desires of such a government. If the lesser, or rather weaker states would moderate their precipitancy, in urging forward the constitution, by reason and the certainty of misery that stares them in the face, I imagine they would find their advantage in the measure. Lenity in the old Congress has in some degree screened them; and besides their fellow citizens in the other states befriend them; but the high hand of power, so completely vested in the new Congress, will exact the uttermost farthing, both from the states and individuals: No excuse will satisfy the demands of a cruel excise-man; we must instantly pay the federal tax, or have our property seized, and ourselves dragged to prison by a federal soldier. 3.9.87

That this government, should it be ratified by nine states, will not possess the confidence of the majority of the people, is a truth incontrovertible. I admit, that through fraud and surprise, many have inconsiderately joined themselves to its deceptive standard; but their number is diminishing rapidly; and I sincerely believe, that in a few months the office-hunters, the well born, and their sycophants, will be left alone: The farmer, the mechanic, and even the merchant, would be ruined if it took effect; their interest is to oppose it, and to endeavor to have another convention called immediately. 3.9.88

Who is so dimsighted as to suppose that a constitution so essentially differing from the principles of the revolution, and from freedom, and opposed by so respectable a body of freemen, could be established in America; or if it were possible by force or surprise to put it in motion, could it exist 3.9.89

any space of time? Nay, the idea is futile, and common sense spurns at it. While it would exist, it must be by the power of a standing army alone; but its warmest advocates know, that all their credit, and influence could not support a standing army, equal to the business, six months.

3.9.90 It is admitted, that in Great Britain they are scarce ever without violent factions and parties, and yet no injury is apprehended to the country on that account, but generally much good: But let us attend to this matter seriously, and we must see clearly that factions and parties in America in respect to the present important object, would eventually ruin this country. The parties, factions, and cabals, so frequent in Britain, are not from a dislike to the fundamentals of their constitution, but on account of mal-administration: All parties glory in the constitution, and disagree only, when it is infringed, or violated.

3.9.91 To infer then, from the example of Britain, that the opposition to the new government would not terminate in our ruin, if it were adopted by a majority in nine states, would be a dangerous mistake; for there is no analogy between the premises, the conclusions are therefore different. The opposition in America is against the fundamentals of the constitution itself; but this is not so in England. No constitution that is not popular can possibly be established in America; or if for a short time it were established, we would have nothing but anarchy and civil war, while it was in existence.

3.9.92 Let us not be deceived by delusive tales, that it shall be amended after the meeting of the first Congress; since it is admitted almost universally that it wants amendments; now is the time to have them done, while we are at peace abroad, and among ourselves. A fragment of liberty cannot remain, if we once set it in motion in its imperfect state. How can we suppose, that the president general, being once in full possession of his unlimited powers, would deliver them back again to the people; the supposition is preposterous; he must be more than man if he would; a more dangerous king is not in the world than he will be; liberty will be lost in America the day on which he is proclaimed, and must be recovered by the sword, if ever we are to enjoy it again.

Philadelphiensis, (No. XI.)

XII

My Fellow Citizens,

3.9.93 The essays under the signature of Philadelphiensis are represented as without argument, and their prime object is said to be to involve this devoted country in a civil war.[36] But time, the discoverer of future events, will certainly shew that the calling another Federal Convention is the only rational way to prevent it. Heaven grant that these eyes may never behold that dreadful scene. The writer of these essays was actuated by the purest motives, namely, to defend the liberty and advance the happiness of his fellow-citizens. These he conceived insecure, or rather destroyed, if the proposed constitution should be established, and hence he labored to procure another Convention. The expediency of this measure was demonstrated by illustrating the principal defects in the proposed system;—defects did I say—the expression is too soft—the ruin that must follow its adoption.

If pointing out the unlimited powers of the new Congress over the lives and property of their fellow citizens, which may and certainly would be abused, be not an argument against it, there remains no fixed determinate idea to be annexed to the term argument; indeed, on such principles right and wrong, freedom and slavery have no essential difference, and the human mind is a mere chaos. 3·9·94

Some feeble attempts have been made by the advocates of this system of tyranny, to answer the objections made to the smallness of the number of representatives and senators, and the improper powers delegated to them; but, as far as I recollect, no one has been found bold enough to stand forth in defence of that dangerous and uncontrouled officer, the President General, or more properly, our new KING. 3·9·95

A few pieces under the signature of An American Citizen were published immediately after the Constitution broke the shell, and the hydra made its way from the dark conclave into the open light; in the first number of which the writer, in touching on the President, endeavored to conceal his immense powers, by representing the King of Great-Britain as possessed of many hereditary prerogatives, rights and powers that he was not possessed of; that is, he shews what he is not, but neglects to shew what he really is; but so flimsey a palliative could scarcely escape the censure of the most ignorant advocate for such an officer; and since we hear of no further attempts to prove the necessity of a King being set over the freemen of America.[37] 3·9·96

The writer of these essays has clearly proven, that the president is a King to all intents and purposes, and at the same time one of the most dangerous kind too—an elective King, the commander in chief of a standing army, &c. and to these add, that he has a negative over the proceedings of both branches of the legislature: and to complete his uncontrouled sway, he is neither restrained nor assisted by a privy council, which is a novelty in government. I challenge the politicians of the whole continent to find in any period of history a monarch more absolute. 3·9·97

Who is so base as not to burn with resentment against the conspirators, who have dared to establish such a tyrant over his life, his liberty and property? Is the flame of sacred liberty so entirely extinguished in the American breast as not to be kindled again? No; you mistaken despots, do 3·9·98 not let such a preposterous thought madden you into perseverance, lest your persons fall sacrifices to the resentment of an injured country. Stop at once, and join the rest of your fellow citizens. Let another Convention be immediately called, and let a system of government fitted to the pure principles of the Revolution, be framed. Then a general amnesty among all ranks and degrees of your fellow citizens must succeed, and America become the seat of liberty, peace, friendship and happiness; and her government have ample energy and respectability among the nations of the earth; yea, she will thereby be rendered the great arbiter of the world.

1. A Pennsylvania Mechanic's reasons for this proposal appear in the portion of his brief essay just preceding that quoted by Philadelphiensis:

"The friends of the new system are not ashamed to show their principles, and their writings, on the subject, while its enemies take every prudent measure to prevent detection.

"I know a gentleman in this city, high in office, who has written much against the new system, not withstanding he has never, in company, uttered a syllable against it. Hence I conclude that the small anti-federal junto are conscious of the wickedness of their proceedings—that their cause is that of the devil—and of it they are truly ashamed. It appears by a late eastern paper . . .[etc.]." For a similar controversy, see [Maryland]Farmer I, 5.1.1 n. 2.

2. The Independent Gazetteer reads "right in part," but the Freeman's Journal version, given here, is correct. With this correction Galba's statement is given accurately and in full.

3. The Independent Gazetteer reads "and that," but the Freeman's Journal version, given here, is doubtless correct.

The claim was based on a list drawn up by John Mercer, who, however, claimed that the list contained the names of nationalists, not monarchists. While Henry found the Constitution defective in that "it squints toward monarchy," he allowed that "if you cannot love a Republican Government, you may love the British monarchy. . . ." (5.16.7, 14).

Essay by Alfred

(PHILADELPHIA) INDEPENDENT GAZETTEER
13 December 1787

"Alfred" argues that America, being free and prosperous, should not give up her excellent state constitutions and substitute a vast empire. The present grievances stem from a want of money and of virtue, and the remedy is to be found in greater independence of foreign trade and in frugal public administration rather than in dangerous political changes. The author is unknown.

To the real Patriots of America.

The history of mankind teacheth us how sudden and easy the transition is 3.10.1
from liberty to a state of slavery. The Romans, the bravest people the world ever saw, after all their struggles and contentions, found themselves under the absolute direction of a Nero, a Caligula, a Tiberius, and a Domitian.

Governments, as they are the workmanship of man, so they partake of the changeableness of his nature; but the changes which happen, have been more frequently from liberty to slavery, than from slavery to liberty. When once a community are fast bound in chains and in misery, there must be great efforts, and the effusion of much blood, to liberate them from their wretched condition.

America is now free—she now enjoys a greater portion of political liberty 3.10.2
than any other country under heaven. How long she may continue so, depends entirely upon her own caution and wisdom. If she would look to herself more, and to Europe less, I am persuaded, it would tend to promote her felicity. She possesses all the advantages which characterize a rich country:—rich within herself, she ought less to regard the politics, the manufactures, and the interests of distant nations.

When I look to our situation, climate, extent, soil, and its productions, 3.10.3
rivers and ports; when I find I can at this time purchase grain, bread, meat, and other necessaries of life, at as reasonable a rate as in any country; when I see we are sending great quantities of tobacco, wheat and flour to England and other parts of the globe, beyond the Atlantic; when I get on the other side of the western mountains, and see an extensive country, which, for its multitude of rivers and fertility of soil, is equal, if not superior, to any other whatever; when I see these things, I cannot be brought to believe that America is in that deplorable, ruined condition which some designing politicians represent; or that we are in a state of anarchy beyond redemption, unless we adopt, without any addition or amendment, the new constitution proposed by the late Convention; a constitution which, in my humble opinion, contains the seeds and scions of slavery and despotism.

3.10.4 When the volume of American constitutions first made its appearance in Europe, we find some of the most eminent political writers of the present age, and the reviewers of literature, full of admiration, and declaring they had never before seen so much good sense, freedom, and real wisdom in one publication. Our good friend Doctor Price was charmed, and almost prophesied the near approach of the happy days of the millennium.[1] We have lived under these constitutions; and, after the experience of a few years, some among us are ready to trample them under their feet, though they have been esteemed, even by our enemies, as "pearls of great price."

3.10.5 Let us not, ye lovers of freedom, be rash and hasty—Perhaps the real evils we labor under, do not arise from these systems—There may be many other causes, to which our misfortunes may be properly attributed—Read the American constitutions, and you will find our essential rights and privileges well guarded and secured. May not our manners be the source of our national evils? May not our attachment to foreign trade increase them? Have we not acted imprudently in exporting almost all our gold and silver for foreign luxuries? It is now acknowledged that we have not a sufficient quantity of the precious metals to answer the various purposes of government and commerce; and without a breach of charity, it may be said that this deficiency arises from the want of public virtue, in prefering private interest to every other consideration.

3.10.6 If the states had in any tolerable degree been able to answer the requisitions of Congress; if the continental treasury had been so far assisted, as to have enabled us to pay the interest of our foreign debt, possibly we should have heard little, very little about a new system of government. It is a just observation that in modern times, money does every thing. If a government can command this unum necessarium from a certain revenue, it may be considered as wealthy and respectable; if not, it will lose its dignity, become inefficient and contemptible. But cannot we regulate our finances, and lay the foundations for a permanent, certain revenue, without undoing all that we have done, without making an entire new government? The most wise and philosophic characters have bestowed on our old systems the highest encomiums. Are we sure this new political phenomenon will not fail? If it should fail, is there not a great probability, that our last state will be worse than the first? Orators may declaim on the badness of the times as long as they please, but I must tell them that the want of public virtue, and the want of money, are two of the principal sources of our grievances; and if we are under the pressure of these wants, it ought to teach us frugality—to adopt a frugal administration of public affairs.

It has been said that the civil list expences of the several states, have 3.10.7
enormously exceeded what they formerly were prior to the late revolution. Will the new system, which really comprehends an imperium in imperiis, be administered at a less expence, than we now experience? Can we create new offices without an accumulation of expences? Shall we enjoy a greater degree of political freedom and happiness under the proposed plan? If these and other advantages are not quite evident, we ought to be extremely cautious, how we change our condition. Systems may be very specious in theory; but fail us in practice. Government is a science which consists more in experience than in notional knowledge. What will suit the different manners, habits, and interests, of a wide extended country like America, can only be known by an experiment; and if that should fail, our liberties might fail with it. Cannot we be a number of confederated states, confederated for the purpose of defence and commerce, without erecting a fabric, more like an empire, than a republic? Empires are considered as despotic, and is there no danger of despotism in the establishment of one so great and complicated as the American will be?

Most liberal authors would dissuade us from so great and dangerous an 3.10.8
experiment.—I shall conclude at present, with a quotation from* one of them; "Vast empires are in many respects unnatural: but particularly in this, that be they ever so well constituted, the affairs of the many must, in such governments, turn upon a few; and the relation be less sensible, and in a manner lost between the magistrate and the people, in a body so unwieldy in its limbs, and whose members lie so remote from one another, and distant from the head. 'Tis in such bodies as these that strong factions are aptest to engender. The associating spirits, for want of exercise, form new movements, and seek a narrower sphere of activity, when they want action in a greater. Thus we have wheels within wheels, and in some national constitutions, notwithstanding the absurdity in politics, we have one empire within another."[3]

See the edition of John M. Robertson (Gloucester, Mass., 1963) I, 76.

3. James Madison, in The Federalist no. 10, turns Shaftesbury's argument on its head, finding the salvation of the free state precisely in the associating tendencies that Shaftesbury goes on to describe here. The "associating genius," which Shaftesbury sees forming societies "in opposition to the general one of mankind, and to the real interest of the State," Madison sees as the engine of those freedom-preserving "wheels within wheels" that are one of the great advantages of the extended republic. See Agrippa IV, 4.6.16 n. 10. Shaftesbury agrees with Madison, however—as do some of the Anti-Federalists, e.g., Agrippa—that selfishness is a force for moderation. "[O]f all characters, the thorough selfish one is the least forward in taking party. The men of this sort are, in this respect, true men of moderation. They are secure of their temper, and possess themselves too well to be in danger of entering warmly into any cause, or into engaging deeply with any side or faction." Characteristics I, 76.

The Address and Reasons of Dissent of the Minority of the Convention of Pennsylvania To Their Constituents

PENNSYLVANIA PACKET AND DAILY ADVERTISER
18 December 1787

Failing in its attempt to secure the pages of the official journal to spread its views (a not uncommon practice in faction-torn Pennsylvania) the minority of the state ratifying convention published its Address and Reasons of Dissent in the Pennsylvania Packet and Daily Advertiser. The Address was frequently reprinted and commented on by both Federalist and Anti-Federalist writers.[1] The author was probably Samuel Bryan, even though he was not a member of the convention.[2]

The Address consists of three parts: (1) a description of events leading up to and concluding the Pennsylvania ratifying convention (3.11.1–2); (2) a list of proposed amendments, many of which found their way into the Bill of Rights (3.11.12–15); and (3) the three general grounds of dissent—(a) that an extensive territory cannot be governed on the principles of freedom, except as a confederation of republics (3.11.16–17), (b) that the government under the Constitution will not be a confederation but a consolidation founded on a destruction of the states (3.11.18–30), (c) that the Constitution is defective (3.11.30–56) in its failure to provide (i) a bill of rights, (ii) adequate representation, (iii) the traditional safeguards of the common law, (iv) a due separation of powers, (v) protection against excessive and tyrannical taxation, and (vi) adequate representation for Pennsylvania. For all of these reasons the government will not possess the confidence of the people and will have to rely on a standing army and a strictly controlled militia, leading to the suppression of individual liberty as well as to great expense.

1. For Centinel's complaint that the distribution of the Address was hampered by unfriendly postal arrangements, see Centinel XVIII, 2.7.182 n. 96. See the essays of A Freeman, addressed to the Minority of the Pennsylvania Convention, published in the Pennsylvania Gazette 23 January, 30 January, and 6 February 1788. These were, in turn, replied to by [Pennsylvania] Farmer, whose essay is printed below, 3.14. Noah Webster replied in a forceful and interesting essay, published under the pseudonym "America" in the New York Daily Advertiser 31 December 1787, and reprinted in his Collection of Essays (Boston 1790). McMaster and Stone print some of the responses, beginning at p. 483, including Francis Hopkinson's Federalist parable, "The New Roof" (pp. 510–16), which appeared in the Pennsylvania Packet 29 December 1787.

The attribution is strengthened by several striking similarities between passages in the Address of the Pennsylvania Convention minority, and in the Centinel letters, although of course one author might, under the circumstances, very well have drawn on another. 3.11.1 It was not until after the termination of the late glorious contest, which made the people of the United States, an independent nation, that any defect was discovered in the present confederation. It was formed by some of the ablest patriots in America. It carried us successfully through the war; and the virtue and patriotism of the people, with their disposition to promote the common cause, supplied the want of power in Congress.

3.11.2 The requisition of Congress for the five per cent. impost was made before the peace, so early as the first of February, 1781, but was prevented taking effect by the refusal of one state; yet it is probable every state in the union would have agreed to this measure at that period, had it not been for the extravagant terms in which it was demanded. The requisition was new moulded in the year 1783, and accompanied with an additional demand of certain supplementary funds for 25 years. Peace had now taken place, and the United States found themselves labouring under a considerable foreign and domestic debt, incurred during the war. The requisition of 1783 was commensurate with the interest of the debt, as it was then calculated; but it has been more accurately ascertained since that time. The domestic debt has been found to fall several millions of dollars short of the calculation, and it has lately been considerably diminished by large sales of the western lands. The states have been called on by Congress annually for supplies until the general system of finance proposed in 1783 should take place.

3.11.3 It was at this time that the want of an efficient federal government was first complained of, and that the powers vested in Congress were found to be inadequate to the procuring of the benefits that should result from the union. The impost was granted by most of the states, but many refused the supplementary funds; the annual requisitions were set at nought by some of the states, while others complied with them by legislative acts, but were tardy in their payments, and Congress found themselves incapable of complying with their engagements, and supporting the federal government. It was found that our national character was sinking in the opinion of foreign nations. The Congress could make treaties of commerce, but could not enforce the observance of them. We were suffering from the restrictions of foreign nations, who had shackled our commerce, while we were unable to retaliate: and all now agreed that it would be advantageous to the union to enlarge the powers of Congress; that they should be enabled in the amplest manner to regulate commerce, and to lay and collect duties on the imports throughout the United States. With this view a convention was first proposed by Virginia, and finally recommended by Congress for the different states to appoint deputies to meet in convention, "for the purposes of revising and amending the present articles of confederation, so as to make them adequate to the exigencies of the union." This recommendation the legislatures of twelve states complied with so hastily as not to consult their constituents on the subject; and though the different legislatures had no authority from their constituents for the purpose, they probably apprehended the necessity would justify the measure; and none of them extended their ideas at that time further than "revising and amending the present articles of confederation." Pennsylvania by the act appointing deputies expressly confined their powers to this object; and though it is probable that some of the members of the assembly of this state had at that time in contemplation to annihilate the present confederation, as well as the constitution of Pennsylvania, yet the plan was not sufficiently matured to communicate it to the public.

3.11.4 The majority of the legislature of this commonwealth, were at that time under the influence of the members from the city of Philadelphia. They agreed that the deputies sent by them to convention should have no compensation for their services, which determination was calculated to prevent the election of any member who resided at a distance from the city. It was in vain for the minority to attempt electing delegates to the convention, who understood the circumstances, and the feelings of the people, and had a common interest with them. They found a disposition in the leaders of the majority of the house to chuse themselves and some of their dependants. The minority attempted to prevent this by agreeing to vote for some of the leading members, who they knew had influence enough to be appointed at any rate, in hopes of carrying with them some respectable citizens of Philadelphia, in whose principles and integrity they could have more confidence; but even in this they were disappointed, except in one member: the eighth member was added at a subsequent session of the assembly.[1]

3.11.5 The Continental convention met in the city of Philadelphia at the time appointed. It was composed of some men of excellent characters; of others who were more remarkable for their ambition and cunning, than their patriotism; and of some who had been opponents to the independence of the United States. The delegates from Pennsylvania were, six of them, uniform and decided opponents to the constitution of this commonwealth. The convention sat upwards of four months. The doors were kept shut, and the members brought under the most solemn engagements of secrecy.* Some of those who opposed their going so far beyond their powers, retired, hopeless, from the convention, others had the firmness to refuse signing the plan altogether; and many who did sign it, did it not as a system they wholly approved, but as the best that could be then obtained, and notwithstanding the time spent on this subject, it is agreed on all hands to be a work of haste and accommodation.

3.11.6 Whilst the gilded chains were forging in the secret conclave, the meaner instruments of despotism without, were busily employed in alarming the fears of the people with dangers which did not exist, and exciting their hopes of greater advantages from the expected plan than even the best government on earth could produce.

3.11.7 The proposed plan had not many hours issued forth from the womb of suspicious secrecy, until such as were prepared for the purpose, were carrying about petitions for people to sign, signifying their approbation of the system, and requesting the legislature to call a convention. While every measure was taken to intimidate the people against opposing it, the public papers teemed with the most violent threats against those who should dare to think for themselves, and tar and feathers were liberally promised to all those who would not immediately join in supporting the proposed government be it what it would. Under such circumstances petitions in favour of calling a convention were signed by great numbers in and about the city, before they had leisure to read and examine the system, many of whom, now they are better acquainted with it, and have had time to investigate its principles, are heartily opposed to it. The petitions were speedily handed into the legislature.

3.11.8 Affairs were in this situation when on the 28th of September last a resolution was proposed to the assembly by a member of the house who had been also a member of the federal convention, for calling a state convention, to be elected within ten days for the purpose of examining and adopting the proposed constitution of the United States, though at this time the house had not received it from Congress. This attempt was opposed by a minority, who after offering every argument in their power to prevent the precipitate measure, without effect, absented themselves from the house as the only alternative left them, to prevent the measure taking place previous to their constituents being acquainted with the business—That violence and outrage which had been so often threatened was now practised; some of the members were seized the next day by a mob collected for the purpose, and forcibly dragged to the house, and there detained by force whilst the quorum of the legislature, so formed, compleated their resolution. We shall dwell no longer on this subject, the people of Pennsylvania have been already acquainted therewith.[2] We would only further observe that every member of the legislature, previously to taking his seat, by solemn oath or affirmation, declares, "that he will not do or consent to any act or thing whatever that shall have a tendency to lessen or abridge their rights and privileges, as declared in the constitution of this state." And that constitution which they are so solemnly sworn to support cannot legally be altered but by a recommendation of a council of censors, who alone are authorised to propose alterations and amendments, and even these must be published at least six months, for the consideration of the people.[3]—The proposed system of government for the United States, if adopted, will alter and may annihilate the constitution of Pennsylvania; and therefore the legislature had no authority whatever to recommend the calling a convention for that purpose. This proceeding could not be considered as binding on the people of this commonwealth. The house was formed by violence, some of the members composing it were detained there by force, which alone would have vitiated any proceedings, to which they were otherwise competent; but had the legislature been legally formed, this business was absolutely without their power.[4]

In this situation of affairs were the subscribers elected members of the convention of Pennsylvania. A convention called by a legislature in direct violation of their duty, and composed in part of members, who were compelled to attend for that purpose, to consider of a constitution proposed by a convention of the United States, who were not appointed for the purpose of framing a new form of government, but whose powers were expressly confined to altering and amending the present articles of confederation.—Therefore the members of the continental convention in proposing the plan acted as individuals, and not as deputies from Pennsylvania.* The assembly who called the state convention acted as individuals, and not as the legislature of Pennsylvania; nor could they or the convention chosen on their recommendation have authority to do any act or thing, that can alter or annihilate the constitution of Pennsylvania (both of which will be done by the new constitution) nor are their proceedings in our opinion, at all binding on the people. 3.11.9

The election for members of the convention was held at so early a period and the want of information was so great, that some of us did not know of it until after it was over, and we have reason to believe that great numbers of the people of Pennsylvania have not yet had an opportunity of sufficiently 3.11.10

*The continental convention in direct violation of the 13th article of the confederation, have declared, "that the ratification of nine states shall be sufficient for the establishment of this constitution, between the states so ratifying the same."—Thus has the plighted faith of the states been sported with! They had solemnly engaged that the confederation now subsisting should be inviolably preserved by each of them, and the union thereby formed, should be perpetual, unless the same should be altered by mutual consent.

examining the proposed constitution.—We apprehend that no change can take place that will affect the internal government or constitution of this commonwealth, unless a majority of the people should evidence a wish for such a change; but on examining the number of votes given for members of the present state convention, we find that of upwards of seventy thousand freemen who are intitled to vote in Pennsylvania, the whole convention has been elected by about thirteen thousand voters, and though two thirds of the members of the convention have thought proper to ratify the proposed constitution, yet those two thirds were elected by the votes of only six thousand and eight hundred freemen.

3.11.11 In the city of Philadelphia and some of the eastern counties, the junto that took the lead in the business agreed to vote for none but such as would solemnly promise to adopt the system in toto, without exercising their judgment. In many of the counties the people did not attend the elections as they had not an opportunity of judging of the plan. Others did not consider themselves bound by the call of a set of men who assembled at the state-house in Philadelphia, and assumed the name of the legislature of Pennsylvania; and some were prevented from voting by the violence of the party who were determined at all events to force down the measure. To such lengths did the tools of despotism carry their outrage, that in the night of the election for members of convention, in the city of Philadelphia, several of the subscribers (being then in the city to transact your business) were grossly abused, ill-treated and insulted while they were quiet in their lodgings, though they did not interfere, nor had any thing to do with the said election, but as they apprehend, because they were supposed to be adverse to the proposed constitution, and would not tamely surrender those sacred rights, which you had committed to their charge.

3.11.12 The convention met, and the same disposition was soon manifested in considering the proposed constitution, that had been exhibited in every other stage of the business. We were prohibited by an express vote of the convention, from taking any question on the separate articles of the plan, and reduced to the necessity of adopting or rejecting in toto.—'Tis true the majority permitted us to debate on each article, but restrained us from proposing amendments.—They also determined not to permit us to enter on the minutes our reasons of dissent against any of the articles, nor even on the final question our reasons of dissent against the whole. Thus situated we entered on the examination of the proposed system of government, and found it to be such as we could not adopt, without, as we conceived, surrendering up your dearest rights. We offered our objections to the convention, and opposed those parts of the plan, which, in our opinion, would be injurious to you, in the best manner we were able; and closed our arguments by offering the following propositions to the convention.

3.11.13 1. The right of conscience shall be held inviolable; and neither the legislative, executive nor judicial powers of the United States shall have authority to alter, abrogate, or infringe any part of the constitution of the several states, which provide for the preservation of liberty in matters of religion.

2. That in controversies respecting property, and in suits between man and man, trial by jury shall remain as heretofore, as well in the federal courts, as in those of the several states.[5]

3. That in all capital and criminal prosecutions, a man has a right to demand the cause and nature of his accusation, as well in the federal courts, as in those of the several states; to be heard by himself and his counsel; to be confronted with the accusers and witnesses; to call for evidence in his favor, and a speedy trial by an impartial jury of his vicinage, without whose unanimous consent, he cannot be found guilty, nor can he be compelled to give evidence against himself; and that no man be deprived of his liberty, except by the law of the land or the judgment of his peers.

4. That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel nor unusual punishments inflicted.

5. That warrants unsupported by evidence, whereby any officer or messenger may be commanded or required to search suspected places, or to seize any person or persons, his or their property, not particularly described, are grievous and oppressive, and shall not be granted either by the magistrates of the federal government or others.

6. That the people have a right to the freedom of speech, of writing and publishing their sentiments, therefore, the freedom of the press shall not be restrained by any law of the United States.[6]

7. That the people have a right to bear arms for the defence of themselves and their own state, or the United States, or for the purpose of killing game; and no law shall be passed for disarming the people or any of them, unless for crimes committed, or real danger of public injury from individuals; and as standing armies in the time of peace are dangerous to liberty, they ought not to be kept up: and that the military shall be kept under strict subordination to and be governed by the civil powers.

8. The inhabitants of the several states shall have liberty to fowl and hunt in seasonable times, on the lands they hold, and on all other lands in the United States not inclosed, and in like manner to fish in all navigable waters, and others not private property, without being restrained therein by any laws to be passed by the legislature of the United States.[7]

9. That no law shall be passed to restrain the legislatures of the several states from enacting laws for imposing taxes, except imposts and duties on goods imported or exported, and that no taxes, except imposts and duties upon goods imported and exported, and postage on letters shall be levied by the authority of Congress.

10. That the house of representatives be properly increased in number; that elections shall remain free; that the several states shall have power to regulate the elections for senators and representatives, without being controuled either directly or indirectly by any interference on the part of the Congress; and that elections of representatives be annual.

11. That the power of organizing, arming and disciplining the militia (the manner of disciplining the militia to be prescribed by Congress) remain with the individual states, and that Congress shall not have authority to call or march any of the militia out of their own state, without the consent of such state, and for such length of time only as such state shall agree.

That the sovereignty, freedom and independency of the several states shall be retained, and every power, jurisdiction and right which is not by this constitution expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled.

12. That the legislative, executive, and judicial powers be kept separate; and to this end that a constitutional council be appointed, to advise and assist the president, who shall be responsible for the advice they give, hereby the senators would be relieved from almost constant attendance; and also that the judges be made completely independent.

13. That no treaty which shall be directly opposed to the existing laws of the United States in Congress assembled, shall be valid until such laws shall be repealed, or made conformable to such treaty; neither shall any treaties be valid which are in contradiction to the constitution of the United States, or the constitutions of the several states.

14. That the judiciary power of the United States shall be confined to cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls; to cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more states—between a state and citizens of different states—between citizens claiming lands under grants of different states; and between a state or the citizen thereof and foreign states, and in criminal cases, to such only as are expressly enumerated in the constitution, and that the United States in Congress assembled, shall not have power to enact laws, which shall alter the laws of descents and distribution of the effects of deceased persons, the titles of lands or goods, or the regulation of contracts in the individual states.

3.11.14 After reading these propositions, we declared our willingness to agree to the plan, provided it was so amended as to meet these propositions, or something similar to them: and finally moved the convention to adjourn, to give the people of Pennsylvania time to consider the subject, and determine for themselves; but these were all rejected, and the final vote was taken, when our duty to you induced us to vote against the proposed plan, and to decline signing the ratification of the same.

3.11.15 During the discussion we met with many insults, and some personal abuse; we were not even treated with decency, during the sitting of the convention, by the persons in the gallery of the house; however, we flatter ourselves that in contending for the preservation of those invaluable rights you have thought proper to commit to our charge, we acted with a spirit becoming freemen, and being desirous that you might know the principles which actuated our conduct, and being prohibited from inserting our reasons of dissent on the minutes of the convention, we have subjoined them for your consideration, as to you alone we are accountable. It remains with you whether you will think those inestimable privileges, which you have so ably contended for, should be sacrificed at the shrine of despotism, or whether you mean to contend for them with the same spirit that has so often baffled the attempts of an aristocratic faction, to rivet the shackles of slavery on you and your unborn posterity.

3.11.16 We dissent, first, because it is the opinion of the most celebrated writers on government, and confirmed by uniform experience, that a very extensive territory cannot be governed on the principles of freedom, otherwise than by a confederation of republics, possessing all the powers of internal government; but united in the management of their general, and foreign concerns.

3.11.17 If any doubt could have been entertained of the truth of the foregoing principle, it has been fully removed by the concession of Mr. Wilson, one of majority on this question; and who was one of the deputies in the late general convention. In justice to him, we will give his own words; they are as follows, viz.[8] "The extent of country for which the new constitution was required, produced another difficulty in the business of the federal convention. It is the opinion of some celebrated writers, that to a small territory, the democratical; to a middling territory (as Montesquieu has termed it) the monarchial; and to an extensive territory, the despotic form of government is best adapted. Regarding then the wide and almost unbounded jurisdiction of the United States, at first view, the hand of despotism seemed necessary to controul, connect, and protect it; and hence the chief embarrassment rose. For, we know that, altho' our constituents would chearfully submit to the legislative restraints of a free government, they would spurn at every attempt to shackle them with despotic power."—And again in another part of his speech he continues.—"Is it probable that the dissolution of the state governments, and the establishment of one consolidated empire would be eligible in its nature, and satisfactory to the people in its administration? I think not, as I have given reasons to shew that so extensive a territory could not be governed, connected, and preserved, but by the supremacy of despotic power. All the exertions of the most potent emperors of Rome were not capable of keeping that empire together, which in extent was far inferior to the dominion of America."[9]

3.11.18 We dissent, secondly, because the powers vested in Congress by this constitution, must necessarily annihilate and absorb the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of the several states, and produce from their ruins one consolidated government, which from the nature of things will be an iron handed despotism, as nothing short of the supremacy of despotic sway could connect and govern these United States under one government.

3.11.19 As the truth of this position is of such decisive importance, it ought to be fully investigated, and if it is founded to be clearly ascertained; for, should it be demonstrated, that the powers vested by this constitution in Congress, will have such an effect as necessarily to produce one consolidated government, the question then will be reduced to this short issue, viz. whether satiated with the blessings of liberty; whether repenting of the folly of so recently asserting their unalienable rights, against foreign despots at the expence of so much blood and treasure, and such painful and arduous struggles, the people of America are now willing to resign every privilege of freemen, and submit to the dominion of an absolute government, that will embrace all America in one chain of despotism; or whether they will with virtuous indignation, spurn at the shackles prepared for them, and confirm their liberties by a conduct becoming freemen.

3.11.20 That the new government will not be a confederacy of states, as it ought, but one consolidated government, founded upon the destruction of the several governments of the states, we shall now shew.

The powers of Congress under the new constitution, are complete and unlimited over the purse and the sword, and are perfectly independent of, and supreme over, the state governments; whose intervention in these great points is entirely destroyed. By virtue of their power of taxation, Congress may command the whole, or any part of the property of the people. They may impose what imposts upon commerce; they may impose what land taxes, poll taxes, excises, duties on all written instruments, and duties on every other article that they may judge proper; in short, every species of taxation, whether of an external or internal nature is comprised in section the 8th, of article the 1st, viz. "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States."

3.11.21 As there is no one article of taxation reserved to the state governments, the Congress may monopolise every source of revenue, and thus indirectly demolish the state governments, for without funds they could not exist, the taxes, duties and excises imposed by Congress may be so high as to render it impracticable to levy further sums on the same articles; but whether this should be the case or not, if the state governments should presume to impose taxes, duties or excises, on the same articles with Congress, the latter may abrogate and repeal the laws whereby they are imposed, upon the allegation that they interfere with the due collection of their taxes, duties or excises, by virtue of the following clause, part of section 8th, article 1st. viz. "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."[10]

The Congress might gloss over this conduct by construing every purpose for which the state legislatures now lay taxes, to be for the "general welfare," and therefore as of their ju[ris]diction.

And the supremacy of the laws of the United States is established by article 6th, viz. "That this constitution and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby; any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." It has been alledged that the words "pursuant to the constitution," are a restriction upon the authority of Congress;[11] but when it is considered that by other sections they are invested with every efficient power of government, and which may be exercised to the absolute destruction of the state governments, without any violation of even the forms of the constitution, this seeming restriction, as well as every other restriction in it, appears to us to be nugatory and delusive; and only introduced as a blind upon the real nature of the government. In our opinion, "pursuant to the constitution," will be co-extensive with the will and pleasure of Congress, which, indeed, will be the only limitation of their powers. 3.11.22

We apprehend that two co-ordinate sovereignties would be a solecism in politics.[12] That therefore as there is no line of distinction drawn between the general, and state governments; as the sphere of their jurisdiction is undefined, it would be contrary to the nature of things, that both should exist together, one or the other would necessarily triumph in the fullness of dominion. However the contest could not be of long continuance, as the state governments are divested of every means of defence, and will be obliged by "the supreme law of the land" to yield at discretion. 3.11.23

It has been objected to this total destruction of the state governments, that the existence of their legislatures is made essential to the organization of Congress; that they must assemble for the appointment of the senators and president general of the United States.[13] True, the state legislatures may be continued for some years, as boards of appointment, merely, after they are divested of every other function, but the framers of the constitution foreseeing that the people will soon be disgusted with this solemn mockery of a government without power and usefulness, have made a provision for relieving them from the imposition, in section 4th, of article 1st, viz. "The times, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives, shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law make or alter such regulations; except as to the place of chusing senators." 3.11.24

president general, of the senators and of the representatives of the United States, they may prolong their existence in office, for life, by postponing the time of their election and appointment, from period to period, under various pretences, such as an apprehension of invasion, the factious disposition of the people, or any other plausible pretence that the occasion may suggest; and having thus obtained life-estates in the government, they may fill up the vacancies themselves, by their controul over the mode of appointment; with this exception in regard to the senators, that as the place of appointment for them, must, by the constitution, be in the particular state, they may depute some body in the respective states, to fill up the vacancies in the senate, occasioned by death, until they can venture to assume it themselves. In this manner, may the only restriction in this clause be evaded. By virtue of the foregoing section, when the spirit of the people shall be gradually broken; when the general government shall be firmly established, and when a numerous standing army shall render opposition vain, the Congress may compleat the system of despotism, in renouncing all dependance on the people, by continuing themselves, and children in the government.

3.11.26 The celebrated Montesquieu, in his Spirit of Laws, vol. 1, page 12th, says, "That in a democracy there can be no exercise of sovereignty, but by the suffrages of the people, which are their will; now the sovereigns will is the sovereign himself; the laws therefore, which establish the right of suffrage, are fundamental to this government. In fact, it is as important to regulate in a republic in what manner, by whom, and concerning what suffrages are to be given, as it is in a monarchy to know who is the prince, and after what manner he ought to govern."[14] The time, mode and place of the election of representatives, senators and president general of the United States, ought not to be under the controul of Congress, but fundamentally ascertained and established.

3.11.27 The new constitution, consistently with the plan of consolidation, contains no reservation of the rights and privileges of the state governments, which was made in the confederation of the year 1778, by article the 2d, viz. "That each state retains its sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every power, jurisdiction and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled."

The legislative power vested in Congress by the foregoing recited sections, is so unlimited in its nature; may be so comprehensive and boundless [in] its exercise, that this alone would be amply sufficient to annihilate the state governments, and swallow them up in the grand vortex of general empire.

3.11.28 The judicial powers vested in Congress are also so various and extensive, that by legal ingenuity they may be extended to every case, and thus absorb the state judiciaries, and when we consider the decisive influence that a general judiciary would have over the civil polity of the several states, we do not hesitate to pronounce that this power, unaided by the legislative, would effect a consolidation of the states under one government.

The powers of a court of equity, vested by this constitution, in the tribu- 3.11.29 nals of Congress; powers which do not exist in Pennsylvania, unless so far as they can be incorporated with jury trial, would, in this state, greatly contribute to this event. The rich and wealthy suitors would eagerly lay hold of the infinite mazes, perplexities and delays, which a court of chancery, with the appellate powers of the supreme court in fact as well as law would furnish him with, and thus the poor man being plunged in the bottomless pit of legal discussion, would drop his demand in despair.

In short, consolidation pervades the whole constitution. It begins with an 3.11.30 annunciation that such was the intention. The main pillars of the fabric correspond with it, and the concluding paragraph is a confirmation of it. The preamble begins with the words, "We the people of the United States," which is the style of a compact between individuals entering into a state of society, and not that of a confederation of states.[15] The other features of consolidation, we have before noticed.

Thus we have fully established the position, that the powers vested by this constitution in Congress, will effect a consolidation of the states under one government, which even the advocates of this constitution admit, could not be done without the sacrifice of all liberty.

3. We dissent, Thirdly, Because if it were practicable to govern so exten- 3.11.31
sive a territory as these United States includes, on the plan of a consolidated government, consistent with the principles of liberty and the happiness of the people, yet the construction of this constitution is not calculated to attain the object, for independent of the nature of the case, it would of itself, necessarily, produce a despotism, and that not by the usual gradations, but with the celerity that has hitherto only attended revolutions effected by the sword.

To establish the truth of this position, a cursory investigation of the principles and form of this constitution will suffice.

The first consideration that this review suggests, is the omission of a BILL 3.11.32 of RIGHTS, ascertaining and fundamentally establishing those unalienable and personal rights of men, without the full, free, and secure enjoyment of which there can be no liberty, and over which it is not necessary for a good government to have the controul. The principal of which are the rights of conscience, personal liberty by the clear and unequivocal establishment of the writ of habeas corpus, jury trial in criminal and civil cases, by an impartial jury of the vicinage or county, with the common-law proceedings, for the safety of the accused in criminal prosecutions; and the liberty of the press, that scourge of tyrants, and the grand bulwark of every other liberty and privilege; the stipulations heretofore made in favor of them in the state constitutions, are entirely superceded by this constitution.

3.11.33 The legislature of a free country should be so formed as to have a competent knowledge of its constituents, and enjoy their confidence. To produce these essential requisites, the representation ought to be fair, equal, and sufficiently numerous, to possess the same interests, feelings, opinions, and views, which the people themselves would possess, were they all assembled; and so numerous as to prevent bribery and undue influence, and so responsible to the people, by frequent and fair elections, as to prevent their neglecting or sacrificing the views and interests of their constituents, to their own pursuits.

3.11.34 We will now bring the legislature under this constitution to the test of the foregoing principles, which will demonstrate, that it is deficient in every essential quality of a just and safe representation.

The house of representatives is to consist of 65 members; that is one for about every 50,000 inhabitants, to be chosen every two years. Thirty-three members will form a quorum for doing business; and 17 of these, being the majority, determine the sense of the house.

The senate, the other constituent branch of the legislature, consists of 26 members being two from each state, appointed by their legislatures every six years—fourteen senators make a quorum; the majority of whom, eight, determines the sense of that body: except in judging on impeachments, or in making treaties, or in expelling a member, when two thirds of the senators present, must concur.

The president is to have the controul over the enacting of laws, so far as to make the concurrence of two thirds of the representatives and senators present necessary, if he should object to the laws.

3.11.35 Thus it appears that the liberties, happiness, interests, and great concerns of the whole United States, may be dependent upon the integrity, virtue, wisdom, and knowledge of 25 or 26 men—How unadequate and unsafe a representation! Inadequate, because the sense and views of 3 or 4 millions of people diffused over so extensive a territory comprising such various climates, products, habits, interests, and opinions, cannot be collected in so small a body; and besides, it is not a fair and equal representation of the people even in proportion to its number, for the smallest state has as much weight in the senate as the largest, and from the smallness of the number to be chosen for both branches of the legislature; and from the mode of election and appointment, which is under the controul of Congress; and from the nature of the thing, men of the most elevated rank in life, will alone be chosen. The other orders in the society, such as farmers, traders, and mechanics, who all ought to have a competent number of their best informed men in the legislature, will be totally unrepresented.[16]

3.11.36 The representation is unsafe, because in the exercise of such great powers and trusts, it is so exposed to corruption and undue influence, by the gift of the numerous places of honor and emoluments at the disposal of the executive; by the arts and address of the great and designing; and by direct bribery.

The representation is moreover inadequate and unsafe, because of the long terms for which it is appointed, and the mode of its appointment, by which Congress may not only controul the choice of the people, but may so manage as to divest the people of this fundamental right, and become self-elected.

The number of members in the house of representatives may be encreased to one for every 30,000 inhabitants. But when we consider, that this cannot be done without the consent of the senate, who from their share in the legislative, in the executive, and judicial departments, and permanency of appointment, will be the great efficient body in this government, and whose weight and predominancy would be abridged by an increase of the representatives, we are persuaded that this is a circumstance that cannot be expected. On the contrary, the number of representatives will probably be continued at 65, although the population of the country may swell to treble what it now is; unless a revolution should effect a change.[17] 3.11.37

We have before noticed the judicial power as it would effect a consolidation of the states into one government; we will now examine it, as it would affect the liberties and welfare of the people, supposing such a government were practicable and proper. 3.11.38

The judicial power, under the proposed constitution, is founded on the well-known principles of the civil law, by which the judge determines both on law and fact, and appeals are allowed from the inferior tribunals to the superior, upon the whole question; so that facts as well as law, would be re-examined, and even new facts brought forward in the court of appeals; and to use the words of a very eminent Civilian—"The cause is many times another thing before the court of appeals, than what it was at the time of the first sentence."[18]

That this mode of proceeding is the one which must be adopted under this constitution, is evident from the following circumstances:—1st. That the trial by jury, which is the grand characteristic of the common law, is secured by the constitution, only in criminal cases.—2d. That the appeal from both law and fact is expressly established, which is utterly inconsistent with the principles of the common law, and trials by jury. The only mode in which an appeal from law and fact can be established, is, by adopting the principles and practice of the civil law; unless the United States should be drawn into the absurdity of calling and swearing juries, merely for the purpose of contradicting their verdicts, which would render juries contemptible and worse than useless.—3d. That the courts to be established would decide on all cases of law and equity, which is a well known characteristic of the civil law, and these courts would have conusance not only of the laws of the United States and of treaties, and of cases affecting ambassadors, but of all 3.11.39 cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, which last are matters belonging exclusively to the civil law, in every nation in Christendom.

3.11.40 Not to enlarge upon the loss of the invaluable right of trial by an unbiassed jury, so dear to every friend of liberty, the monstrous expence and inconveniences of the mode of proceedings to be adopted, are such as will prove intolerable to the people of this country. The lengthy proceedings of the civil law courts in the chancery of England, and in the courts of Scotland and France, are such that few men of moderate fortune can endure the expence of; the poor man must therefore submit to the wealthy. Length of purse will too often prevail against right and justice. For instance, we are told by the learned judge Blackstone, that a question only on the property of an ox, of the value of three guineas, originating under the civil law proceedings in Scotland, after many interlocutory orders and sentences below, was carried at length from the court of sessions, the highest court in that part of Great Britain, by way of appeal to the house of lords, where the question of law and fact was finally determined. He adds, that no pique or spirit could in the court of king's bench or common pleas at Westminster, have given continuance to such a cause for a tenth part of the time, nor have cost a twentieth part of the expence. Yet the costs in the courts of king's bench and common pleas in England, are infinitely greater than those which the people of this country have ever experienced. We abhor the idea of losing the transcendant privilege of trial by jury, with the loss of which, it is remarked by the same learned author, that in Sweden, the liberties of the commons were extinguished by an aristocratic senate: and that trial by jury and the liberty of the people went out together.[19] At the same time we regret the intolerable delay, the enormous expences and infinite vexation to which the people of this country will be exposed from the voluminous proceedings of the courts of civil law, and especially from the appellate jurisdiction, by means of which a man may be drawn from the utmost boundaries of this extensive country to the seat of the supreme court of the nation to contend, perhaps with a wealthy and powerful adversary. The consequence of this establishment will be an absolute confirmation of the power of aristocratical influence in the courts of justice: for the common people will not be able to contend or struggle against it.

3.11.41 Trial by jury in criminal cases may also be excluded by declaring that the libeller for instance shall be liable to an action of debt for a specified sum; thus evading the common law prosecution by indictment and trial by jury. And the common course of proceeding against a ship for breach of revenue laws by information (which will be classed among civil causes) will at the civil law be within the resort of a court, where no jury intervenes. Besides, the benefit of jury trial, in cases of a criminal nature, which cannot be evaded, will be rendered of little value, by calling the accused to answer far from home; there being no provision that the trial be by a jury of the neighbourhood or country. Thus an inhabitant of Pittsburgh, on a charge of crime committed on the banks of the Ohio, may be obliged to defend himself at the side of the Delaware, and so vice versa. To conclude this head: we observe that the judges of the courts of Congress would not be independent, as they are not debarred from holding other offices, during the pleasure of the president and senate, and as they may derive their support in part from fees, alterable by the legislature.

3.11.42 The next consideration that the constitution presents, is the undue and dangerous mixture of the powers of government; the same body possessing legislative, executive, and judicial powers. The senate is a constituent branch of the legislature, it has judicial power in judging on impeachments, and in this case unites in some measure the characters of judge and party, as all the principal officers are appointed by the president-general, with the concurrence of the senate and therefore they derive their offices in part from the senate. This may biass the judgments of the senators and tend to screen great delinquents from punishment. And the senate has, moreover, various and great executive powers, viz. in concurrence with the president-general, they form treaties with foreign nations, that may controul and abrogate the constitutions and laws of the several states. Indeed, there is no power, privilege or liberty of the state governments, or of the people, but what may be affected by virtue of this power. For all treaties, made by them, are to be the "supreme law of the land, any thing in the constitution or laws of any state, to the contrary notwithstanding."

3.11.43 And this great power may be exercised by the president and 10 senators (being two-thirds of 14, which is a quorum of that body). What an inducement would this offer to the ministers of foreign powers to compass by bribery such concessions as could not otherwise be obtained. It is the unvaried usage of all free states, whenever treaties interfere with the positive laws of the land, to make the intervention of the legislature necessary to give them operation. This became necessary, and was afforded by the parliament of Great-Britain. In consequence of the late commercial treaty between that kingdom and France—As the senate judges on impeachments, who is to try the members of the senate for the abuse of this power! And none of the great appointments to office can be made without the consent of the senate.

3.11.44 Such various, extensive, and important powers combined in one body of men, are inconsistent with all freedom; the celebrated Montesquieu tells us, that "when the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person, or in the same body of magistrates, there can be no liberty, because apprehensions may arise, lest the same monarch or senate should enact tyrannical laws, to execute them in a tyrannical manner."

"Again, there is no liberty, if the power of judging be not separated from the legislative and executive powers. Were it joined with the legislative, the life and liberty of the subject would be exposed to arbitrary controul: for the judge would then be legislator. Were it joined to the executive power, the judge might behave with all the violence of an oppressor. There would be an end of every thing, were the same man, or the same body of the nobles, or of the people, to exercise those three powers; that of enacting laws; that of executing the public resolutions; and that of judging the crimes or differences of individuals."[20]

3.11.45 The president general is dangerously connected with the senate; his coincidence with the views of the ruling junto in that body, is made essential to his weight and importance in the government, which will destroy all independency and purity in the executive department, and having the power of pardoning without the concurrence of a council, he may skreen from punishment the most treasonable attempts that may be made on the liberties of the people, when instigated by his coadjutors in the senate. Instead of this dangerous and improper mixture of the executive with the legislative and judicial, the supreme executive powers ought to have been placed in the president, with a small independent council, made personally responsible for every appointment to office or other act, by having their opinions recorded; and that without the concurrence of the majority of the quorum of this council, the president should not be capable of taking any step.

3.11.46 We have before considered internal taxation, as it would effect the destruction of the state governments, and produce one consolidated government. We will now consider that subject as it affects the personal concerns of the people.

The power of direct taxation applies to every individual, as congress, under this government, is expressly vested with the authority of laying a capitation or poll tax upon every person to any amount. This is a tax that, however oppressive in its nature, and unequal in its operation, is certain as to its produce and simple in its collection; it cannot be evaded like the objects of imposts or excise, and will be paid, because all that a man hath will he give for his head. This tax is so congenial to the nature of despotism, that it has ever been a favorite under such governments. Some of those who were in the late general convention from this state have long laboured to introduce a poll-tax among us.

3.11.47 The power of direct taxation will further apply to every individual, as congress may tax land, cattle, trades, occupations, etc. in any amount, and every object of internal taxation is of that nature, that however oppressive, the people will have but this alternative, except to pay the tax, or let their property be taken, for all resistance will be in vain. The standing army and select militia would enforce the collection.

3.11.48 For the moderate exercise of this power, there is no controul left in the state governments, whose intervention is destroyed. No relief, or redress of grievances can be extended, as heretofore by them. There is not even a declaration of RIGHTS to which the people may appeal for the vindication of their wrongs in the court of justice. They must therefore, implicitly obey the most arbitrary laws, as the worst of them will be pursuant to the principles and form of the constitution, and that strongest of all checks upon the conduct of administration, responsibility to the people, will not exist in this government. The permanency of the appointments of senators and representatives, and the controul the congress have over their election, will place them independent of the sentiments and resentment of the people, and the administration having a greater interest in the government than in the community, there will be no consideration to restrain them from oppression and tyranny. In the government of this state, under the old confederation, the members of the legislature are taken from among the people, and their interests and welfare are so inseparably connected with those of their constituents, that they can derive no advantage from oppressive laws and taxes, for they would suffer in common with their fellow citizens; would participate in the burthens they impose on the community, as they must return to the common level, after a short period; and notwithstanding every ex[er]tion of influence, every means of corruption, a necessary rotation excludes them from permanency in the legislature.

This large state is to have but ten members in that Congress which is to 3.11.49 have the liberty, property and dearest concerns of every individual in this vast country at absolute command and even these ten persons, who are to be our only guardians; who are to supercede the legislature of Pennsylvania, will not be of the choice of the people, nor amenable to them. From the mode of their election and appointment they will consist of the lordly and high-minded; of men who will have no congenial feelings with the people, but a perfect indifference for, and contempt of them; they will consist of those harpies of power, that prey upon the very vitals; that riot on the miseries of the community. But we will suppose, although in all probability it may never be realized in fact, that our deputies in Congress have the welfare of their constituents at heart, and will exert themselves in their behalf, what security could even this afford; what relief could they extend to their oppressed constituents? To attain this, the majority of the deputies of the twelve other states in Congress must be alike well disposed; must alike forego the sweets of power, and relinquish the pursuits of ambition, which from the nature of things is not to be expected. If the people part with a responsible representation in the legislature, founded upon fair, certain and frequent elections, they have nothing left they can call their own. Miserable is the lot of that people whose every concern depends on the WILL and PLEASURE of their rulers. Our soldiers will become Janissaries, and our officers of government Bashaws; in short, the system of despotism will soon be compleated.

From the foregoing investigation, it appears that the Congress under this 3.11.50 constitution will not possess the confidence of the people, which is an essential requisite in a good government; for unless the laws command the confidence and respect of the great body of the people, so as to induce them to support them, when called on by the civil magistrate, they must be executed by the aid of a numerous standing army, which would be inconsistent with every idea of liberty; for the same force that may be employed to compel obedience to good laws, might and probably would be used to wrest from the people their constitutional liberties. The framers of this constitution appear to have been aware of this great deficiency; to have been sensible that no dependence could be placed on the people for their support: but on the contrary, that the government must be executed by force. They have therefore made a provision for this purpose in a permanent STANDING ARMY, and a MILITIA that may be subjected to as strict discipline and government.

3.11.51 A standing army in the hands of a government placed so independent of the people, may be made a fatal instrument to overturn the public liberties; it may be employed to enforce the collection of the most oppressive taxes, and to carry into execution the most arbitrary measures. An ambitious man who may have the army at his devotion, may step up into the throne, and seize upon absolute power.

The absolute unqualified command that Congress have over the militia may be made instrumental to the destruction of all liberty, both public and private; whether of a personal, civil or religious nature.

3.11.52 First, the personal liberty of every man probably from sixteen to sixty years of age, may be destroyed by the power Congress have in organizing and governing of the militia. As militia they may be subjected to fines to any amount, levied in a military manner; they may be subjected to corporal punishments of the most disgraceful and humiliating kind, and to death itself, by the sentence of a court martial: To this our young men will be more immediately subjected, as a select militia, composed of them, will best answer the purposes of government.

3.11.53 Secondly, The rights of conscience may be violated, as there is no exemption of those persons who are conscientiously scrupulous of bearing arms.[21] These compose a respectable proportion of the community in the state. This is the more remarkable, because even when the distresses of the late war, and the evident disaffection of many citizens of that description, inflamed our passions, and when every person, who was obliged to risque his own life, must have been exasperated against such as on a,y account kept back from the common danger, yet even then, when outrage and violence might have been expected, the rights of conscience were held sacred.

At this momentous crisis, the framers of our state constitution made the most express and decided declaration and stipulations in favour of the rights of conscience: but now when no necessity exists, those dearest rights of men are left insecure.

3.11.54 Thirdly, The absolute command of Congress over the militia may be destructive of public liberty; for under the guidance of an arbitrary government, they may be made the unwilling instruments of tyranny. The militia of Pennsylvania may be marched to New England or Virginia to quell an insurrection occasioned by the most galling oppression, and aided by the standing army, they will no doubt be successful in subduing their liberty and independency; but in so doing, although the magnanimity of their minds will be extinguished, yet the meaner passions of resentment and revenge will be increased, and these in turn will be the ready and obedient instruments of despotism to enslave the others; and that with an irritated vengeance. Thus may the militia be made the instruments of crushing the last efforts of expiring liberty, of riveting the chains of despotism on their fellow citizens, and on one another. This power can be exercised not only without violating the constitution, but in strict conformity with it; it is calculated for this express purpose, and will doubtless be executed accordingly.

As this government will not enjoy the confidence of the people, but be executed by force, it will be a very expensive and burthensome government. The standing army must be numerous, and as a further support, it will be the policy of this government to multiply officers in every department: judges, collectors, tax-gatherers, excisemen and the whole host of revenue officers will swarm over the land, devouring the hard earnings of the industrious. Like the locusts of old, impoverishing and desolating all before them. 3.11.55

We have not noticed the smaller, nor many of the considerable blemishes, but have confined our objections to the great and essential defects; the main pillars of the constitution; which we have shewn to be inconsistent with the liberty and happiness of the people, as its establishment will annihilate the state governments, and produce one consolidated government that will eventually and speedily issue in the supremacy of despotism. 3.11.56

In this investigation, we have not confined our views to the interests or welfare of this state, in preference to the others. We have overlooked all local circumstances—we have considered this subject on the broad scale of the general good; we have asserted the cause of the present and future ages: the cause of liberty and mankind.

Essays by William Penn

(PHILADELPHIA) INDEPENDENT GAZETTEER
2 and 3 January 1788

These thoughtful essays are interesting partly for the general principles of government stated at the outset, but more especially for the discussion of the principle of the division of power in a democracy. "William Penn" emphatically accepts democracy, or government of the people, as the only government under which liberty can be attained or preserved (3.12.11). He examines the need in such a government for a division of power, the first and most natural being between the legislative and executive branches (3.12.13–14). He argues against giving the executive a negative or any other control over the legislative (3.12.15). He finds his argument supported by the principles, though not always the practice, of the state constitutions, the book of which is second only to the Bible in its store of eternal truths (3.12.16–18).

I

To the Citizens of the United States.

Fellow Citizens,

3.12.1 At this important moment which is to decide on your future happiness or misery by the adoption or rejection of the new proposed form of government, a cool and dispassionate investigation of that system becomes indispensably necessary—I have waited for a considerable time, hoping that the subject would be taken up by some abler pen than mine—I have been disappointed in my expectation—a great many pieces have indeed appeared, which have thrown a considerable light on this interesting subject, but they have been mostly of the desultory kind, and no person (at least that I know of) has as yet attempted a methodical examination of the proposed constitution, or a comparative view of its principles with the principles of a government in general, and of a federal government in particular—Although

I am greatly deficient in the necessary abilities, I have however undertaken the arduous task; and I propose, in this and the ensuing papers, to go through it in the best manner I am able, and without attempting to display any ornament or elegance of style, I shall endeavour to explain my ideas with clearness and simplicity—my sole object is to be understood, and to render (if possible) these observations as useful, as their subject is interesting.

I shall in the first place lay down general principles, and proceed afterwards to their applications. I shall make very few quotations, from political writers, and take very few examples from the government of other countries whether ancient or modern—truth needs nothing but itself to enforce conviction on unprejudiced minds, and principles are a thousand times above precedents. 3.12.2

I shall therefore begin with examining into the nature of government in general. 3.12.3

Government in its general sense may be defined a human institution by which certain powers are delegated by the people to one or more citizens to preserve their national existence, and secure to each individual, the enjoyment of his natural rights: otherwise, in the words of the constitution of Massachusetts, It is a social compact by which the whole people convenants with each citizen, and each citizen with the whole people, that all shall be governed by certain laws for the common good.[1]

Government was originally instituted for the benefit of mankind—The welfare of the community is the great end which, under every form, it is intended to obtain—but what is the best form of government has long been an object of dispute among the learned and speculative. It is not true that that government is best which is best administered—it is a sophism invented by tyranny to quiet the inquisitive mind; a good administration is at best but a temporary palliative to a bad government, but it does not alter its nature, any more than a bad man by doing one good action in the course of his life, ceases to be a bad man.[2] The best government is certainly that which is the least liable to be ill administered, in which the rulers have the most power to do good and the least to do evil. In other words it is that in which the natural rights of mankind are the most inviolably secured. 3.12.4

And of consequence as liberty is the most essential of those rights, which man holds by inheritance from all-bountiful nature, that which takes from him the least share of that liberty ought to be the best—for the same principle holds in the political as in the mechanical science, and that machine in either must be allowed to be the most perfect, which with the least strength performs the greatest execution. 3.12.5

But here a long agitated question will occur: What is liberty? What is that supreme good which every one feels, and so very few can define?—I would call it the unlimited power of doing good, and without very critically examining into this definition, I know not what internal voice tells me that I am 3.12.6

not mistaken. But again, What is good?—When that is fully known and understood, men will no longer differ about forms of government; it is the tree of knowledge which we have as yet only tasted; it is that we have for thousands of years, with various successes, been eagerly seeking after; it is the ultimate end of the painful researches of the human mind, and the object of these disquisitions.

3.12.7 Without going too deep into metaphysical investigations, that are no part of our present design, let us go back to the leading principle already established, that the best government is that which secures to the citizens the greatest share of their natural rights: their full extent unfortunately is not yet known to us; it is by slow, and often interrupted, steps that we have discovered those we now enjoy. That discovery is owing partly to our own sad experience, and partly to the philanthrophic researches of those chosen few to whom the Almighty has in his mercy bestowed a larger portion of the ethereal fire than usually falls to the lot of the common race of men. Those men, whom we call philosophers or lovers of wisdom, have generally been persecuted while they lived, and have had altars erected to them after their death. Because prejudice, supported by private interest, has always stood in the way of useful truths, which however have in the end seldom failed to prevail. And wherever a sufficient number of those truths has been established and generally diffused, liberty and happiness have become the portion of every nation so enlightened—liberty is the fair offspring of knowledge, as tyranny is the grim-child of ignorance.

3.12.8 In this respect America is of all other nations the most favored of Heaven—The book of the constitutions of the different states,[3] reflects such a mass of light as would have dazzled the greatest philosophers of antiquity. After the holy scriptures, it is certainly of all books that which contains the greatest store of eternal truths. I never open that sacred volume without feeling a kind of awful reverence, mixed with gratitude to the Almighty giver of all good gifts, who has been pleased to enlighten the minds of the legislators of this favored nation.

3.12.9 The truths which those great men have thus declared and established, are not (GOD be thanked) solely consigned to books made of perishable materials; they are deeply engraved in the hearts of every American. This nation may boast of enjoying the greatest collective store of political knowledge of any people on earth. Maxims of the utmost importance to the happiness of mankind, are familiar to our meanest citizens, which many eminent Philosophers in other parts of the world, have perhaps never had an idea of—hence it must be inferred, that if we are ever brought into slavery, we shall never be allowed the easy plea of ignorance: the nations that now envy us, will despise our meaness, and see our miseries without pity.

3.12.10 Let us therefore try this new federal constitution that is now offered to us by the light of our own knowledge—Let us recur to those original principles upon which our present constitutions have been established. These guides never can mislead us; they are a sure touchstone to try any form of government by. If we find the federal plan conformable to those principles, let us by all means adopt it, and thereby secure perpetual happiness to ourselves and our posterity—If, on the contrary, we find that it is built on a different foundation, we must not hesitate a moment, but with a manly firmness, worthy of ourselves, unanimously reject it.

William Penn.

II

To the Citizens of the United States.

Fellow Citizens,

I shall now proceed to lay down the principles that I think necessary to 3.12.11 the formation of a free government, and without which, I sincerely believe, no true liberty can exist. I shall not here take notice of the scholastic division of government into three kinds, to wit, monarchy, aristocracy and democracy, nor consider separately the nature and effects of each of these different species. At present I shall confine my enquiries entirely to a democracy, or government, of the people, which I am confident is the only one under which liberty can be obtained or preserved. The two other forms of government are so essentially different from it, that it is impossible they should have been intended to obtain the same, and which can never be done by following opposite roads. The unity of truth is as fixed and immutable a principle as that of the Divinity from whence it springs, and whose chief attribute it is. If so, no two opposite principles in government, any more than in any other science, can be equally founded upon it. Whether it was given to man to reach the source of the great fountain of truth, from which all true principles are derived, as rivers flow from the sea, it is not in my power to determine. We ought at least, with cautious and diffident steps, to approach it as nearly as we can, and treasure up and secure to ourselves and our posterity, the advantage of those partial truths, which the human mind is allowed to discover, waiting with confidence in HIM who constantly watches over his favorite creature man, and made him to be happy; for the blessed time when we shall perhaps discover the grand principle, which, when once found, it will not be in our power any more to tread the paths of error. Then, and not till then, may we expect to see the days foretold by the greatest philosopher of antiquity, when laws and government (their true principles being known to all the world) will be the same through all mankind. Non erit lex alia Romae, alia Athenis, alia, nunc, alia posthac, sed et omni tempore, et apud omnes gentes, una eadem qua lex obtinebit. Cic. Fragm. de Repub. [III, 22].

3.12.12 I believe that it is universally agreed upon in this enlightened country, that all power residing originally in the people, and being derived from them, they ought to be governed by themselves only, or by their immediate representatives. I shall not spend any time in explaining a principle so well and so generally understood, but I shall proceed immediately to that which I conceive to be the next in order.

3.12.13 The next principle, without which it must be clear that no free government can ever subsist, is the DIVISION OF POWER among those who are charged with the execution of it. It has always been the favorite maxim of princes, to divide the people, in order to govern them; it is now time that the people should avail themselves of the same maxim, and divide power among their rulers, in order to prevent their abusing it—The application of this great political truth, has long been unknown to the world, and yet it is grounded upon a very plain natural principle,—If, says Montesquieu, the same man, or body of men, is possessed both of the legislative and executive power, there is NO LIBERTY, because it may be feared that the same monarch, or the same senate, will enact tyrannical laws, in order to execute them in a tyrannical manner[4]—nothing can be clearer, and the natural disposition of man, to ambition and power, makes it probable that such would be the consequence—suppose for instance, that the same body, which has the power of raising money by taxes, is also entrusted with the application of that money, they will very probably raise large sums, and apply them to their own private uses; if they are empowered to create offices, and appoint the officers, they will take that opportunity of providing for themselves, and their friends, and if they have the power of inflicting penalties for offences, and of trying the offenders, there will be no bounds to their tyranny. Liberty therefore can only subsist, where the powers of government are properly divided, and where the different jurisdictions are inviolably kept distinct and separate.*

3.12.14 The first and most natural division of the powers of government are into the legislative and executive branches. These two should never be suffered to have the least share of each others jurisdiction, or to intermeddle with it

*I shall illustrate this doctrine by an example. A burgher of a certain borough of Switzerland was elected Bailiff, or Chief Magistrate, for one year, according to the constitution of the place. Shortly after his appointment, he sent for one of his neighbours, and ordered him to pull off his boots. The honest neighbour was astonished, and attempted to remonstrate, but the bailiff was determined to exert his authority, and threatened to send him to jail, if he did not yield him an immediate obedience. The poor man was forced to comply, for the bailiff was vested with power, both legislative and executive, he pulled off his worship's boots, but said to him, "when I am appointed bailiff in my turn, you shall pull off my boots and clean them too."[5] in any manner. For which ever of the two divides its power with the other, will certainly be subordinate to it, and if they both have a share of each others authority, they will be in fact but one body; their interest as well as their powers will be the same, and they will combine together against the people.

It is therefore a political error of the greatest magnitude, to allow the executive power a negative, or in fact any kind of control over the proceedings of the legislature.[6] The people of Great Britain have been so sensible of this truth, that since the days of William III. no king of England has dared to exercise the negative over the acts of the two houses of parliament, to which he is clearly entitled by his prerogative. 3.12.15

This doctrine is not novel in America, it seems on the contrary to be every where well understood and admitted beyond controversy; in the bills of rights or constitutions of New-Hampshire, Massachusetts, Maryland, Virginia, North-Carolina and Georgia, it is expressly declared, "That the legislative, executive and judicial departments, shall be forever separate and distinct from each other."[7] In Pennsylvania and Delaware, they are effectually separated without any particular declaration of the principle. In the other states indeed, the executive branch possesses more or less of the executive [legislative?] power—And here it must appear singular that the state of Massachusetts, where the doctrine of a separate jurisdiction is most positively established, and in whose bill of rights these remarkable words are to be found: "The executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers, or either of them, to the end it may be a government of laws and not of men." (§30)[8] Yet in that commonwealth and New-Hampshire, the executive branch, which consists of a single magistrate, has more controul over the legislature than in any other state; for there, if the governor refuses his assent to a bill, it cannot be passed into a law, unless two-thirds of the house afterwards concur. In New-York the same power is given to a Council of Revision, consisting of the Governor, the Chancellor and Judges of the Supreme Court, or any three of them, of which the Governor is to be one. In Rhode-Island and Connecticut, whose governments were established before the revolution, the Governor has a single vote as a member of the upper house, and New-Jersey has adopted this part of their constitution. In Georgia the laws are to be revised by the Governor and Council, but they can do no more than give their opinion upon them. In Maryland the bills are to be signed by the governor before they can be enacted, and in South-Carolina they are to be sealed with the great seal, which is in the governor's custody. But in the first of these states, the constitution prescribes, that the governor shall sign the bills, and in the latter, a joint committee of both houses of legislature is to wait upon chief magistrate to receive and return the great seal, which implies that he is bound to deliver it to them, for the special purpose of affixing it to the laws of the state. Pennsylvania has proceeded upon a much more rational 3.12.16 ground, their legislature having a particular seal of their own, and their laws requiring only to be signed by the speaker. If in Maryland or South-Carolina a difference should ever arise between the legislature and the governor, and the latter should refuse to sign the laws, or to deliver the great seal, the most fatal consequences might ensue.

3.12.17 Here then we see the great leading principle of the absolute division of the legislative from the executive jurisdiction, admitted in almost every one of the American states as a fundamental maxim in the politics of a free country. The theory of this general doctrine is every where established, though a few states have somewhat swerved from it in the practice. From whence we must conclude, that even the knowledge and full conviction of a new political truth will not always immediately conquer inveterate habits and prejudices. The idea of the negative, which the constitution of England gives to the monarch over the proceedings of the other branches of parliament, although it has so long become obsolete, has had an effect upon timid minds, and upon the minds of those who could not distinguish between the form and spirit of the British constitution. They would not grant to the executive branch an absolute negative over the legislature, but yet they tried every method to introduce something similar to it. They reprobated the doctrine in the most express words, and yet they could not bear to part entirely with it. It is curious to observe how many different ways they have endeavored to conciliate truth with prejudice. Of those states who have allowed the executive branch to intermeddle with the proceedings of the legislature, no two (New-Hampshire and Massachusetts excepted) have done it exactly in the same manner. They have tried every possible medium, but having lost sight of the original principle which they had already established, and which alone could have been their safest guide, they groped about in the dark, and could not find any solid ground on which to establish a general rule. Like Noah's dove, being once out of the ark of truth, they could not find elsewhere a place to rest their feet.

3.12.18 These facts will no doubt afford an interesting page in the history of the contradictions of the human mind. Unfortunately, they do not stand single, and this is not the only instance that we find in the constitutions of the different states, of a general principle being expressly declared as a part of the natural rights of the citizens, and afterwards being as expressly contradicted in the practice. Thus we find it declared in every one of our bills of rights, "that there shall be a perfect liberty of conscience, and that no sect shall ever be entitled to a preference over the others."[9] Yet in Massachusetts and Maryland, all the officers of government, and in Pennsylvania the members of the legislature, are to be of the Christian religion; in New-Jersey, North-Carolina, and Georgia, the protestant, and in Delaware, the trinitarian sects, have an exclusive right to public employments; and in South-Carolina the constitution goes so far as to declare the creed of the established church. Virginia and New-York are the only states where there is a perfect liberty of conscience. I cannot say any thing as to Connecticut and Rhode-Island, as their constitutions are silent on the subject, and I have not been informed of their practice.

Whether these religious restrictions are right or wrong it is not my intention, nor is it my object to examine in the course of these disquisitions—I only meant to shew, that in laying down a political system it is safer to rely on principles than upon precedents, because the former are fixed and immutable, while the latter vary with men, places, times and circumstances. 3.12.19

Essay by Deliberator

(PHILADELPHIA) FREEMAN'S JOURNAL
20 February 1788

This essay and the next were written in reply to a series of three essays by A Freeman (written by Tench Coxe), contending that the government under the Constitution would not be a consolidation but a federal government.[1] The essay here by Deliberator is concerned with the powers of the general and state governments. The author rebuts some of A Freeman's claims and goes on to make sixteen assertions of his own about the powers granted under the new Constitution, the most striking of which are that under its power to regulate commerce Congress may authorize the importation of slaves, even in states where this trade is prohibited; that Congress may establish a uniformity of religion if it should think it for the "general welfare"; that Congress cannot increase the number of the House of Representatives; that no state may call forth its militia to suppress insurrection; and that no state can compel one of its citizens to pay a debt to a citizen of another state.

This essay may be regarded as a kind of preface to the essay by A [Pennsylvania] Farmer (below, 3.14), which provides a more penetrating and comprehensive examination of the arguments of A Freeman.[2]

1. While A Freeman is identified by Centinel as James Wilson ("James the Caledonian"—see Centinel XIII, 2.7.158), there is solid evidence that he was in fact Tench Coxe. See Harold Hutcheson, Tench Coxe: A Study in American Economic Development (Baltimore 1938) 65.

2. Two other essays over the pseudonym "Deliberator" appeared in the newspaper in the following two months, but these consisted entirely of lengthy extracts from Centinel. See Centinel IV, 2.7.79 n. 41.

Mr. Bailey,

3.13.1 A writer in the Pennsylvania Packet, under the signature of A Freeman,[1] has lately entered the lists as another champion for the proposed constitution; particularly he has endeavoured to shew that our apprehensions of this plan of government being a consolidation of the United States into one government, and not a confederacy of sovereign independent states, is entirely groundless; and it must be acknowledged, that he has advocated this cause with as much shew of reason, perhaps, as the subject will admit.

The words states, several states, and united states are, he observes, 3.13.2
frequently mentioned in the constitution—and this is an argument that their separate sovereignty and independence cannot be in danger! He has enumerated a variety of matters which, he says, Congress cannot do, and which the states, in their individual capacity, must or may do, and thence infers their sovereignty and independence. In some of these, however, I apprehend he is a little mistaken.

(1.) "Congress cannot train the militia."—This is not strictly true; for by 3.13.3
the 1st Article they are empowered "to provide for organizing, arming and disciplining" them; and tho' the respective states are said to have the authority of training the militia, it must be "according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." In this business, therefore, they will be no other than subalterns under Congress, to execute their orders; which, if they shall neglect to do, Congress will have constitutional powers to provide for, by any other means they shall think proper. They shall have power to declare what description of persons shall compose the militia; to appoint the stated times and places for exercising them; to compel personal attendance, whether when called forth into actual service, or on other occasions, under what penalties they shall think proper, without regard to scruples of conscience, or any other consideration; their executive officer may march, and countermarch them from one extremity of the state to the other—and all this without so much as consulting the legislature of the particular states to which they belong! Where then is that boasted security against the annihilation of the state governments, arising from "the powerful military support" they will have from their militia?

(2.) "Congress cannot enact laws for the inspection of the produce of the country."—Neither is this strictly true. The power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying this power (among others vested in them by the constitution) into execution," most certainly extends to the enacting of inspection laws. The particular states may indeed propose such laws to them; but it is expressly declared, in the 1st article, that "all such laws shall be subject to the revision and controul of the Congress."

(3.) "The several states can . . . prohibit or impose duties on the importation of slaves into their own ports"—Nay, not even this can they do, "without the consent of Congress," as is expressly declared in the close of the 1st article. The duty which Congress may, and it is probable will lay on the importation of slaves, will form a branch of their revenue; but his impost, as well as all others, "must be uniform throughout the United States"; Congress therefore cannot consent that one state should impose an additional duty on this article of commerce, unless all the other states should do the same; and it is not very likely that some of the states will ever ask this favour.

(4.) "Congress cannot interfere with the opening of rivers and canals; the making or regulation of roads, except post roads; building bridges; erecting ferries; building light-houses, etc."—In one case, which may very frequently happen, this proposition also fails; for if the river, canal, road, bridge, ferry, etc. be common to two states, or a matter in which they may be both concerned, and consequently must both concur, then the interference and consent of Congress becomes absolutely necessary; since it is declared in the constitution that "no State shall, without the consent of Congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another State."

(5.) "The elections of the President, Vice President, senators and representatives are exclusively in the hands of the States—even as to filling vacancies." This, in one important part, is not true—for, by the 2d article, "in case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President, and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, etc. both of the President and Vice President, declaring what officer shall then act as president, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a president shall be elected; but no such election is provided for by the constitution, till the return of the periodical election, at the expiration of the four years for which the former president was chosen. And thus may the great projects of this supreme magistrate of the United States be exercised, for years together, by a man who, perhaps, never had one vote of the people for any office of government in his life.

(6.) "Congress cannot interfere with the constitution of any state."—This has been often said, but alas! with how little truth! since it is declared in the 6th article that "this constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties, etc. shall be the supreme law of the land, and every state, shall be bound thereby—any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."

3.13.4 But, sir, in order to form a proper judgment of the probable effects of this plan of general government on the sovereignties of the several states, it is necessary also to take a view of what Congress may, constitutionally, do, and of what the states may not do. This matter, however, the above writer has thought proper to pass over in silence: I would therefore beg leave, in some measure, to supply this omission, and if in any thing, I should appear to be mistaken I hope he will take the same liberty with me that I have done with him—he will correct my mistake.

3.13.5 1. Congress may, even in time of peace, raise an army of 100,000 men, whom they may canton through the several states, and billet out on the inhabitants, in order to serve as necessary instruments in executing their decrees.

2. Upon the inhabitants of any state proving refractory to the will of Congress, or upon any other pretence whatsoever, Congress may call out even all the militia of as many states as they think proper, and keep them in actual service, without pay, as long as they please, subject to the utmost rigor of military discipline, corporal punishment, and death itself not excepted.

3. Congress may levy and collect a capitation or poll tax, to what amount they shall think proper; of which the poorest taxable in the state must pay as much as the richest.

4. Congress may, under the sanction of that clause in the constitution which empowers them to regulate commerce, authorize the importation of slaves, even into those states where this iniquitous trade is, or may be prohibited by their laws or constitution.

5. Congress may, under the sanction of that clause which empowers them to lay and collect duties (as distinct from imposts and excises) impose so heavy a stamp-duty on newspapers and other periodical publications, as shall effectually prevent all necessary information to the people through these useful channels of intelligence.

6. Congress may, by imposing a duty on foreigners coming into the country, check the progress of its population; and after a few years they may prohibit altogether, not only the emigration of foreigners into our country, but also that of our own citizens to any other country.

7. Congress may withhold, as long as they shall think proper, all information respecting their proceedings from the people.

8. Congress may order the elections for members of their own body, in the several states, to be held at what times, in what places, and in what manner they shall think proper. Thus, in Pennsylvania, they may order the elections to be held in the middle of winter, at the city of Philadelphia; by which means the inhabitants of nine tenths of the state will be effectually (tho constitutionally) deprived of the exercise of their right of suffrage.

9. Congress may, in their courts of judicature, abolish trial by jury, in civil cases, altogether; and even in criminal cases, trial by a jury of the vicinage is not secured by the constitution—A crime committed at Fort-Pitt may be tried by a jury of the citizens of Philadelphia.

10. Congress may, if they shall think it for the "general welfare," establish an uniformity in religion throughout the United States. Such establishments have been thought necessary, and have accordingly taken place in almost all the other countries in the world, and will, no doubt, be thought equally necessary in this.

11. Though I believe it not generally so understood, yet certain it is, that Congress may emit paper money, and even make it a legal tender throughout the United States, and, what is still worse, may, after it shall have depreciated in the hands of the people, call it in by taxes, at any rate of depreciation (compared with gold and silver) which they may think proper.

For though no state can emit bills of credit, or pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, yet the Congress themselves are under no constitutional restraints on these points.

12. The number of representatives which will compose the principal branch of Congress is so small as to occasion general complaint; Congress, however, have no power to encrease the number of representatives, but may reduce it even to one fifth part of the present arrangement.

13. On the other hand—No state can call forth its militia even to suppress any insurrection or domestic violence which may take place among its own citizens—This power is, by the constitution, vested in Congress.

14. No state can compel one of its own citizens to pay a debt due to a citizen of a neighbouring state. Thus a Jersey-man will be unable to recover the price of a turkey, sold in the Philadelphia market, if the purchaser shall be inclined to dispute, without commencing an action in one of the federal courts.

15. No state can encourage its own manufactures either by prohibiting, or even laying a duty on the importation of foreign articles.

16. No state can given relief to insolvent debtors, however distressing their situation may be; since Congress will have the exclusive right of establishing uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States; and the particular states are expressly prohibited from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

1. The three essays by A Freeman appeared in the Pennsylvania Gazette 23 January, 30 January, 6 February 1788; and in the Pennsylvania Packet 25 January, 31 January, and 7 February 1788. Addressed to the Minority of the Convention of Pennsylvania, they were a sober attempt to show that the states and their governments were necessary to the execution of the new Constitution itself; that the states were left with vast powers, far exceeding those of any mere administrative subdivisions; and that the Constitution was not intended to and would not in fact result in an entire consolidation of the United States into one government.

The Fallacies of the Freeman Detected by A Farmer

(PHILADELPHIA) FREEMAN'S JOURNAL
April 1788

This essay by A [Pennsylvania] Farmer is a good, strongly argued piece, more theoretical than most of the Anti-Federalist essays, and containing a substantial discussion of the principles of true federalism, largely patterned after Montesquieu. Like Deliberator, this author is replying to the essays of A Freeman (Tench Coxe), which contend that the new Constitution provides for a genuine federal government.[1] The main argument is that a truly federal republic is one in which the constituent parts exercise sovereign powers, but that the states under the Constitution will exercise only ministerial powers. A Farmer divides his essay into six parts. He explains "the nature of sovereignty" (3.14.2–5), "of a federal republic" (3.14.6–8), and "of a consolidated government" (3.14.9–10). His scheme then calls for discussions of "the nature of ministerial agency" and the "address to the minority," which are treated somewhat less systematically in the course of an examination of the powers of the federal government under the new Constitution (3.14.11–13) and the powers left to the states (3.14.14–19). The essay ends with some general observations on the unwisdom of relying on the virtue of rulers, on the illegal character of the proceedings and proposals of the Philadelphia Convention, and on the haste and impropriety of Federalist activities in Pennsylvania and elsewhere.

Like several of the Pennsylvania Anti-Federalist pieces, A Farmer's essay appeared almost simultaneously in the Freeman's Journal (16 April and 23 April 1788) and the Independent Gazetteer (18 April and 22 April 1788). It is reprinted here from the former.

1. See above, Deliberator 3.13 intro. n. 1.

Some weeks since there was published in the Carlisle Gazette an Address to the Minority of the late Convention of this State, under the signature of a Freeman, which I then supposed had been written by some well-meaning person of that place, who had not yet entered the porch of political knowl- 3.14.1

edge, who was unacquainted with the nature of sovereignty, and incapable of distinguishing ministerial agency from the exercise of sovereignty; I therefore took no especial notice of it, until happening to see a Philadelphia Newspaper, I found the Address had originated there, and was ascribed to a gentleman who is far from being ignorant, as I had candidly supposed the author to be, but who hath habituated himself to presume much upon the supposed ignorance of the people, and whose expectations of future support and grandeur hath probably been very influential in framing and promoting the proposed system of government:[1]—Upon this discovery, I read the Address again with more attention, and resolved to communicate, thro' your useful paper, the result of my observations thereon. I do not, however, design to answer the Address in detail, but to establish and explain such general principles as may assist people in judging for themselves, and have a tendency to detect the sophistry which characterises the performance. In order to do this, I shall explain,

First, The NATURE of SOVEREIGNTY.

Second, Of a FEDERAL REPUBLIC.

Third, Of a CONSOLIDATED GOVERNMENT.

Fourth, The NATURE of MINISTERIAL AGENCY.

Fifth, Examine the ADDRESS to the MINORITY (the occasion of these Enquiries.)

Sixth, Conclude with some GENERAL OBSERVATIONS on the TIMES.

3.14.2 I return to the first then: From the very design that induces men to form a society that has its common interests and to promote and secure which it ought to act in concert, it is necessary that there should be established a public authority, to order and direct what ought to be done by each individual as he stands in relation to the society itself, or to the individual members thereof; and this public authority consisting of that portion of natural liberty which each member surrenders to the society to be exercised for the common advantage, is the sovereignty which is often called political authority. If this sovereignty or political authority be vested in and exercised by the whole people, as in some of the ancient republics, or if it be delegated to representatives chosen by the people from among themselves, as in modern times, the government is called a democracy. If on the contrary the sovereignty be in a particular class of citizens who have not a common interest with the people at large, or body of the nation, it is called an aristocracy;[2] and if in a single person, a monarchy or despotism; and these three kinds may be variously combined and modified as in the British government and others, but every nation that governs itself by its own laws, let the form of government be what it may, is a sovereign state.

3.14.3 Sovereignty therefore consists in the understanding and will of the political society, and this understanding and will is originally and inherently in the people; the society having rested it where and in what manner it pleases, he or they to whom it is delegated is the sovereign and is thus vested with the political understanding and will of the people for their good and advantage solely.

3.14.4 The power of making rules or laws to govern or protect the society is the essence of sovereignty, for by this the executive and judicial powers are directed and controuled, to this every ministerial agent is subservient, and to this all corporate or privileged bodies are subordinate: this power not only regulates the conduct, but disposes of the wealth and commands the force of the nation. To keep this sovereign power therefore in due bounds hath fundamental laws, which we call constitutions and bills of rights, been made and declared. Scarcely hath the wisdom of man, matured by the experience of ages, been able with all the checks, negatives and balances either of ancient or modern invention to prevent abuses of this high sovereign authority.

3.14.5 Here I may possibly be misunderstood; it may perhaps be objected, that in Great Britain the King is called the Sovereign, and that he is an executive and not legislative officer. True, the King of Great Britain is the Supreme Executive of the nation, but it is not this alone that constitutes him a Sovereign; he hath a negative over the Legislative, the laws are made by and with his consent, and are called the King's Laws; he calls, prorogues and dissolves his Parliament when he pleases; the Parliament indeed so manage, that the necessity of the case obliges him to convene them frequently, but he is not obliged to do it by the Constitution; so that, properly speaking, it is the King and Parliament of Great Britain which is sovereign.—However, if the Legislative authority were to be distributed in various portions, that man, or body of men, who should be vested with the sole and uncontrouled power of taxation, would eventually become the Sovereign, for whoever can command our whole property has the means in his power of ruling us as he pleases, because (as Montesquieu says) "sovereignty necessarily follows the power of taxation. (To be Continued.)

3.14.6 Secondly. I shall proceed to define a FEDERAL REPUBLIC:— A Federal Republic is formed by two or more single or consolidated republics, uniting together by a perpetual confederacy, and without ceasing to be distinct states or sovereignties; they form together a federal republic or an empire of states. As individuals in a state of nature surrender a portion of their natural liberty to the society of which they become members, in order to receive in lieu thereof protection and conveniency; so in forming a federal republic the individual states surrender a part of their separate sovereignty to the general government or federal head, in order that, whilst they respectively enjoy internally the freedom and happiness peculiar to free republics, they may possess all that external protection, security, and weight by their confederated resources, that can possibly be obtained in the most extended, absolute monarchies.[4]

3.14.7 The peculiar advantages and distinctive properties of a federal republic are, that each state or member of the confederation may be fully adequate for every local purpose, that it may subsist in a small territory, that the people may have a common interest, possess a competent knowledge of the resources and expenditures of their own particular government, that their immediate representatives in the state governments will know and be known by the citizens, will have a common interest with them, and must bear a part of all the burdens which they may lay upon the people, that they will be responsible to the people, and may be dismissed by them at pleasure; that therefore the government would be a government of confidence and possess sufficient energy without the aid of standing armies, that the collectors of the revenue would at least have the bowels of citizens, and not be the offscourings of Europe, or other states who have no interest in, or attachment to the people; that if one or more of the states should become the prey of internal despotism, or foreign foes, the other states may remain secure under the protection of their own state government; that if some popular and wealthy citizen should have influence enough to attempt the liberties of one state, he might be stopped in his career by the interposition of the others, for his influence could not be equally great in all the states; that if the general government should fail, or be revised or changed, yet the several state governments may remain entire to secure the happiness of the citizens; and that the members of a confederated republic may be encreased to any amount, and consequently its external strength without altering the nature of the government, or endangering the liberty of the citizens.

3.14.8 The perfection of a federal republic consists in drawing the proper line between those objects of sovereignty which are of a general nature, and which ought to be vested in the federal government, and those which are of a more local nature and ought to remain with the particular governments; any rule that can be laid down for this must vary according to the situation and circumstances of the confederating states; yet still this general rule will hold good, viz. that all that portion of sovereignty which involve the common interest of all the confederating states, and which cannot be exercised by the states in their individual capacity without endangering the liberty and welfare of the whole, ought to be vested in the general government, reserving such a proportion of sovereignty in the state governments as would enable them to exist alone, if the general government should fail either by violence or with the common consent of the confederates; the states should respectively have laws, courts, force, and revenues of their own sufficient for their own security; they ought to be fit to keep house alone if necessary;

if this be not the case, or so far as it ceases to be so, it is a departure from a federal to a consolidated government; and this brings me to the next particular, which is to shew what is meant by a consolidated government.[5]

where a single society or nation forms one entire separate government, and possess the whole sovereign power; this is a consolidated or national government. Whether a government be of a monarchical, aristocratical or democratical nature, it doth not alter the case, it is either a federal or a consolidated government, there being no medium as to kind.—The absoluteness of a despotic sovereignty is often restricted by corporate bodies, who are vested with peculiar privileges and franchises—and by a just distribution of the executive and ministerial powers; but although these may contribute to the happiness of the people, yet they do not change the nature of the government. Indeed, monarchies can never form a federal government; they may enter into alliances with each other; for monarchy cannot be divested of a competent proportion of sovereignty to form a general government without changing its nature. It is only free republics that can completely and safely form a federal republic; I say free republics, for there are republics who are not free, such as Venice, where a citizen carrying arms is punished with instant death, and where even the nobles dare not converse with strangers, and scarcely with their friends, and are liable by law to be put to death secretly without trial—or Poland which, in much the same words that are expressed in the new system, is by a league with the neighbouring powers guaranteed to be forever independent and of a republican form; yet a writer of their own says, that the body of the people are scarcely to be distinguished from brutes; and again he says, we have reduced the people of our kingdom by misery to a state of brutes; they drag out their days in stupidity, &c.[6] Free republics are congenial to a federal republic. In order that a republic may preserve its liberty, it must not only have a good form of government, but it must be of small extent; for if it possess extensive territory, it would be ruined by internal imperfection. The authority of government in a large republic does not equally pervade all the parts; nor are the political advantages equally enjoyed by the citizens remote from the capital as by those in the vicinity; combinations consequently prevail among the members of the legislature, and this introduces corruption and is destructive of that confidence in government, without which a free republic cannot be supported; besides, the high influential trusts which must be vested in the great officers of state, would at particular times endanger the government, and are necessarily destructive of that equality among the citizens, which is the only permanent basis of a republic; in short, the diversity of the situation, habits, manners, and interests of the people in an extensive dominion, subjects the government to a thousand accidents, which would embarrass a republican government. The experience of nations and the nature of things, sufficiently prove, that the government of a single person, aided by armies and controuling influence, is necessary to govern a large consolidated empire.

3.14.10 And on the other hand, if the territory be small, the republic is liable to be destroyed by external force, therefore, reason and observation points out a confederation of republics, as the only method to preserve internal freedom, together with external strength and respectability.—Small republics forming a federal republic on these principles, may be resembled to divers small ropes plaited together to make a large and strong one, if the latter is untwisted, the small ropes are still useful as such, but if the former are untwisted, they are reduced to hemp, the original state.

3.14.11 To apply these principles to our present situation without respect to the proposed plan of government; in order to render the federal government adequate to the exigencies of the confederating states, it is necessary not only that the general government should be properly constructed in its forms, but that it should be vested with powers relative to all the federal objects of government, these objects are not only the powers of making peace and war, &c. but also with the power of making treaties respecting commerce, regulating and raising revenues therefrom, &c. to make requisitions of money when necessity requires it, from each of the states, and a certain well described power of compelling delinquent states to pay up their quota of such requisitions. Perhaps if each state had its own share of the domestic debt quotaed, so as they might each pay their own citizens, the general revenues would be sufficient for the other demands of the union in times of peace, if the government itself be not made too expensive by too great a number of officers being created. Congress ought, however, to have all powers which cannot be exercised by one state, without endangering the other states, such as the power of raising troops, treating with foreign nations, &c.—The power of levying imposts, will, by the particular states, be irregularly exercised, and the revenue in a great degree lost or misapplied, therefore, it ought not to be left with the states, but under proper checks, vested in the general government. All these the minority were amongst the foremost willing to have vested in the federal head, and more than this, had never been asked by Congress, nor proposed by the greatest advocates for congressional power, nor is more than this consistent with the nature of a federal republic. When the existing confederation was adopted, powers were given with a sparing hand, and perhaps, not improperly at that period, until experience should point out the discriminating line with sufficient experience, well knowing that it is easy for a government to obtain an encrease of power when common utility points out the propriety, but that powers once vested in a government, however dangerous they may prove, are rarely recovered without bloodshed, and even that awful method of regaining lost liberty is seldom effectual. It is now however evident that the power of regulating commerce, being of a general nature, ought to belong to the general government, and the burthen of debt incurred by the revolution hath rendered a general revenue necessary, for this purpose imposts upon articles of importation present themselves, not only as a productive source of revenue, but as a revenue for which the governments of the particular states are for well known reasons, imcompetent.—The danger of entrusting a government so far out of the people's reach as Congress must necessarily be, strongly impressed the public mind about four or five years since, but now a conviction of the advantage and probable safety of such a measure, pervades almost every mind, and none are more willing for putting it in operation, under proper guards, than the opposers of the new system; they are also willing to admit what the majority of the states may judge proper checks in the form of the general government, as far as those checks, or the distribution of powers and responsibility of those who be vested with those powers, may be consistent with the security of the essential sovereignty of the respective states. The minority of the convention[7] (who I really believe, in their address, express the serious sentiments of the majority of this state) opposed vesting such powers in Congress as can be most effectually exercised by the state governments in a full consistency with the general interests of the confederating states, and which, not being of a general nature, are not upon federal principles, objects of the federal government, I mean the power of capitation, or poll tax, by which the head, or in other words, the existence of every person is put in their power by the new system as a property, subject to any price or tax that may be judged proper; I do not mean to say that this implies the power of life and death, although it certainly implies the power of selling the property, or if none is to be had, of imprisoning or selling the person for a servant, who doth not chuse, or is not able to pay the poll tax; the minority also objected to vesting Congress with power to tax the property, real and personal of the citizens of the several states, to what amount, and in what manner it may please, without any check or controul upon its discretion; also to the unlimitted power over the excise; if this could extend only to spirituous liquors as is usual with us, the danger would be less, but the power of excise extends to every thing we eat, drink, or wear, and in Europe it is thus extensively put in practice. Under the term duties, every species of indirect taxes is included, but it especially means the power of levying money upon printed books, and written instruments.

The Congress, by the proposed system, have the power of borrowing money to what amount they may judge proper, consequently to mortgage all our estates, and all our sources of revenue. The exclusive power of emmitting bills of credit is also reserved to Congress. They have, moreover, the power of instituting courts of justice without tryal by jury, except in criminal cases, and under such regulations as Congress may think proper to decide, not only in such cases as arise out of all the foregoing powers, but in the other cases which are enumerated in the system. 3.14.12

3.14.13 The absolute sovreignty in all the foregoing instances, as well as several others not here enumerated, are vested in the general government, without being subject to any constitutional check or controul from the state governments.

3.14.14 It remains to examine the nature of the powers which are left with the states, and on this subject it is not necessary to follow Freeman through the numerous detail of particulars with which he confuses the reader. I shall examine only a few of the more considerable. The Freeman in his 2d Number, after mentioning in a very delusory manner divers powers which remain with the states, he says we shall find many other instances under the constitution which require or imply the existence or continuance of the sovereignty and severalty of the states; he as well as all the advocates of the new system, take as their strong ground the election of senators by the state legislatures, and the special representation of the states in the federal senate, to prove that internal sovereignty still remains with the states; therefore they say that the new system is so far from annihilating the state governments, that it secures them, that it cannot exist without them, that the existence of the one is essential to the existence of the other.[8] It is true that this particular partakes strongly of that mystery which is characteristic of the system itself; but if I demonstrate that this particular, so far from implying the continuance of the state sovereignties, proves in the clearest manner the want of it, I hope the other particular powers will not be necessary to dwell upon.

3.14.15 The state legislatures do not chuse senators by legislative or sovereign authority, but by a power of ministerial agency as mere electors or boards of appointment; they have no power to direct the senators how or what duties they shall perform; they have neither power to censure the senators, nor to supercede them for misconduct. It is not the power of chusing to office merely that designates sovereignty, or else corporations who appoint their own officers and make their own bye-laws, or the heads of department who chuse the officers under them, such as commanders of armies, &c. may be called sovereigns, because they can name men to office whom they cannot dismiss therefrom. The exercise of sovereignty does not consist in chusing masters, such as the senators would be, who, when chosen, would be beyond controul, but in the power of dismissing, impeaching, or the like, those to whom authority is delegated. The power of instructing or superceding of delegates to Congress under the existing confederation, hath never been complained of, altho' the necessary rotation of members of Congress hath often been censured for restraining the state sovereignties too much in the objects of their choice. As well may the electors who are to vote for the president under the new constitution, be said to be vested with the sovereignty, as the state legislatures in the act of chusing senators. The senators are not even dependent on the states for their wages, but in conjunction with the federal representatives establish their own wages. The senators do not vote by states, but as individuals. The representatives also vote as individuals, representing people in a consolidated or national government; they judge upon their own elections, and, with the senate, have the power of regulating elections in time, place and manner, which is in other words to say, that they have the power of elections absolutely vested in them.

3.14.16 That the state governments have certain ministerial and convenient powers continued to them is not denied, and in the exercise of which they may support, but cannot controul the general government, nor protect their own citizens from the exertions of civil or military tyranny, and this ministerial power will continue with the states as long as two-thirds of Congress shall think their agency necessary; but even this will be no longer than two-thirds of Congress shall think proper to propose, and use the influence of which they would be so largely possessed to remove it.[9]

3.14.17 But these powers, of which the Freeman gives us such a profuse detail, and in describing which he repeats the same powers with only varying the terms, such as the powers of officering and training the militia, appointing state officers, and governing in a number of internal cases, do not any of them separately, nor all taken together, amount to independent sovereignty; they are powers of mere ministerial agency, which may, and in many nations of Europe, are or have been vested, as before observed, in heads of departments, hereditary vassals of the crown, or in corporations; but not that kind of independent sovereignty which can constitute a member of a federal republic, which can enable a state to exist within itself if the general government should cease.

3.14.18 I have often wondered how any writer of sense could have the confidence to avow, or could suppose the people to be ignorant enough to believe, that, when a state is deprived of the power not only of standing armies (this the members of a confederacy ought to be) but of commanding its own militia, regulating its elections, directing or superceding its representatives or paying them their wages; who is, moreover, deprived of the command of any property, I mean source of revenue or taxation, or what amounts to the same thing, who may enact laws for raising revenue, but who may have these laws rendered nugatory, and the execution thereof superceded by the laws of Congress. This is not a strained construction, but the natural operation of the powers of Congress under the new constitution; for every object of revenue, every source of taxation, is vested in the general government. Even the power of making inspection laws, which, for obvious conveniency, is left with the several states, will be unproductive of the smallest revenue to the state governments; for, if any should arise, it is to be paid over to the coffers of Congress;—besides, the words "to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, &c." give, without doubt, the power of repelling or forbidding the execution of any tax law whatever that may interfere with or impede the exercise of the general taxing power, and it would not be possible that two taxing powers should be exercised on the same sources of taxation without interfering with each other. May not the exercise of this power of Congress, when they think proper, operate not only to destroy those ministerial powers which are left with the states, but even the very forms? May they not forbid the state legislatures to levy a shilling to pay themselves, or those whom they employ, days wages? The state governments may contract for making roads (except post-roads) erecting bridges, cutting canals, or any other object of public importance; but when the contract is performed or the work done, may not Congress constitutionally prevent the payment? Certainly they may do all this and much more, and no man would have a right to charge them with breaking the law of their appointment. It is an established maxim, that wherever the whole power of the revenue or taxation is vested, there virtually is the whole effective, influential, sovereign power, let the forms be what they may: By this armies are procured, by this every other controuling guard is defeated. Every balance or check in government is only so far effective as it hath a controul over the revenue.

3.14.19 The state governments are not only destitute of all sovereign command of, or controul over, the revenue or any part of it, but they are divested of the power of commanding, or prescribing the duties, wages, or punishments of their own militia, or of protecting their life, property or characters from the rigours of martial law. The power of making treason laws is both a flower[10] and an important defence of sovereignty; it is relative to and inseparable from it; to convince the states that they are consolidated into one national government, this power is wholly to be assumed by the general government.[11] All the prerogatives, all the essential characteristics of sovereignty, both of the internal and external kind, are vested in the general government, and consequently the several states would not be possessed of any essential power, or effective guard of sovereignty.

3.14.20 Thus I apprehend, it is evident that the consolidation of the states, into one national government (in contradistinction from a confederacy) would be the necessary consequence of the establishment of the new constitution, and the intention of its framers—and that consequently the state sovereignties would be eventually annihilated, though the forms may long remain as expensive and burthensome remembrances, of what they were in the days when (although labouring under many disadvantages) they emancipated this country from foreign tyranny, humbled the pride, and tarnished the glory of royalty, and erected a triumphant standard to liberty and independence.

3.14.21 It is not my present object to decide, whether the government is a good or a bad one, it is only to prove in support of the minority, that the new system does not in reality, whatever its appearances may be, constitute a federal but a consolidated government.—From the distinguishing characteristics of these two kinds of government which I have stated, some assistance perhaps may be derived in judging which of them would be most suitable to our circumstances, and the best calculated to promote and secure the liberty and welfare of these United States.

A few general observations shall conclude this essay. It is commonly said by the friends of the system, that the dangers which we point out are imaginary; that we ought to depend more upon the virtue of those who shall exercise those powers; that we talk as if we supposed men would be possessed of a daemon as soon as they should be vested with the proposed powers, &c. I shall in answer thereto join with a sensible reasoner in saying, that I will not abuse the new Congress until it exists, nor then until it misbehaves, nor then unless I dare; but it is a fact, that all governments that have ever been instituted amongst men, have degenerated and abused their power, and why we should conceive better of the proposed Congress than of all governments who have gone before us, I don't know; it is certainly incumbent on the supporters of this system, first to prove either that the uniform testimony of history, and experience of society, is false, or else that the new system will have the divine influence to inspire those who exercise the powers which it provides, with wisdom and virtue in an infallible degree. Surely the conduct of the framers and promoters of the new constitution, do not present mankind as more worthy of confidence now, than they have been in other periods of society. For proof of this let us examine facts. The legislature of the various states, elected members for a federal convention, without having authority for that purpose from their constituents; this gave no alarm, as necessity perhaps justified the measure, but how dangerous is the smallest precedent of usurped power, for the general convention when met, far out did the example—they were strictly bound by the law of their appointment to revise the confederation; the additional powers with which it ought to have been vested were generally understood, and would have been universally submitted to. This convention not only neglected the duty of their appointment, but assumed a power of the most extraordinary kind, they proceeded to destroy the very government which they were solemnly enjoined to strengthen and improve, and framed a system (to say no worse of it) that was destructive not only of the form, but of the nature of the government whose foundations were laid in the plighted faith and whose superstructure was cemented with the best blood of the United States. The legislature of this state, whose leading members were also self-chosen members of the general convention, no sooner had it in their power, than notwithstanding the solemn trust reposed in them, and still more solemn oath to preserve the constitution of this state inviolate, proceeded upon the expected last day of their session to call a convention, in order to adopt the proposed system of government before the people could be acquainted with it; and to carry this into execution, they added violence to perfidy, and by the aid of mob compelled members, sanctified by their presence, that usurped exertion of power, which their faith and trust obliged them to discountenance. The consequence was, that about one-sixth of the citizens only obeyed the irregular call of the assembly, and elected members to the state convention: one-third of those members, and who were chosen by nearly one-half of the voters who did elect, voted against the adoption of the new constitution, and being refused the right of entering their testimony on the minutes, laid their conduct and their reasons before their constituents. About five out of six of the people, whether disdaining to obey a call which neither the general convention or assembly were authorised to make, or whether being taken by surprise, they were not sufficiently informed to act with decision, and therefore did not choose to act at all: I cannot tell, but so it is, that they have not yet publicly declared their sentiments for, nor have done any thing in favor of the proposed system: In this situation Pennsylvania hath adopted the system. It is a very serious question, whether supposing nine states had agreed to it in this manner, the system would be practicable, whether general confidence would not be necessary unless we had greater resources. In addition to Pennsylvania, Georgia, Delaware, New-Jersey, and Connecticut, have also adopted the system; these states are not only small, but in a high degree delinquent, and there is no provision made in the new constitution to compel delinquent states or persons to make up their deficiencies. The convention of Massachusetts have adopted the system with a solemn disapprobation, they have pointed out amendments on the same parchment with the act of ratification, and have solemnly enjoined those who may be the first deputies in the new Congress, to exert their every endeavours to have these amendments made part of the constitution, and to add weight to them, they have officially requested Pennsylvania and the other states to concur in the propositions of amendment. The New-Hampshire convention have, on motion of the friends of the system, adjourned until June, in order to prevent an immediate rejection, which otherwise was unavoidable, the adjournment was carried by only three voices. At present there is and will for some months be a solemn and serious pause, a time of deliberation, the result of which will fill an important page in the history of human society. For my own part I think the heaviest clouds are dispersed, and the gloomy darkness admits the chearing rays of hope, which promise meridian splendour to the sun of liberty. Most of those who were from the best motives friends to the system, have penetrated the shade of mystery in which it was wrapped, they see the snares, and discover the delusions with which it is replete, they see that every other system of government whether good or bad, is easy to be understood, but that this system excels all of the kind which hath come to their knowledge in darkness and ambiguity; they have been informed too, that this mysterious veil was the fruit of deliberation and design.

3.14.23 Whilst posts are prevented from carrying intelligence, whilst newspapers are made the vehicles of deception, and dark intrigue employs the avaricious office-hunters, who long to riot on the spoils of their country, the great body of the people are coolly watching the course of the times, and determining to preserve their liberties, and to judge for themselves by the principles of reason and common sense, and not by the weight of names.

A Farmer.

1. The author is probably referring to Centinel, who attributed the essays of A Freeman to James Wilson, apparently incorrectly. See above, Deliberator 3.13 intro. n. 1.

2. Cf. Publius' definition of faction as "a number of citizens, whether amounting to a majority or minority of the whole, who are united and actuated by some common impulse of passion, or of interest, adverse to the rights of other citizens or to the permanent and aggregate interests of the community." The Federalist no. 10, 57.

3. This passage has not been located in Montesquieu's writings.

4. James Wilson made arguments very much like this, in both the Constitutional Convention and the Pennsylvania ratifying convention. Farrand I, 166 (8 June) and McMaster and Stone 227. For other Federalist statements of this kind see Federal Farmer XVII, 2.8.204 n. 123. References to Anti-Federal opposition to consolidation are collected in A Plebeian 6.11.15 n. 9.

5. A Farmer adds usefully to the Anti-Federalist discussion of federalism with his notion of a capacity in the states to keep house alone, if necessary. Of course, the great difficulty remains of a possible conflict between this principle and the principle of resting the protection of the common interests on the general government. Cf. Brutus VI, 2.9.80 n. 56; Monroe 5.21.17 n. 8. For other Anti-Federalist discussion of the meaning of federalism see Federal Farmer 1, 2.8.10 n. 9.

7. See above, 3.11.

8. A Freeman goes so far as to argue that "Every state can always give its dissent to foederal bills, as each has a vote in the Senate secured by the constitution. Hence it appears, that the State governments are not only intended to remain in force within their respective jurisdictions, but they are always to be known to, and to have their voices, as states, in the foederal councils." Pennsylvania Gazette 30 January 1788. For Federalist arguments that the states will not be destroyed see Centinel II, 2.7.36 n. 16.

9. See Federal Farmer X, 2.8.133 n. 84.

10. In their reprinting of this essay McMaster and Stone change this to "power" (McMaster and Stone 543), but both the Freeman's Journal and the Independent Gazetteer have "flower," which is probably what the author intended.

11. A Freeman assumes, on the contrary, that the states would continue to have the power to make treason laws. "So independent will the state governments remain, that their laws may, and in some instances will, be severer than those of the union. Treason against the United States, for instance, cannot be attended with confiscation and corruption of blood; but by the existing laws of all the states, the unoffending families of attainted persons, stripped of all hereditary rights, and condemned to the bitter portion of extreme poverty, are left without their friend and parent, to meet the trials of the world alone: An awful monument of the sovereign and avenging power of their native state. Let the Representative or senator who may meditate the annihilation of the government of his state duly consider this, before it be too late." Pennsylvania Gazette, 6 February 1788.

Essay by None of the Well-Born Conspirators

(PHILADELPHIA) FREEMAN'S JOURNAL
23 April 1788

None of the Well-Born Conspirators denies that the advocates of the new Constitution are "federalists" in the proper sense, though their use of the term, which can also mean "conspirators," ironically points to their true character, which is conspirators against the rights and privileges of the many.

3.15.1 In public disquisitions, especially political controversies, one of the parties generally adopt some cant word or phrase, whereby they may be distinguished from their opponents; and what renders the circumstance remarkably curious, the word or phrase is nineteen times out of twenty wrong applied. Thus in the party politics of Britain, under one administration candor was their shibbolith, when the most abusive, uncandid, and dirty-mouthed scoundrels in the kingdom were the favorites of court; under another, economy, was the watch-word, yet profuseness and prodigality in public concerns, was then at their no plus ultra; again national honor, was bazed about, when not a fragment of honor, principle, or even national courage could be traced at court; this was in Lord North's ever memorable administration. Now in an exact agreement with this plan, one of our American political parties, are incessantly bellowing out, federalism, federal measures, federal gentlemen, etc. etc.[1]

3.15.2 If the words, Federal, Federalism, etc. are to be taken in their general and common acceptations, as derived from Foedas, a league, or covenant, entered into for the mutual advantage of all; there cannot be found a greater abuse of words than in this instance; for our modern federalists, namely, the advocates of the new constitution, evidently aim at nothing but the elevation and aggrandizement of a few over the many. The liberty, property and every social comfort in life of the yeomanry in America, are to be sacrificed at the altar of tyranny. Federalism then taken in this sense must imply something very remote from its original natural import; it must, (and truly there is no help for saying it) signify a league entered into against the sacred liberties of the people; that is in plain terms a conspiracy; and this is the fifth signification of the word Foedas, given by Ainsworth in his excellent Latin dictionary.[2] Perhaps the consciences of the conspirators in the dark conclave urged them to assume a name which might be in some measure a key to disclose their perfidy. Conscience is a stern arbiter, and often compels us to witness against ourselves. Accompanied by such a faithful monitor the abettors of despotism adopted an epithet that should, when perfectly understood, be the true index to their base intentions. Take the word Federalism directly or indirectly, and it amounts neither to more nor less in its modern acceptation than a conspiracy of the Well-born few, against the sacred rights and privileges of their fellow citizens.

None of the Well-Born Conspirators.

The Government of Nature Delineated or An Exact Picture of the New Federal Constitution by Aristocrotis

Carlisle 1788

"The Government of Nature Delineated" is an exaggerated satire, yet there are several unusual and telling arguments. And if the essay's language, grammar, and spelling are crude, the mind behind it is keener than those behind some of the better-mannered pieces. Aiming at, although not himself of, the vulgar, Aristocrotis treats the theme of government "according to nature" as the Federalists see it; and he is particularly interesting on the issues of a natural aristocracy (3.16.3,5), the purposes of the congressional power to raise taxes (3.16.6–8), and religion (3.16.14–15). The piece was printed as a pamphlet in 1788 (in Carlisle, by Kline and Reynolds) apparently (from references in the appendix) in March or April.

DEDICATION

To his serenity the right respectable, most honourable highly renowned J[AME]S W[ILSO]N, political hackney writer to the most lucrative order of the bank, patronee of the most illusstrious R[OBER]T M[ORRI]S, and principal fabricator of the New Constitution.

Sir,

As your distinguished docility to the well-born, and the partial friendship of the great man, your patron, hath lugged you into all the honorary missions and dignified appointments of the nation, these several years past, and turned the eyes of all the full-blooded gentry in America towards you, as the only person fitted by nature to organize the government upon true despotic principles, I therefore beg leave to offer this small sacrifice to your vanity (an innate virtue of all our fraternity), upon the altar of adulation. It is true, the unwearied assiduity, and indefatigable zeal with which you served your friends, and pushed forward the rising grandeur of our party hath procured you the hatred of the people; but you know, Sir, to be hated by the vulgar is a compliment to your understanding, a mark of honour. Let me congratulate you, illustrious sir, on the nigh prospect of having all your numerous lucubrations, unremitted studies, and well concerted schemes happily realized beyond your most sanguine expectations, as an ample reward for all your services and sufferings, the time of your deliverance draweth nigh; the reparation of your shattered fortune, and your emancipation from a state of servile dependance upon bankers and brokers is just at hand; the adoption of the constitution is making rapid progress, and it is hoped will soon receive the finishing stroke, and then sir, you may take an everlasting farewell of poverty. The great influx of treasure from every corner of the land, into the ten miles square, will fill your coffers, and if possible, satiate the cravings of your pecuniary appetite. Now, as in times past, you have been a willing instrument, and ready minion to others; so then, in their turn, others will cringe at your nod, and bow at your image, will beg and pray to participate a share of the pensions, perquisites, sinecures and salaries, with all the tribe of lucrative offices, which will then be at your disposal. 3.16.1

I would entreat you, dear sir, that when you arrive at the summit of your desires, you would deign to look back to your former condition, and make some provision for the relief of your insolvent brethen in time to come: that you would procure congress to constitute the ten miles square into a Sanctum-Sanctorum, a place of refuge for well born bankrupts, to shelter themselves and property from the rapacity of their persecuting creditors. You know, sir, in the capital of your native country, there is an asylum similar to this, of great utility to unfortunate debtors. As I have selected you from the whole group of illustrious names which embellished the new constitution, for the patron of my first essay, and have honoured you with this public dedication; it is to be hoped, when you come to your kingdom, you will remember these marks of respect—I remain, sir, with great solicitude for your elevation. 3.16.2

Aristocrotis.

3.16.3 The present is an active period; Europe is in a ferment breaking their constitutions, America is in a similar state, making a constitution—For this valuable purpose a convention was appointed, consisting of such as excelled in wisdom and knowledge, who met in Philadelphia last May. For my own part, I was so smitten with the character of the members, that I had assented to their production, while it was yet in embrio; and I make no doubt but every good republican did so too; but how great was my surprize, when it appeared with such a venerable train of names annexed to its tail, to find some of the people under different signatures; such as Centinel, Old Whig, Brutus, etc., daring to oppose it, and that too with barefaced arguments, obstinate reason and stubborn truth. This is certainly a piece of the most extravagant impudence to presume to contradict the collected wisdom of the United States; or to suppose a body, who engrossed the whole wisdom of the continent, was capable of erring. I expected the superior character of the convention would have secured it from profane sallies of a plebeian's pen; and its inherent infaliability, debarred the interference of impertinent reason or truth. It was too great an act of condescension to permit the people, by their state conventions, "to assent and ratify," what the grand convention prescribed to them; but to enquire into its principles, or investigate its properties, was a presumption too daring to escape resentment. Such licentious conduct practised by the people, is a striking proof of our feeble governments, and calls aloud for the pruning knife, viz. the establishment of some proper plan of discipline. This the convention, in the depth of their united wisdom hath prescribed, which when established, will certainly put a stop to the growing evil. A consciousness of this, is, no doubt, the cause which stimulates the people to oppose it with so much vehemence; they deprecate the idea of being confined within their proper sphere; they cannot endure the thoughts of being obliged to mind their own business, and leave the affairs of government to those whom nature hath destined to rule. I say nature, for it is a fundamental principle, as clear as an axiom, that nature hath placed proper degrees and subordinations amongst mankind, and ordained a few* to rule, and many to obey.—I am not obliged

*If any person is so stupidly dull as not to discern who these few are, I would refer such to nature herself for information.—Let them observe her ways and be wise. Let them mark those men whom she hath endued with the necessary qualifications of authority; such as the dictatorial air, the magisterial voice, the imperious tone, the haughty countenance, the lofty look, the magestic mien. Let them consider those whom she hath taught to command with authority, but comply with disgust, to be fond of sway, but impatient of controul; to consider themselves as Gods and all the rest of mankind as two legged brutes. Now it is evident that the possessors of these divine qualities must have been ordained by nature to dominion and empire; for it would be blasphemy against her supreme highness to suppose that she confers her gifts in vain. Fortune hath also distinguished those upon whom nature hath imprinted the lineaments of authority. She hath heaped her favours and lavished her gifts upon to prove this principal; because it would be madness in the extreme to attempt to prove a self-evident truth; but with all due submission to the infaliable wisdom of the grand convention, let me presume to examine whether they have not, in the new plan of government, inviolably adhered to this supreme principle.—The exhorbitant power, which the people of this country possess, of electing their rulers, is directly repugnant to this superlative principle of nature, and tends to the subversion of all order and good government; for they may and often do advance those men to be rulers, whom nature had ordained for subjects, and to neglect the natural rulers. This is a gross inversion of the law of nature, and ought to be cashiered; but the vulgar opinion is so strong in favour of this unnatural practice, that it would be dangerous to divest them of it all at once. It might enflame their turbulent minds, and excite them to commit some outrageous action, in support of what they have been taught to consider as their "natural, inherent, and unalienable rights."—The venerable convention foresaw this, and accomodated their plan to humour these mistaken notions of the people, so far as was consistent with the honour, dignity and rights of the more illustrious descended, whose title to rule is founded on the law of nature.

In article first, section first, of the new plan, it is declared, "that all legislative powers herein granted, shall be vested in a congress of the united states; which shall consist of a senate"—very right, quite agreeable to nature; "and house of representatives"—not quite so right—This is a palpable compliance with the humours and corrupt practices of the times—but what follows in section 2d is still worse: "the house of representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year, by the people of the several states": this is a most dangerous power, and must soon produce fatal and pernicious consequences, were it not circumscribed and poised by proper checks and ballances: but in this is displayed the unparalleled sagacity of the august convention; that when such bulwarks of prejudice surrounded the evil, so as to render it both difficult and dangerous to attack it by assault and storm, they have invested and barricaded it so closely as will certainly deprive it of its baneful influence and prevent its usual incroachments;—they have likewise stationed their miners and sapers so judiciously, that they will certainly, in process of time, intirely reduce and demolish this obnoxious practice of popular election. There is a small thrust given to it in the body of the conveyance itself. The term of holding elections, is every two years; this is much better than the detestable mode of annual elections, so fatal to energy; however, if nothing more than this were done, it would still remain an insupportable inconvenience; but in section the 4th it is provided, that congress by law may alter and make such reg- 3.16.4

those very persons whom nature delighteth to honour: indeed instinct hath taught those men that authority is their natural right, and therefore they grasp at it with an eagerness bordering on rapacity.

ulations with respect to the times, places, and manner of holding elections, as to them seemeth fit and proper: this is certainly a very salutory provision, most excellently adapted to counter-ballance the great, and apparently dangerous concessions made to the plebians in the first and second sections, with such a prudent restriction as this they are quite harmless: no evil can arise from them, if congress have only the sagacity and fortitude, to avail themselves of the power they possess by this section: for when the stated term (for which the primary members was elected) is nigh expired, congress may appoint next election to be held in one place in each state; and so as not to give the rabble needless disgust, they may appoint the most central place for that purpose. They can never be at a loss for an ostensible reason, to vary and shift from place to place until they may fix it at any extremity of the state it suits. This will be the business of the senate, to observe the particular places in each state, where their influence is most extensive, and where the inhabitants are most obsequious to the will of their superiors; and there appoint the elections to be held. By this means, such members will be returned, to the house of representatives (as it is called) as the president and senate shall be pleased to recommend, and they, no doubt, will recommend such gentlemen only as are distinguished by some peculiar federal feature; so that unanimity and concord will shine conspicuous through every branch of government. This section is ingeniously calculated, and must have been intended by the convention to exterminate electioneering entirely; for by putting the time of election in the hands of congress, they have thereby given them a power to perpetuate themselves when they shall find it safe and convenient to make the experiment. For though a preceding clause says, "that representatives shall be chosen for two years, and senators for six years"; yet this clause being subsequent annuls the former, and puts it in the power of congress, (when some favourable juncture intervenes) to alter the time to four and twelve years. This cannot be deemed an unconstitutional stretch of power, for the constitution in express terms, puts the time of holding elections in their power, and certainly they are the proper judges when to exert that power: thus by doubling the period from time to time, its extent will soon be rendered coeval with the life of man; and it is but a very short and easy transition from this to hereditary succession, which is most agreeable to the institutions of nature, who in all her works, hath ordained the descendant of every species of beings to succeed its immediate progenitor, in the same actions, ends and order.

3.16.5 The indefatigable labourious ass, never aspires to the honours, or assumes the employment of the sprightly warlike steed, nor does he ever pretend that it is his right to succeed him in all his offices, and dignities, because he bears some resemblance to the defunct in his figure and nature. The lamma, though useful enough for the purposes for which he was intended by nature, is every way incompetent to perform the offices of the elephant; nor does he ever pretend to usurp his elevated station. Every species of beings, animate and inanimate, seem fully satisfied with the station assigned them by nature; but perverse, obstinate man, he alone spurns at her institutions, and inverts her order,* he alone repines at his situation, and endeavours to usurp the station of his superiors. But this digression has led me from the subject in hand. I was treating of the powers congress possesses over elections. I have already discussed this point so far as the times and places are concerned. The next object that presents itself is the power which the new constitution gives to congress to regulate the manner of elections. The common practice of voting at present is by ballot; by this mode it is impossible for a gentleman to know how he is served by his dependant, who may be possessed of a vote; therefore this mode must be speedily altered for that of viva voce, which will secure to a rich man all the votes of his numerous dependants and friends and their dependants. By this means he may command any office in the gift of the people, which he pleases to set up for. This will answer a good end while electioneering exists; and will likewise contribute something towards its destruction. A government founded agreeable to nature must be intirely independant; that is, it must be beyond the reach of annoyance or controul from every power on earth. Now in order to render it thus, several things are necessary.

1st. The means of their own support must be within the immediate reach 3.16.6 of rulers: for this purpose they must possess the sole power of taxation. As this is a principal article, it ought, in all things to have pre-eminence; and therfore the convention has placed it in front. "The congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes [,] duties, imposts and excises," so that they shall never be at a loss for money while there is a shilling on the continent, for their power to procure it is as extensive as their desires; and so it ought, because they can never desire any thing but is good and salutary; for there is no doubt but the convention will transfer their infallability to the new congress, and so secure them from doing evil. This power of taxation will answer many valuable purposes, besides the support of government. In the first place, in the course of its operation, it will annihilate the relicks of the several state legislations; for every tax which they may lay, will be deemed by congress an infringement upon the federal constitution, which constitution and the laws of congress being paramount to all other authority, will of consequence nullify every inferior law, which the several states may think proper to enact, particularly such as relate to taxes; so that they being deprived of the means of existence, their pretended sovereignties will gradually linger away.

2dly. It will create and diffuse a spirit of industry among the people; they 3.16.7

*This is only to be understood of the inferior class of mankind; the superior order have aspiring feelings given them by nature, such as ambition, emulation, etc. which makes it their duty to persevere in the pursuit of gratifying these refined passions.

will then be obliged to labour for money to pay their taxes: there will be no trifling from time to time, as is done now; the new government will have energy sufficient to compel immediate payment.[3]

3.16.8 3dly. This will make the people attend to their own business; and not be dabbling in politics—things they are entirely ignorant of; nor is it proper they should understand. But it is very probable that the exercise of this power may be opposed by the refractory plebians, who (such is the perverseness of their natures) often refuse to comply with what is manifestly for their advantage; but to prevent all inconveniency from this quarter the congress have power to raise and support armies. This is the second thing necessary to render government independent. The creatures who compose these armies, are a species of animals, wholly at the disposal of government; what others call their natural rights they resign into the hands of their superiors, even the right of self-preservation (so precious to all other beings) they entirely surrender, and put their very lives in the power of their masters: so that they having no rights of their own to care for, they become naturally jealous and envious of those possessed by others, they are therefore proper instruments in the hands of government, to divest the people of their usurped rights. But the capital business of these armies will be, to assist the collectors of taxes, imposts, and excise, in raising the revenue; and this they will perform with the greatest alacrity as it is by this they are supported; but for this they would be in a great measure useless; and without this they could not exist.

3.16.9 4thly.[4] To render government entirely independent, they must have the sole and absolute command of the militia without restriction or reserve, either as to time or place, principle or conscience; and with this power the constitution hath amply furnished them—see article 1st sect. 8. "the congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, to provide for organising, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the united states." By this clause the militia is divided into two classes, viz. active and inactive; the active militia will be those employed "in the service of the united states," or in other words in the service of congress; they will consist of young men chiefly, who will not be attached to any particular place, on account of their families: or such eccentric genius's as by their superior address or daring spirit may gain an ascendency over the minds of the vulgar, and so become the heads of liberty factions.

3.16.10 Such persons as these will best suit the purpose of government; and if they are judiciously culled and picked, will compose a very respectable army; from which many great advantages may result to goverment. 1st. They will assist, in conjunction with the standing army, to quell insurrections that may arise in any part of the empire on account of pretensions to support liberty, redress grievances, and the like. 2dly. This power will enable congress to fulfill their engagements with foreign nations, their allies; should they stipulate in the treaty of alliance, to furnish a number of troops (in consideration of a certain sum of money) to be employed in the service of these allies, when they are engaged in war, the active militia will always be ready. Such treaties as these will likewise grow into a lucrative branch of commerce: the Swiss Cantons find their accounts in a traffic somewhat similar, and the prince of Hesse Cassel, and other German princes who are excellent financiers, raise a great part of their revenues by such dealings.

3.16.11 Now, the very letter of the above quoted sections gives congress such a power as this; and in article 6th it is declared, "That all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the united states; viz. by the president and two-thirds of the senators, [see art. 2d. sec. 2d][5] shall be the supreme law of the land." Another clause says, "that congress is to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the land"; therefore the militia, by virtue of these powers given to congress may be transported to Europe, Africa or Asia, to execute the treaties of congress, because they are the "supreme laws of the land." Although there is nothing in this constitution, but what bears an exact resemblance to nature, yet there is no feature or lineament in the whole portrait pleases me equal to this. It is nature itself in minature. With what heavenly ideas must the framers of these articles have been inspired; how artfully and ingeniously they have conveyed to congress the absolute disposal of their subjects. It is true they have reserved to the several states the business of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by congress. By this reservation, the states are constituted drill-sergeants and fuglemen to train up soldiers for the general government; an employment too mean and servile for the dignified congress; but every way suitable to the quality of the discarded states, or deposed sovereigns.

3.16.12 The second class or inactive militia, comprehends all the rest of the peasants; viz. the farmers, mechanics, labourers, etc. which good policy will prompt government to disarm. It would be dangerous to trust such a rabble as this with arms in their hands. They might employ them in opposing the supreme laws of the land instead of employing them to execute them. 4thly To render government independent, the people must be divested of all the privileges they have wrested from their rulers in times of anarchy and confusion. In modern times the people for the most part have these privileges arranged together in one instrument, which commonly serves as a preliminary to their constitution—this instrument, they call their bill of rights.*

*Dr. Rush, in the state convention, amongst many other wise and learned sayings, hath the following remarkable observation, "I am happy sir, to find that the convention hath not disgraced this constitution with a bill of rights"[6]—whether ought Pennsylvania to reward such candid declarations with a suit of tar and feathers, or with a hempen neck-lace.

These rights are claims which the people have extorted from weak, timid, irresolute rulers—However the grand convention in framing the new constitution, hath omitted the dangerous ceremony, and left it in the power of congress, to irradicate every vestage of so daring an encroachment. One particular article provided for in these bills of rights, is the liberty of the press, which the people pretend ought never to be restrained, altho' it is undeniable that it has ever been the vehicle of slander, and the source of innumerable evils; it hath filled the world with seditions, insurrections, rebellions, conspiracies, murders, heresies, and the most dangerous innovations of every sort; wherever it is tolerated it is impossible to divest the people of those dangerous privileges, which they have usurped in time of turbulence and disorder; through this channel they will receive early intelligence of the schemes of government, and be ready on the slightest offence, to unite in support of what they deem their natural and unalienable rights; so that it might prove difficult for the best appointed army, that congress could possibly raise or support, to repel their fury, or reduce them to obedience; but as there is no provision made for its security in the new frame of government, congress may abolish it at pleasure, which they will soon find it their interest to do, and its own native licentiousness will furnish them with reasons plausible enough to form a preamble for the act; as none but friends of government will then have an opportunity of communicating their sentiments to the public, or displaying their genius: so none but they will care to acquire sentiments, or cultivate genius. Learning will then flourish in its native soil, and science run in its proper channel; for a knowledge of letters among the vulgar is the bane of good government. Another privilege which the people possesses at present, and which the new congress will find it their interest to deprive them of, is trial by jury—for of all the powers which the people have wrested from government, this is the most absurd; it is even a gross violation of common sense, and most destructive to energy. In the first place it is absurd, that twelve ignorant plebians, should be constituted judges of a law, which passed through so many learned hands;—first a learned legislature after many learned animadversions and criticisms have enacted it—Second, learned writers have explained and commented on it.—Third, learned lawyers twisted, turned and new modeled it—and lastly, a learned judge opened up and explained it. Yet after all these learned discussions, an illiterate jury (who have scarce a right to think for themselves instead of judging for others) must determine whether it applies to the fact or not; and by their verdict the learned judge must be governed in passing sentence; and perhaps a learned gentleman be cast in an action with an insignificant cottager.

3.16.13 Secondly. Common sense recoils at the very idea of such a pernicious practice as this, because it makes no difference between the virtuous and the vicious, the precious and the vile; between those of noble birth, and illustrious descent, and those of base blood, and ignoble obscure pedigree—for an ignorant stupid jury, cannot discern the merit of persons—it is the merits of the cause they examine; which is just reversing the question, and beginning at the wrong end. Thirdly. This custom is fatal to energy, for tho' a law should be expressed in the most pointed terms, a jury may soften and mitigate, and in a great measure destroy the spirit of it. The lawyers also suffers by this practice; because, there being no appeal from the verdict of the jury with respect to the fact—the action therefore, often ends in the same court in which it originated, but where no jury interferes an appeal lies to a higher court, where higher fees must be given to lawyers, and greater numbers of them employed; and so much better chance for them to amass fortunes.

[It appears as if some discerning lawyer indicted that nice clause in the constitution, which gives to the continental supreme court an appelate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact; it seems so happily calculated to their advantage.][7]

There are many other rights claimed by the people besides these mentioned; but as they are of little consequence, I shall leave the discussion of them to the new congress themselves, who no doubt will be quick sighted enough to discern them, and prudent enough to provide for their removal. But before I conclude, I must take notice of an incumbrance upon government, which have been more general in its operation than any yet mentioned; viz. religion. There has been but few nations in the world, where the people possessed the privilege of electing their rulers; of prefixing a bill of rights to their constitutions, enjoyed a free press, or trial by jury; but there was never a nation in the world whose government was not circumscribed by religion. It intermingled itself so much with the Jewish system, that it is difficult to distinguish between some of the functions of the magistrates and those of the priests. In some stages of their commonwealth, the high priest was also the supreme civil magistrate. Religion had also a decisive influence in the Grecian and Roman systems of jurisprudence; their augurs could in many cases put a negative on the decrees of their senates; and countermand the orders of their consuls and dictators.—In our own times, the most absolute rulers in the world, find their power abridged by religion. The grand signior possesses an authority very similar to the principle of nature which I have stated; yet his power is limitted by religion;—for wherever it interposes, the will of the sovereign must submit to its decrees: "When the koran hath prescribed any religious rite; hath enjoined any moral duty; or hath confirmed by its sanction any political maxim. The command of the sultan cannot overturn that which an higher authority hath established."[8] Even the Venetian government, which of all other seems to be formed on the best model, (though much inferior to our new plan) is nevertheless embarrassed with religion; but what need I mention particulars, since every government in the world, as I observed before, has, in a lesser or greater degree felt this inconvenience. Indeed it seems to have formed an essential part of them; such a part as could not be expunged without annihilating the whole systems; and though this might have been done, yet the shallow brains of those antiquated legislators, could not devise a possibility of avoiding the same radical evil in any new system they could frame; so that this direful incumbrance has hitherto proved too powerful for the united efforts of all the legislators and philosophers that ever appeared in the world to conquer. But what is the world to the federal convention! but as the drop of a bucket, or the small dust in the balance! What the world could not accomplish from the commencement of time till now, they easily performed in a few moments, by declaring, that "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office, or public trust; under the united states." This is laying the ax to the root of the tree; whereas other nations only lopped off a few noxious branches. This is purifying the fountain; the streams must of course be pure. By this provision the convention hath prudently removed the distemper from the head, and secured it from contamination.—The certain method to preserve the members from catching the infection. Religion, is certainly attended with dangerous consequences to government: it hath been the cause of millions being slaughtered, whose lives and services might have been of use to their masters; but in a peculiar manner the christian religion, which has these several centuries past prevailed over a great part of Europe, and is professed by a great many of the vulgar in this country, is of all others the most unfavourable to a government founded upon nature; because it pretends to be of a supernatural divine origin, and therefore sets itself above nature. Its precepts are likewise so rigid and severe, as to render it impossible for any gentleman of fashion or good breeding to comply with them in any sense, without a manifest violation of decorum, and an abandonment of every genteel amusement and fashionable accomplishment; but another capital objection against this singular system of religion is, that it prohibits slavery, which is so essential to government, that it cannot exist, with any degree of energy, without it, for all the subjects of a good government ought to be slaves in a political sense; or as they were anciently termed, vassals; that is, their persons and property must be entirely at the will and disposal of their masters; which is ingeniously provided for in the new constitution, under the articles of taxation and discipline of the militia.

3.16.15 The congress must certainly extirpate from their dominions such a religion as this that is an enemy to so many good things. By this means the clergy may be annihilated,* who have always been an ambitious, aspiring

*When first I perused this construction, I expected the clergy, to a man, would have opposed it; but in this I am happily deceived; they are the most strenuous advocates it has got; this appeared to me unaccountable, that an order of men, ever jealous of their own power and interest, should favour a constitution which would eventually destroy both; but I presume they have secret assurance that one or two denominations of clergy, are to have fixed stipends established under the new constitution. This, they expect will relieve them from their state of dependance they are and restless set of men, ever grasping at honours and distinctions, which is the unalienable prerogative of those of illustrious descent: they also by their address and cunning, gain an ascendency, and assume an authority over the people, which is only proper for the rulers to possess; but perhaps it may be urged that some sort of religion is necessary to awe the minds of the vulgar, and keep them in subjection to government. I grant, weak, feeble governments, such as our present systems, may stand in need of the visionary terrors of religion for their support; but such an energetic government as the new constitution, disdains such contemptible auxiliaries as the belief of a Deity, the immortality of the soul, or the resurrection of the body, a day of judgment, or a future state of rewards and punishments.[9] Such bug-bears as these are too distant and illusory to claim the notice of the new congress. The present state of punishments, which will be within their immediate reach to inflict, will answer the end infinitely better. But if some religion must be had, the religion of nature will certainly be preferred by a government founded upon the law of nature.—One great argument in favour of this religion is, that most of the members of the grand convention are great admirers of it; and they certainly are the best models to form our religious, as well as our civil belief on. This religion also admits of proper degrees and distinctions amongst mankind; but the other does not; for it commands to call no man upon earth master or lord. From these remarks, I think it evident, that the grand convention hath dexterously provided for the removal of every thing that hath ever opperated as a restraint upon government in any place or age of the world. But perhaps some weak heads may think that the constitution itself will be a check upon the new congress; but this I deny, for the convention has so happily worded themselves, that every part of this constitution, either bears double meaning, or no meaning at all; and if any concessions are made to the people in one place, it is effectually cancelled in another; so that in fact this constitution is much better and gives more scope to the rulers than they durst safely take if there was no constitution at all; for then the people might contend that the power was inherent in them, and that they had made some implied reserves in the original grant; but now they cannot, for every thing is expressly given away to government in this plan. Perhaps some people may think that power, which the house of

now in. It is natural for them to wish something surer for a living, than the good will of the people, their hearers. It is very well to amuse them with such alluring stories as these, while their services is needed. Working on their avarice and ambition is the sure way to engage them; and when the constitution is once established, and they have no more useful, but rather hurtful, sound policy will dictate evasions plausible enough to disengage gentlemen from the accomplishment of their promise; and the most noisy and dangerous of them, may have their mouths stopped, by bestowing sinecures on them in the civil, military, or naval department: such as the collector of taxes, excise, or impost duties: this will suit them better than their present employments; for preaching is a great restraint upon gentlemen of modern morality.

representatives possesses, of impeaching the officers of government will be a restraint upon them; but this entirely vanishes, when it is considered that the senate hath the principal say in appointing these officers, and that they are the sole judges of all impeachments. Now it would be absurd to suppose that they would remove their own servants for performing their secret orders perhaps. For the interest of rulers and the ruled will then be two distinct things. The mode of electing the president is another excellent regulation, most wisely calculated to render him the obsequious machine of congress. He is to be chosen by electors appointed in such manner as the state legislators shall direct: but then the highest in votes cannot be president, without he has the majority of all the electors; and if none have this majority, then the congress is to chuse president out of the five highest on the return. By this means the congress will always have the making of the president after the first election; so that if the reigning president pleases his masters, he need be under no apprehensions of being turned out for any severities used to the people, for though the congress may not have influence enough to procure him the majority of the votes of the electoral college, yet they will always be able to prevent any other from having such a majority, and to have him returned among the five highest, so that they may have the appointing of him themselves.

3.16.16 All these wise regulations, proves to a demonstration, that the grand convention was infaliable. The congress having thus disentangled themselves from all popular checks and choices; and being supported by a well disciplined army and active militia, will certainly command dread and respect abroad, obedience and submission at home; they will then look down with awful dignity and tremendous majesty from the pinnacle of glory, to which fortune has raised them upon the insignificant creatures, their subjects, whom they have reduced to that state of vassalage and servile submission, for which they were primarily destined by nature. America will then be great amongst the nations* and princess amongst the provinces: her fleets will cover the desarts of the ocean and convert it into a popular city; and her invincible armies overturn the thrones of princes. The glory of Britain shall fall like lightning before puissant America; when she ariseth to shake

*That is if we may credit the prognostications with which our federal news-papers and pamphlets daily teem.

Britain, once the supreme ruler of this country, but her authority was rejected; not as a great many believe, because her claims was tyrannical and oppressive; but because her dominion excluded those from monopolizing the government into their own hands, whom nature had qualified to rule. It is certainly no more than the natural right of rulers "to bind their subjects, in all cases whatsoever."[10] This power is perfectly synonimous with that clause in the constitution, which invests congress with power to make all laws ["]which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers," etc. and that which says "the constitution, laws, and treaties of congress shall be the supreme law of the land; any thing in the constitutions or laws of any of the states to the contrary notwithstanding." But nothing less would satisfy Britain, than a power to bind the natural rulers as well as subjects.

the nations, and take vengeance on all who dare oppose her. O! thou most venerable and august congress! with what astonishing ideas my mind is ravished! when I contemplate thy rising grandeur, and anticipate thy future glory! Happy thy servants! happy thy vassals! and happy thy slaves, which sit under the shade of thy omnipotent authority, and behold the glory of thy majesty! for such a state who would not part with ideal blessings of liberty? who would not chearfully resign the nominal advantages of freedom? the dazzling splendour of Assyrian, Persian, Macedonian and Roman greatness will then be totally eclipsed by the radient blaze of this glorious western luminary! These beautiful expressions, aristocracy, oligarchy, upon which the popular odium hath fixed derision and contempt, will then resume their natural emphasis; their genuine significance will be perfectly understood, and no more perverted or abused.

I shall now suggest a few directions to my worthy friends, the inventors and advocates of this admirable constitution—1st. that the people may be brought speedily to "assent and ratify" this constitution, they must have very short time given them for consideration;* it may take well enough with them while they know it only by report, but if time and leasure is allowed them to examine it, they will surely reject it. 2dly. everything like argument in its defence must be carefully avoided, and instead thereof, the profound wisdom of the convention, the great men of which it was composed, particularly the names of a Washington and a Franklin, must be rung in the people's ears: it must be declared a crime bordering on blasphemy, to say any thing against the production of such men as these, and if any thing is wrote concerning it, it must be panegyrick, eulogium, or rhapsody; but by all means avoid reasoning, or you will betray the good cause in which you are engaged. 3rdly. All who presume to speak or write against this constitution, must be branded as enemies to their country and to the union of the states; to impress this upon the minds of the vulgar, they must be termed antifederalists, all their personal faults must be searched out and exposed; 3.16.17

*Our friends in Pennsylvania and some other states, have wisely anticipated this advice, and thereby carried their favourite scheme. But I am sorry to find that Virginia and several other states have given too much time for the plebeians to scrutinize and cavil; which may perhaps disconcert the whole plot, so artfully contrived.

I hope none of my friends will imagine that I wish for federal union, because I have called the new plan of government the FEDERAL CONSTITUTION. I assure my friends (by whose interest I expect to receive my share of the loaves and fishes when they are dividing after the constitution is established) I abhor every idea of a federal union; I am decidedly for an incorporate or consolidated union; and I am sensible that this sort of union is effectually secured by the new constitution, the only system capable to exalt the rulers and reduce people; but I have applyed the word federal to the constitution, to chagrin the vulgar, who are enthusiastically fond of it; and as few of them are capable to distinguish betwixt the name and the thing, they may be brought to addopt it under this plausible sanction; also by calling the constitution federal, we can apply the odious term antifederalists to our opponents with more propriety.

and the people must be warned not to listen to their reasoning on the subject, as they are interested persons, being either officers of government, or expectants of offices, and that their opposition arises from sinister views, and selfish motives, and not from a conviction of its evil: but beware of encountering their arguments, or you will certainly expose this darling constitution to popular execration. 4thly. The people must be told, that the revenue of the nation will be chiefly raised by impost under the new constitution, and that internal taxation will seldom if ever be recurred to; this will amuse them in the mean time while they possess the power, but we hope congress will have more wisdom than to verify this prophecy, as it would be very injurious to the interest of our well beloved brother Robert Morris, and all our brethren in high life throughout the nation: a land, but in particular a high poll-tax, will be the most effectual method of collecting the finances; some other articles, such as stamp duties; a tax on candles, leather, soap, etc. may turn to a very good account; and the money raised from the sale of the active militia to foreigners, will be no contemptable source of revenue. 5thly. All communication between the people of the different states must as much as possible be prevented—therefore our own friends must be posts and postmasters, and they must have full power to break open all packets, letters, and papers of every sort, and if they contain any thing against the new constitution they must be suppressed, if not closed up again and sent to the persons to whom they are directed; and it is requested of all our trusty friends throughout the country, that they intercept all papers, which come in their way; examine their contents, and if possible destroy them, if they contain any thing against this glorious plan. 6thly. [11] The militia must be disarmed; for this purpose all the public arms must be called in, upon pretence of having them cleaned; this will not only deprive our enemies of using them against us, but they will be ready to put in the hands of our friends, or men raised by them for the establishment of the constitution if coercion is necessary. 7thly. The distress of the people must be magnified as much as possible; they must be told that they are ruined and miserable, that they are all bankrupts; and that all these calamities is occasioned by their feeble governments (although in fact it is by their own extravagance); and that the new plan will effectually relieve all their wants, and redress all their grievances; although in reality it must be their own industry and economy; but this they must not know for the present. 8thly. They must be told that the new congress will immediately pay off all the debts of the union; but if they ask you how? you must evade the question the best way you can; for if you tell them the truth, that it will be by levying high taxes on themselves, they will be sure to spurn your argument and constitution too. 9thly. The highly and elevated station, to which this will raise America amongst the nations, must be held forth with great vehemence. The people are mighty fond of pomp and splendor, and will almost grant anything to raise their country to grandeur and magnificence. 10thly. They must be told that anarchy will inevitably be the consequence, if they reject the proposed plan; for there are no more wise men on the continent capable to frame another system; and the same men which composed the late grand convention will not meet a second time. Finally, these directions, if strictly observed, may be of great utility; but they are not to be implicitly confided in. Standing armies are the most proper instruments, both for maintaining and establishing a good government; therefore to secure all beyond a doubt, a standing army must be speedily provided; for this purpose application must be made to our good ally, the French king, to furnish us with a number of troops; and so as not to alarm the people too soon, they may be landed with a pretence to invade Canada. His majesty must also be instructed to demand troops of congress, to assist in this expedition, according to the treaty of alliance. Ten or twenty thousand could be raised in a thrice; and I am confident our friend Robert, and all our other monied friends, bankers and brokers, will supply the necessary demands of money, they may easily be got ready to take the field against next summer, or fall. It could be no loss if they were not needed, they would be so many ready made soldiers for the new congress, who would, no doubt, purchase them at a high price, and the French troops might return in peace to their own country.

APPENDIX

Since writing the foregoing strictures, I have seen Martin's information to the house of delegates of the state of Maryland.[12] This arch enemy has let out secrets that certainly never was intended to be discovered; he hath with uncommon audacity, deserted the great convention, and exposed its intestines to public view; yet I cannot think he has destroyed its infaliability; all he has told, only proves that the majority were no patriots, nor lovers of their country; and what of all that; we can prove they were lovers of themselves; and that self-love is the noblest passion of the soul, and the best motive that human actions can spring from. Now if the grand convention acted uniformly from the best motive, self-love, were stimulated by the noblest desires, self-agrandisement, and influenced by the choicest principles, self-preservation, there can be no doubt of their infaliability. This truth being established, it necessarily follows, that it is gross prophanity and unpardonable crime for faliable creatures to presume to scrutinize their work, or arraign their production, before the bar of their corrupt depraved reason. The centinel in his 16th number,[13] has also discovered a secret of some importance; viz. that the expost facto clause, in connection with several others, screens, what he calls public defaulters, from being obliged to refund the millions they owe the public, and secure the delinquent states from being called upon for their arrears due to the continental treasury! How this fiend discovered the intention of this important clause I cannot divine. It was veiled over so nicely with a semblance of liberty, that I expected it would ride its quarantine without being observed: but nothing can escape the penetrating eye of this wicked centinel. I wish some means were devised to silence him.—Money, and the promise of lucrative offices has a fascinating influence; and has hitherto been of great service to our cause; many have been bought off whose opposition would certainly have injured us. I wish every stratagem were tried of this nature to allure the centinel to join us, or at least to be silent: he has done great mischief, and is still doing more; and he seems to possess such a determined spirit as not to be intimidated by threats. The people seem very much alarmed at the tendency of the expost facto clause.

3.16.19 Several of the Philadelphia papers teem with pieces exposing the principal public defaulters; but I hope the present Congress will not be induced by this to commit such a piece of cruelty, as to call them to account, and oblige them to refund the sums they owe. If, they postpone it till the new government is established, they can then settle them decently without any injury to themselves: nor can the public complain of fraud or injustice done them, since they have tacitly given their consent to it, by ratifying the new constitution. The provision made in the constitution for cancelling the public debts, was certainly dictated by the first principle of nature, viz. self-preservation; the most influential members in the convention being public defaulters, were impelled to take this step for their own security; and who in their senses can blame them for providing for their own safety, when it was in their power. I am happy to find that the system of intrigue and chicane on which our whole scheme was founded, is still carried on with success all over the continent. The directions I have suggested has been anticipated I find by our friends; by this means six conventions have been lugged in to adopt the plan;—although I don't like the idea of amendments which Massachusetts has introduced; it may be attended with bad consequences; other states may follow the example, and so spoil the whole plot; that such a fatal catastrophe may be prevented, we ought to employ our whole skill, and bend our whole manoeuvres. The adjournment of New Hampshire Convention, is very alarming; yet I hope that state may be brought to reason: a few donations might answer a good end. I long for the asset of nine states; we could then settle all disputes by applying the ultimo ratio regum, as General Washington expresses it,[14] this is the most effectual mode of reasoning; may we speedily have it in our power.

6. "Sir, I consider it as an honor to the late convention, that this system has not been disgraced with a bill of rights; though I mean not to blame or reflect upon those states which have encumbered the constitution with that idle and superfluous instrument. One would imagine, however, from the arguments of the opposition, that this government was immediately to be administered by foreigners—strangers to our habits and opinions, and unconnected with our interests and prosperity. These apprehensions, Sir, might have been excused while we were contending with Great Britain; but at this time they are applicable to all governments, as well as that under consideration; and the arguments of the honorable member are, indeed, better calculated for an Indian council-fire than the meridian of this refined and enlightened convention" (30 November 1787). A Note on Cross References

For convenient cross reference, and without any other editorial purpose, a three-part number has been assigned to each paragraph (or group of paragraphs where they are brief) of the writings assembled in The Complete Anti-Federalist. The first number denotes the volume, the second the position of the essay or series within that volume, and the third the paragraph. A reference to, for example, Federal Republican 3.6.13 locates a passage in the Review of the Constitution Proposed by the Late Convention, by A Federal Republican, which can be found in volume 3 of this edition. These numbers are distinct from any numbering by the authors themselves or any of their publishers; Centinel III, 2.7.73 refers to the third letter of Centinel, in volume 2 above. The abbreviation "intro." is used for Storing's introductions to volumes or parts of volumes as well as the introductions to individual texts. A reference to, say, 2.8.intro. denotes the introductory sketch and outline of the Federal Farmer, located in volume 2. Cross references to volume 1 are by page number. A cross reference from one note to another uses a three-part number plus a note number, so that the reader may refer to the text as well as the note if necessary.

Massachusetts and New England

Introduction

As winter wore on, the focus of debate moved northward. By January 1788 five states had ratified the Constitution—Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Georgia, and Connecticut—all with comparative ease and in four cases unanimously or nearly so.[1] But among these only Pennsylvania was a major state, and there the opposition was unreconciled to defeat. The Massachusetts convention was to meet on 14 January; and an unfavorable decision there would strengthen the opponents of the Constitution in the remaining states, while giving encouragement to the adamant Pennsylvania Anti-Federalists.

The contest over ratification in Massachusetts was preceded by a decade of factional contention, leading to civil disturbances and culminating in the famous Shays Rebellion.[2] The rebellion centered in western Massachusetts, where the economic depression following the dislocation of the war was most severe, where hard currency was scarce, and where the courts and lawyers were a target of popular resentment. Opposition to the Constitution was centered in this western part of the state, but there was a distinct lack of leadership. Few of the eastern Anti-Federalists, who provided essays and pamphlets read all over the country, were elected to the ratifying convention, where the Anti-Federalists, while strong in numbers, had no spokesmen able to contend with the Federalists.[3] To a striking extent the Anti-Federalist delegates in democratic Massachusetts were preoccupied with a rather undifferentiated fear of abuse of power and trickery from the propertied and educated classes.

When the ratifying convention met, there was, from all accounts, a majority opposed to ratification; yet after close to a month of debate a sufficient number of delegates changed their minds to give the Federalists a small majority. The Federalists, proceeding cautiously, succeeded in securing clause-by-clause consideration of the Constitution, fearing (and apparently with good reason) that an early vote would go against them. In this they were aided by Samuel Adams, who, although generally thought to be unfriendly to the Constitution, threw his considerable weight on the side of full deliberation and, in one of his few speeches at the convention, supported clause-by-clause consideration. John Hancock, governor of Massachusetts and president of the convention, also provided crucial support. Popular, vain, and extremely sensitive to currents of opinion, Hancock was prevented by a genuine but manageable illness from occupying the chair until the issues and the lines of division had begun to come into focus. When he did appear, Hancock proposed a group of amendments to the Constitution, which Samuel Adams endorsed. The statements of both men were, probably deliberately, somewhat ambiguous about whether the amendments were to be a condition of ratification or merely recommendatory. As debate continued, sentiment for ratification increased, with the Federalists supporting recommendatory amendments; and neither Hancock nor Adams pressed for conditional ratification. Whatever their motives (a much-canvassed question), Hancock's and Adams' actions were of the utmost importance in securing ratification in the crucial state of Massachusetts and in introducing recommendatory amendments. This proved to be the compromise used to secure ratification in other states, tempering the opposition of the Anti-Federalists while maintaining the integrity of the Constitution.

On 6 February 1788 the Constitution was adopted by the Massachusetts convention by the narrow margin of 187 to 168, and the recommendatory amendments were agreed upon. Several Anti-Federalists who had voted against the Constitution rose to express their acceptance of the majority determination.[4] In marked contrast to events in Pennsylvania, opposition largely ceased in Massachusetts once the Constitution was adopted.

Anon.
"A confederation, for purposes merely national . . ."

MASSACHUSETTS GAZETTE
9 October 1787

The following remarks are interesting chiefly because they are identified by William W. Crosskey as containing one of the rare attacks on the power of Congress to regulate commerce and as supporting his view that the power to regulate commerce among the several states was intended to include all commercial intercourse in the United States.[1] The remarks were reprinted rather widely and elicited two replies discussed by Crosskey (one of which flatly contradicts his thesis).[2]

1. Politics and the Constitution I, 188.
2. Ibid., pp. 188–89.

The following remarks are handed to us by a correspondent as being very serious difficulties in the way of the new confederation, notwithstanding the pains which have been taken to prove, that it could not contain any thing wrong.

A confederation, for purposes merely national, would undoubtedly be exceedingly beneficial to these states. Every one should, however, be indulged in a free, but decent, examination of every proposed form. 4.1.1

In general, publick business would go on smoothly when the mode of doing it is conformable to the habits of the people, and when employment is found for their activity.[1] Let us upon these principles review the newly proposed federal constitution.

The several states are to be represented by a small number of persons, who, during the long period for which they are to be chosen, will be invested with almost every branch of legislative authority, and will generally reside without the states represented by them. 4.1.2

Their authority will extend not only to the foreign commerce but to the internal economy of the states. They are to keep up armies within the states at all times, and to have the sole power of calling the militia into service, excepting the case of foreign invasion. The states therefore lose the right of compelling the obedience of their own subjects.

4.1.3 No state will be able to pay its debts otherwise than by a dry tax; imposts and excises being applied wholly to continental purposes. The several states are not allowed to certify their own debts, even without making their bills a tender.

Titles of land in many cases are to be tried by a continental court. This gives the national government unequal authority in different states, and creates different interests. Some states will lose their whole jurisdiction over real estates; and the large state of Vermont will be excluded from the union.[2]

4.1.4 These are great difficulties and ought to be well weighed before the system is adopted, which will forever put it out of our power to remedy them, otherwise than by force of arms. Our people are every day coalescing under a wise and moderate, but firm, government. Let us not hastily divide them.

Thanks are due to the gentlemen who have come so near the truth in a matter of such importance to us all. But it will probably be found necessary to have this system carefully revised and corrected, before it will be perfect, and be likely to promote the happiness of any state in the union; as it does not at present conform to their established habits.

1. A writer signing himself "Convention" replied: "Is this antifederalist to be informed at this time of day, that the 'habits' of the citizens of America are very dissimilar?—And that this is owing in a great measure to the disuniting and discordant principles of the separate Constitutions of the States, and the want of a federal Government?—It is in vain to expect a national trait in our characters, or a similitude of habits, but as the effect of a national efficient government—Virtue or good habits are the result of good laws—and from the excellent American Constitution those habits will be induced, that shall lead to those exertions, manufactures and enterprizes, which will give a scope to the American genius, and 'find employment for their activity.' A Letter from a Gentleman in a Neighbouring State, to a Gentleman in this City

CONNECTICUT JOURNAL
17 and 24 October 1787

In this rather superficial criticism, A Gentleman from Massachusetts covers many standard Anti-Federal objections concerning the aristocratic principle and tendency of the new Constitution; the inadequate representation; the unconstitutional method of ratification; and the dangerous power of Congress to regulate federal elections, to tax, to dispose of territories belonging to the states, to establish unnecessary inferior courts, to establish armies, and to use the militia to enforce the laws. More significant and interesting is his discussion of the complexity and mystery of the Constitution, especially in the provisions dealing with slavery (4.2.8–9). A Federalist satire and reply was printed in the Connecticut Journal on 24 and 31 October.

Dear Sir,

I received your favour of the 24th ult. inclosing the doings of the Convention at Philadelphia, directed to his excellency the president of Congress in three days after the date, which favour I should have highly prized, had you not at the same time, enjoined it upon me, to make my objections to them (if any I had) and likewise that I would point out, any alterations that may be made in our present articles of confederation, which will better secure the natural rights, privileges, and liberties of human nature, and at the same time, effectually support the authority and dignity of the states, and public faith. I now sit down to perform the first part you have enjoined upon me, but with great reluctance, for reasons I shall assign in my next, which I esteem the most arduous task you have assigned me, which you claim as a debt due both to the public and yourself. 4.2.1

My objections to the doings of our honourable Convention are many, you must excuse me if I do not mention one half of them—I must be concise—shall mention only those which I conceive are CAPITAL, and would first observe generally.—The form of government prescribed is too COMPLEX, 4.2.2

couched in terms, in many instances doubtful as though there was some art used to cover the full extent of the powers delegated, to be easily understood, by all who ought to accept or reject the same—and that the form of government recommended, most probably will be attended with greater expence than can be supported by an infant country, exhausted of her wealth by the late war, and impoverished by our own follies and luxuries since the peace, and the loss of our trade, the recovery of which, there is not the least prospect, as restraints are laid upon it, by all the powers in Europe, which however I look upon, a circumstance much in our favour, as it will gradually serve to disconnect us from the nations of Europe, for I have no desire we should import either foreign LUXURIES or foreign VICES.

4.2.3 A gradual decay of our trade, must gradually increase our own manufacturers—which must encrease industry, which will have a powerful influence to reform our morals; nothing will promote industry so powerfully, as necessity, unless it is crampt by an arbitrary sovereign and despotic government. No man will work with that chearfulness for his lord, as he will when he knows his earnings are his own, nor do I think this three branch'd government, will sit easily on the minds of the people, whose peace and quiet must be consulted, or we shall have trouble. The populace or multitude as they are now called in contempt, when we first opposed British tyranny, were complimented by the patriots of that day, in halls and under liberty poles, as being the fountain and origin from whence all power was derived, will not sit easy under any government, where they are deprived of all power, or so fettered in the exercise of what little power is left in their hands, as will do them but little service. The chief agents in this new form of government planned out by Convention, assume the humble title of president, senate, and representatives, but really are vested with the powers of King, Lords, and Commons, and although the government seems to be elective, their stations will be secured as ample, I humbly conceive, as though they were made hereditary, as the rights of the electors appear to be so much fettered, as to leave but little power in the hands of the people.—My particular objections are first to the third paragraph in Sect. 2. Art. I, which is in the following words—"Representatives and direct taxes, shall be apportioned among the several states, which may be included in this union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined, by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons." Was not this form of words thus uncouthly used to avoid using the word Negroes? It certainly looks as though the word Negroes was omitted from some design, it cannot be from any fear of offending that nation of Africans. Why must that man that has 500 slaves in our southern states, where slaves are looked upon only as personal property, have 300 of them exempted from capitation, while an inhabitant of the northern states, possessed of the same number of horned cattle, horses and hogs, be obliged to pay for the whole number? They are all considered as chattles. But to proceed, "The number of representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each state shall have at least one representative: and until such enumeration shall be made, the state of New-Hampshire shall be permitted to chuse three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New-York six, New-Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North-Carolina five, South-Carolina five, and Georgia three." My objections to this part of the paragraph, are, that the representation is by far too small, to transact the business of so large an empire, our state assemblies may be annihilated, having nothing to do of importance; the power of taxation being vested in Congress, all other business may be transacted in our town meetings.—A large representation has ever been esteemed by the best whigs in Great-Britain, the best barrier against bribery and corruption, and yet we find a British king, having the disposition of all places, civil and military, & an immense revenue, SQUEEZED out of the very mouths of his wretched subjects, is able to corrupt the parliament, to vote him any supplies he demands, to support armies, to defend the prerogatives of his crown, and carry fire & sword by his fleets and armies; to desolate whole provinces in the eastern world, to aggrandize himself, and satisfy the avarice of his tyrannical subjects.

No wonder our American ambassador, struck with the brilliancy of the British court, where every thing around St. James's wears the appearance of wealth, ease, and plenty, should imagine a three branched legislature only can produce these effects, and make the subjects happy, should write a book in favour of such a government,[1] and send it over for the illumination of this western world; if this is the sole fruit of his embassy, America will not canonize him for a saint on account of his services, when they have experienced the consequences of such a kind of government as he has planned out. In order to have formed a right judgment, he should have looked into the ditches which serve for graves for many of the human race—under hedges which serve as dreary habitations for the living—into the cottages of the poor and miserable, and critically examine with how much parsimony the mechanicks, the day labourers, cottagers and villagers live in order to support their high pampered lords, before he had wrote a book to persuade his country to persue the same road to greatness, splendor and glory, and have reflected in his own mind, whether he could wish to see that country which gave him birth, reduced to the same situation.—By this arrangement of representation it seems this large and extensive empire which in half a century will probably be double in number to the inhabitants of Great-Britain, will be governed by 68 representatives, of which six of the northern states will be represented by 27 ONLY, and the southern states by 41.[2] No marvel that three fifths of the slaves are exempted from capitation in taxation. 4.2.4

4.2.5 The commons of England if my memory serves me, consists of 5 or 600 or upwards, yet the king of Great-Britain, if we may believe their own writers, has it in his power by places and pensions, to corrupt a majority of his commons, that his ministers can carry any vote they think proper to propose, to support the dignity of his crown, and rapaciousness of his ministers.

4.2.6 Therefore should Congress at any future period grow haughty, insolent and oppressive, they will have it in their power by places and pensions, which they are amply enabled to establish by the sale of the western lands, which by this Constitution is wholly resigned into the hands of Congress, to be at their disposal, which will be sufficient to corrupt a house of representatives, double in number to the Commons of Great Britain. I now would make my objection to Sec. 4th which is in these words, "The times, places, and manner of holding election for senators, and representatives shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time alter or make such regulations, except as to the place of chusing senators." The plain meaning and understanding of which I take to be this, that Congress gives liberty to the assemblies of each state, to make such regulations respecting the time, place, and manner of chusing senators and representatives. But if they do not improve it to their liking, they can alter it at pleasure, except the place of choosing. This is a most liberal and extensive favour, granted to the assemblies of these state, which Congress can again at any time at pleasure revoke; therefore it will be prudent to use that liberty, and choose such senators as shall be acceptable to Congress, or they may expect pretty soon to have such rules prescribed them, as to the time and manner, as will better comport with the views and designs of Congress, when moddled according to their NEW PLAN—prescribed by Convention. Passing over many lessor matters I proceed to Sec. 7, which is in these words, "All bills for raising a revenue shall originate in the house of representatives; but the SENATE may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills." I would here only observe that the Commons of Great Britain will not suffer the house of Lords to make the least alteration in a money bill, however the crown has found means to corrupt a sufficient number of the Commons to draw forth the blood and treasure of the nation. I now proceed to Sec. 8, in these words, "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, and excises to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States."—And the second paragraph of the 3d Sec. Art. 4th, contains these words, "The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations, respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States." By the first recited paragraph, we vest Congress with full power to lay and collect by their own authority what taxes, duties, and excises they please, and by the second we surrender into the hands of Congress all the western territory, of larger extent I conceive than the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, the richness of the soil, let those who have seen it declare. But so concise, and so ample a conveyance of such a extent of territory, couched in such smooth and easy language I never before read. I was so struck with the elegance of the stile, I never once thought of it being a conveyance of land, until I had read it over three or four times.

Now I submit it to the good sense of the people of these states, whether it 4.2.7
is prudent we should make so liberal and extensive a grant of power and property to any body of men in these United States, before they have ever informed the public, the amount of the public debt, or what the annual expences of the federal government is, or will be. It is now almost five years since the peace; and Congress has employed thirteen commissioners, at 1500 dollars per annum, as I am informed, to settle the public accounts, and we know now no more what the national debt is, than at the first moment of their appointment—nor do we know any more what is the amount of the annual expences of the federal government, than we do of the empire of China.[3] To grant therefore such an ample power of taxation, and the right of soil, to the amount of millions, upon the recommendation of this hon. Convention, without either knowing the amount of the national debt, or the annual expences of government, would not argue, in my opinion, the highest degree of prudence.

(The remainder in our next.)

I also object to the 9th paragraph of Sec. 8th, which is in these words, "To 4.2.8
constitute tribunals, inferior to the Supreme Court." We have I humbly conceive law tribunals erected already, which are sufficiently expensive to exhaust the wealth of our richest citizens, and humbly implore, Convention, Congress, and the assemblies of the states, not to constitute any more. The shortest, the cheapest, and the most expeditious method to obtain distributive justice, between man and man, is to be prefered in any state, and the sooner that matter is taken up, by the several legislatures of the states, to shorten law processes, the better, and unless speedily effected we shall be speedily undone. My next objection is to the 12th paragraph of Sec. 8th, in these words, "To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years." A great deal of mischief may be done in two years, with guns, swords, and bayonets, and armies when once raised, it hath some times been found difficult to disband. I should therefore not think it prudent for Congress ever to raise an army merely to subdue Wabash Indians, or any one single tribe. Should there be a general combination of all the tribes, or the states be invaded by a foreign enemy, Congress by our present articles of Confederation, are vested with full powers to draw out the military force of the states, nor have the states failed hitherto of complyance in this regard; but to limit them to two years, is an affront offered to the dignity of Congress, and appears as tho' we were affraid to trust the military force of the states in their hands, when there is just occasion. I take that to be one principal part of the business of Congress, to conduct the military arrangements of all the states, when judged necessary for the general safety. My next objection is to the 15th paragraph, which is in these words, "Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." This looks too much like Baron Stuben's militia, by which a standing army was meant and intended;[4] I would only observe, to take the military force of the states out of the hands of their respective governors, is a manifest indignity offered to them, as they ever have had the sole and exclusive command of the militia of the respective states; I observe the expression used is, "To execute the laws of the union." In fact it means, to convert the militia of the states, into a standing army, under the entire command and controul of Congress; and I would only observe further, that government and those laws which require a standing army to enforce them, ought not to be supported in any nation under heaven.[5] My next objection is to the first paragraph of Sec. 9th, in these words, "The migration or importation of such persons as any other states now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year of 1808. But a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation not exceeding ten dollars for each person." Why this sentence should be couched in this blind mysterious form of words, unless again to avoid using the word negroes, I must leave those that drew it to explain?

4.2.9 But should think we have no right to complain of the Algerines, who live on the coast of Africa if they enslave the Americans whom they find sailing in those seas. If we will send our vessels across the Atlantic, of set design, to purchase, kidnap, and decoy the inhabitants of the more southern states of the globe.

That man that will give his vote to import africans for the space of 21 years, to drag out a miserable life in slavery, will vote to enslave the Americans at the end of that period.—The cry has been, enlarge the powers of Congress—enable them to regulate trade; but it seems this Convention will not permit Congress, to prevent the importation of slaves for 21 years yet to come.—The seeming care taken to cover the true intent, and meaning of this, and some other parts of the doings of that Convention, will be sufficient reason in my mind, not to vote for one single paragraph it contains.[6]

4.2.10 I shall make one short remark more on the 8th paragraph of this section, viz. "No title of NOBILITY shall be granted by the United States." Congress, in our articles of Confederation, have used the same precaution; nevertheless the officers of the army have incorporated themselves into a society known by the name of the CINCINNATI. The views of which society, have been fully laid open by the Honorable AEDAMUS BURKE of South-Carolina,[7] which will, if neglected, finally terminate in NOBILITY. It was no doubt founded with those views, and if permitted to have their annual meetings in the manner they have begun, once in a year or oftner, it will be found they will not fail of the original design of their voluntary incorporation.—Not being able to pay the grant made to officers and army, we now pay the annual interest of their grant, being in the whole 99,000, which must till we are able to discharge the principal, be considered as a pension. The principal, I presume, never can be paid, but by the sale of the lands ceeded to the states by treaty.—Nor do they fail to put themselves in the most respectable light, upon all public occasions; I see they convened at New-Haven, at your public commencement, walked in procession with his excellency your Governour, President, Corporation, and Tutors of your College, and the Clergy of the state, and I observe were DUBBED, the honorable society of the CINCINNATI.

Omitting many other, perhaps very exceptionable—I will just make one observation on the 7th Art. which says, "The ratification of nine states shall be sufficient for the establishment of this constitution, between the states so ratifying the same." I would just recommend it to the members of our hon. Convention, to reconcile this 7th Art. with the 13th Art. of our Confederation, which says, "The articles of this Confederation shall be observed by every state, and the union be perpetual, nor shall any alteration at any time be made in any of them, unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterward confirmed by the legislature of each state." It appears as tho' the Convention had wholly overlooked the 13th Art. of our Confederation. Another thing is obvious by this 7th Art. it seems as tho' the nine southern states had prepared their matters in such a manner, that they are ready prepared to dismiss the four northern states, if they do not think fit to adopt the doings of this Convention, and be ready organized to proceed without them, as tho' it was what they expected or desired.[8] The third paragraph in the second Sec. has a passage of the same complexion, in these words, "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several states, which MAY be included within this union." Thus I have only hinted at some of the doings of this Convention which I am able to understand; many other dark and mysterious parts of it, which are beyond my comprehension, I must leave to you and others to unfold.—One thing more, however, is beyond me, which I must mention. The assemblies of the states it seems, will not do to ratify or reject this new Constitution, but it must be done by a CONVENTION, chosen by the PEOPLE, under the recommendation of their legislatures. It is perhaps not so difficult to comprehend the meaning of this measure, as to explain it to the understanding of every one.—The other part you have assigned me, I shall attempt as soon as I can arrange my ideas properly.[9] In the mean time, I am, &c. Yours.

Essays of John DeWitt

(BOSTON) AMERICAN HERALD
October–December 1787

While Samuel Bannister Harding may overstate the case when he describes the essays of "John DeWitt" as "constructed with consummate skill,"[1] they do carry a good deal of solid argument as well as rhetorical power.

John DeWitt begins with a picture of the very favorable political conditions in America, which stand in striking contrast to those of the rest of the world and which were only incidentally and temporarily disturbed by mistakes and imprudencies of the last year (4.3.1–3.2). While everyone admits that the powers of Congress are inadequate, there is no need for a hasty decision (4.3.2). The new government will not work miracles, for the excellence of any government depends on its administration (4.3.4). The Union must indeed be preserved and strengthened, but the broad aims should be to discourage all foreign importations; to encourage greater economy, industry, and self-sufficiency; and to pursue a politics of measures rather than men (4.3.5).

In the second essay the author emphasizes that the proposed Constitution, if adopted, will be practically permanent because of the extreme difficulty of amending it (4.3.6). While not making the absence of a bill of rights a major objection, John DeWitt denies James Wilson's contention that a bill of rights is unnecessary and inappropriate (4.3.7), and he provides one of the best Anti-Federalist discussions of the vexing question whether all powers not given to government are reserved or all powers not reserved are given (4.3.8). The essay ends with a long and comprehensive statement of objections to the Constitution, culminating in the charge that it will destroy the excellent constitution of Massachusetts (4.3.9).

In the third and fourth essays John DeWitt presents the heart of his objection to the Constitution. Considering both the Constitution itself and its advocates, he contends that this is not a government of genuine consent; it is in fact an aristocracy, possessing excessive powers, which is certain to swallow the state governments (4.3.10). His argument is that all men thirst for power; that consequently governments are organized into different branches which check each other; that the checks in the Constitution are inadequate—the Senate is too powerful, representation in the Senate is unequal, the checks of the executive and the House of Representatives are weak—that the House is in any case not representative of the people, and is in fact an "Assistant Aristocratical Branch" (4.3.14); and that the powers to be given to the new government are excessive (4.3.12–14). The fourth essay contains a lengthy discussion of the power of internal taxation, its odiousness and ineffectiveness in general, especially in a government so large and so little representative, and the likelihood that this power will lead to arbitary and tyrannical government (4.3.20–23).

The last essay is taken up largely with a discussion of the Constitutional provisions relating to the militia and standing army, which betray a reluctance to trust the armed people and an intention to rule by military force (4.3.27–32). The paper contains some interesting remarks on the workings of a free, industrious society where the people are too busy to concern themselves much with the principles of their government but where, retaining the political power, they insist on receiving reasoned explanations and arguments from the knowledgeable few who concern themselves with such matters (4.3.24).

I

To the Free Citizens of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

4.3.1 Whoever attentively examines the history of America, and compares it with that of other nations, will find its commencement, its growth, and its present situation, without a precedent.

It must ever prove a source of pleasure to the Philosopher, who ranges the explored parts of this inhabitable globe, and takes a comparative view, as well of the rise and fall of those nations, which have been and are gone, as of the growth and present existence of those which are now in being, to close his prospect with this Western world. In proportion as he loves his fellow creatures, he must here admire and approve; for while they have severally laid their foundations in the blood and slaughter of three, four, and sometimes, ten successive generations, from their passions have experience, every misery to which human nature is subject, and at this day present striking features of usurped power, unequal justice, and despotic tyranny, America stands completely systemised without any of these misfortunes.—On the contrary, from the first settlement of the country, the necessity of civil associations, founded upon equality, consent, and proportionate justice have ever been universally acknowledged.—The means of education always attended to, and the fountains of science brought within the reach of poverty.—Hitherto we have commenced society, and advanced in all respects resembling a family, without partial affections, or even a domestic bickering: And if we consider her as an individual, instead of an undue proportion of violent passions and bad habits, we must set her down possessed of reason, genius and virtue.—I premise these few observations because there are too many among us of narrow minds, who live in the practice of blasting the reputation of their own country.—They hold it as a maxim, that virtues cannot grow in their own soil.—They will appreciate those of a man, they know nothing about, because he is an exotic; while they are sure to depreciate those much more brilliant in their neighbours, because they are really acquainted with and know them.

Civil society is a blessing.—It is here universally known as such.—The education of every child in this country tends to promote it.—There is scarcely a citizen in America who does not wish to bring it, consistent with our situation and circumstances, to its highest state of improvement.—Nay, I may say further, that the people in general aim to effect this point, in a peaceable, laudable, and rational way. These assertions are proved by stubborn facts, and I need only resort to that moment, when, in contest with a powerful enemy, they paid such an unprecedented attention to civilization, as to select from among themselves their different conventions, and form their several constitutions, which, for their beautiful theoretical structure, caught the admiration of our enemies, and secured to us the applause of the world.—We at this day feel the effects of this disposition, and now live under a government of our own choice, constructed by ourselves, upon unequivocal principles, and requires but to be well administered to make us as happy under it as generally falls to the lot of humanity. The disturbances in the course of the year past cannot be placed as an objection to the principle I advance.—They took their rise in idleness, extravagance and misinformation, a want of knowledge of our several finances, a universal delusion at the close of the war, and in consequence thereof, a pressure of embarrassments, which checked, and in many cases, destroyed that disposition of forbearance, which ought to be exercised towards each other. These were added to the accursed practice of letting money at usury, and some few real difficulties and grievances, which our late situation unavoidably brought upon us. The issue of them, however, rather proves the position for, a very few irreclaimables excepted, we find even an anxiety to hearken to reason pervading all classes—industry and frugality increasing, and the advantages arising from good, wholesome laws, confessed by every one.—Let who will gain say it, I am confident we are in a much better situation, in all respects, than we were at this period the last year; and as fast as can be expected, consistent with the passions and habits of a free people, of men who will think for themselves, coalescing, as a corre- 4.3.2

spondent observes in a late paper,[1] under a firm, wise and efficient government. The powers vested in Congress have hitherto been found inadequate.—Who are those that have been against investing them? The people of this Commonwealth have very generally supposed it expedient, and the farmer equally with the merchant have taken steps to effect it.—A Convention from the different States for that sole purpose hath been appointed of their most respectable citizens—respectable indeed I may say for their equity, for their literature, and for their love of their country.—Their proceedings are now before us for our approbation.—The eagerness with which they have been received by certain classes of our fellow citizens, naturally forces upon us this question: Are we to adopt this Government, without an examination?—Some there are, who, literally speaking, are for pressing it upon us at all events. The name of the man who but lisps a sentiment in objection to it, is to be handed to the printer, by the printer to the publick, and by the publick he is to be led to execution. They are themselves stabbing its reputation. For my part, I am a stranger to the necessity for all this haste! Is it not a subject of some small importance? Certainly it is.—Are not your lives, your liberties and properties intimately involved in it?—Certainly they are. Is it a government for a moment, a day, or a year? By no means—but for ages—Altered it may possibly be, but it is easier to correct before it is adopted.—Is it for a family, a state, or a small number of people? It is for a number no less respectable than three millions. Are the enemy at our gates, and have we not time to consider it? Certainly we have. Is it so simple in its form as to be comprehended instantly?—Every letter, if I may be allowed the expression, is an idea. Does it consist of but few additions to our present confederation, and those which have been from time to time described among us, and known to be necessary?—Far otherwise. It is a compleat system of government, and armed with every power, that a people in any circumstances ought to bestow. It is a path newly struck out, and a new set of ideas are introduced that have neither occurred or been digested.—A government for national purposes, preserving our constitution entire, hath been the only plan hitherto agitated. I do not pretend to say, but it is in theory the most unexceptionable, and in practice will be the most conducive to our happiness of any possible to be adopted:—But it ought to undergo a candid and strict examination. It is the duty of every one in the Commonwealth to communicate his sentiments to his neighbour, divested of passion, and equally so of prejudices. If they are honest and he is a real friend to his country, he will do it and embrace every opportunity to do it. If thoroughly looked into before it is adopted, the people will be more apt to approve of it in practice, and every man is a TRAITOR to himself and his posterity, who shall ratify it with his signature, without first endeavouring to understand it.—We are but yet in infancy; and we had better proceed slow than too fast.—It is much easier to dispense powers, than recall them.—The present generation will not be drawn into any system; they are too enlightened; they have not forfeited their right to a share in government, and they ought to enjoy it.

4.3.3 Some are heard to say, "When we consider the men who made it, we ought to take it for sterling, and without hesitation—that they were the collected wisdom of the States, and had no object but the general good."[2]—I do not doubt all this, but facts ought not to be winked out of sight:—They were delegated from different States, and nearly equally represented, though vastly disproportionate both in wealth and numbers. They had local prejudices to combat, and in many instances, totally opposite interests to consult. Their situations, their habits, their extent, and their particular interest, varied each from the other. The gentlemen themselves acknowledge that they have been less rigid upon some points, in consequence of those difficulties than they otherwise should have been.—Others again tell you that the Convention is or will be dissolved; that we must take their proceedings in whole or reject them[3]—But this surely cannot be a reason for their speedy adoption; it rather works the other way. If evils are acknowledged in the composition, we ought, at least, to see whose shoulders are to bear the most; to compare ours with those of other States, and take care that we are not saddled with more than our proportion: That the citizens of Philadelphia are running mad after it, can be no argument for us to do the like:—Their situation is almost contrasted with ours; they suppose themselves a central State; they expect the perpetual residence of Congress, which of itself alone will ensure their aggrandizement: We, on the contrary, are sure to be near one of the extremes; neither the loaves or fishes will be so plenty with us, or shall we be so handy to procure them.

4.3.4 We are told by some people, that upon the adopting this New Government, we are to become every thing in a moment:—Our foreign and domestic debts will be as a feather; our ports will be crowded with the ships of all the world, soliciting our commerce and our produce: Our manufactures will increase and multiply; and, in short, if we STAND STILL, our country, notwithstanding, will be like the blessed Canaan, a land flowing with milk and honey. Let us not deceive ourselves; the only excellency of any government is in exact proportion to the administration of it:[4]—Idleness and luxury will be as much a bane as ever; our passions will be equally at war with us then as now; and if we have men among us trying with all their ability to undermine our present Constitution, these very persons will direct their force to sap the vitals of the new one.—

4.3.5 Upon the whole, my fellow countrymen, I am as much a federal man as any person: In a federal union lies our political salvation—To preserve that union, and make it respectable to foreign opticks, the National Government ought to be armed with all necessary powers; but the subject I conceive of infinite delicacy, and requires both ability and reflection. In discussing points of such moment, America has nothing to do with passions or hard words; every citizen has an undoubted right to examine for himself, neither ought he to be ill treated and abused, because he does not think at the same moment exactly as we do. It is true, that many of us have but our liberties to lose, but they are dearly bought, and are not the least precious in estimation:—In the mean time, is it not of infinite consequence, that we pursue inflexibly that path, which I feel persuaded we are now approaching, wherein we shall discourage all foreign importations; shall see the necessity of greater oeconomy and industry; shall smile upon the husbandman, and reward the industrious mechanick; shall promote the growth of our own country, and wear the produce of our own farms; and, finally, shall support measures in proportion to their honesty and wisdom, without any respect to men. Nothing more is wanted to make us happy at home, and respectable abroad.

II

To the Free Citizens of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

4.3.6 In my last address upon the proceedings of the Foederal Convention, I endeavored to convince you of the importance of the subject, that it required a cool, dispassionate examination, and a thorough investigation, previous to its adoption—that it was not a mere revision and amendment of our first Confederation, but a compleat System for the future government of the United States, and I may now add in preference to, and in exclusion of, all others heretofore adopted.—It is not TEMPORARY, but in its nature, PERPETUAL.—It is not designed that you shall be annually called, either to revise, correct, or renew it; but, that your posterity shall grow up under, and be governed by it, as well as ourselves.—It is not so capable of alterations as you would at the first reading suppose; and I venture to assert, it never can be, unless by force of arms. The fifth article in the proceedings, it is true, expressly provides for an alteration under certain conditions, whenever "it shall be ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by Congress."—Notwithstanding which, such are the "heterogeneous materials from which this System was formed,"[5] such is the difference of interest, different manners, and different local prejudices, in the different parts of the United States, that to obtain that majority of three fourths to any one single alteration, essentially affecting this or any other State, amounts to an absolute impossibility. The conduct of the Delegates in dissolving the Convention, plainly speaks this language, and no other.—Their sentiments in their Letter to his Excellency the President of Congress are—That this Constitution was the result of a spirit of amity—that the parties came together disposed to concede as much as possible each to the other—that mutual concessions and compromises did, in fact, take place, and all those which could, consistent with the peculiarity of their political situation.[6] Their dissolusion enforces the same sentiment, by confining you to the alternative of taking or refusing their doings in the gross. In this view, who is there to be found among us, who can seriously assert, that this Constitution, after ratification and being practised upon, will be so easy of alteration? Where is the probability that a future Convention, in any future day, will be found possessed of a greater spirit of amity and mutual concession than the present? Where is the probability that three fourths of the States in that Convention, or three fourths of the Legislatures of the different States, whose interests differ scarcely in nothing short of every thing, will be so very ready or willing materially to change any part of this System, which shall be to the emolument of an individual State only? No, my fellow-citizens, as you are now obliged to take it in the whole, so you must hereafter administer it in whole, without the prospect of change, unless by again reverting to a state of Nature, which will be ever opposed with success by those who approve of the Government in being.

That the want of a Bill of Rights to accompany this proposed System, is a 4·3·7 solid objection to it, provided there is nothing exceptionable in the System itself, I do not assert.—If, however, there is at any time, a propriety in having one, it would not have been amiss here.[7] A people, entering into society, surrender such a part of their natural rights, as shall be necessary for the existence of that society. They are so precious in themselves, that they would never be parted with, did not the preservation of the remainder require it. They are entrusted in the hands of those, who are very willing to receive them, who are naturally fond of exercising of them, and whose passions are always striving to make a bad use of them.—They are conveyed by a written compact, expressing those which are given up, and the mode in which those reserved shall be secured. Language is so easy of explanation, and so difficult is it by words to convey exact ideas, that the party to be governed cannot be too explicit. The line cannot be drawn with too much precision and accuracy. The necessity of this accuracy and this precision encreases in proportion to the greatness of the sacrifice and the numbers who make it.—That a Constitution for the United States does not require a Bill of Rights, when it is considered, that a Constitution for an individual State would, I cannot conceive.—The difference between them is only in the numbers of the parties concerned; they are both a compact between the Governors and Governed, the letter of which must be adhered to in discussing their powers. That which is not expressly granted, is of course retained.

4.3.8 The Compact itself is a recital upon paper of that proportion of the subject's natural rights, intended to be parted with, for the benefit of adverting to it in case of dispute. Miserable indeed would be the situation of those individual States who have not prefixed to their Constitutions a Bill of Rights, if, as a very respectable, learned Gentleman at the Southward observes, "the People, when they established the powers of legislation under their separate Governments, invested their Representatives with every right and authority which they did not, in explicit terms, reserve; and therefore upon every question, respecting the jurisdiction of the House of Assembly, if the Frame of Government is silent, the jurisdiction is efficient and complete."[8] In other words, those powers which the people by their Constitutions expressly give them, they enjoy by positive grant, and those remaining ones, which they never meant to give them, and which the Constitutions say nothing about, they enjoy by tacit implication, so that by one means and by the other, they became possessed of the whole.—This doctrine is but poorly calculated for the meridian of America, where the nature of compact, the mode of construing them, and the principles upon which society is founded, are so accurately known and universally diffused. That insatiable thirst for unconditional controul over our fellow-creatures, and the facility of sounds to convey essentially different ideas, produced the first Bill of Rights ever prefixed to a Frame of Government. The people, altho' fully sensible that they reserved every tittle of power they did not expressly grant away, yet afraid that the words made use of, to express those rights so granted might convey more than they originally intended, they chose at the same moment to express in different language those rights which the agreement did not include, and which they never designed to part with, endeavoring thereby to prevent any cause for future altercation and the intrusion into society of that doctrine of tacit implication which has been the favorite theme of every tyrant from the origin of all governments to the present day.[9]

4.3.9 The proceedings of the Convention are now handed to you by your Legislature, and the second Wednesday in January is appointed for your final answer. To enable you to give that with propriety; that your future reflections may produce peace, however opposed the present issue of your present conduct may be to your present expectations, you must determine, that, in order to support with dignity the Foederal Union, it is proper and fit, that the present Confederation shall be annihilated:—That the future Congress of the United States shall be armed with the powers of Legislation, Judgment and Execution:—That annual elections in this Congress shall not be known, and the most powerful body, the Senate, in which a due proportion of representation is not preserved, and in which the smallest State has equal weight with the largest, be the longest in duration:—That it is not necessary for the public good, that persons habituated to the exercise of power should ever be reminded from whence they derive it, by a return to the station of private citizens, but that they shall at all times at the expiration of the term for which they were elected to an office, be capable of immediate re-election to that same office:—That you will hereafter risque the probability of having the Chief Executive Branch chosen from among you; and that it is wholly indifferent, both to you and your children after you, whether this future Government shall be administered within the territories of your own State, or at the distance of four thousand miles from them.—You must also determine, that they shall have the exclusive power of imposts and the duties on imports and exports, the power of laying excises and other duties, and the additional power of laying internal taxes upon your lands, your goods, your chattels, as well as your persons at their sovereign pleasure:—That the produce of these several funds shall be appropriated to the use of the United States, and collected by their own officers, armed with a military force, if a civil aid should not prove sufficient:—That the power of organizing, arming and disciplining the militia shall be lodged in them, and this thro' fear that they shall not be sufficiently attentive to keeping so respectable a body of men as the yeomanry of this Commonwealth, compleatly armed, organized and disciplined; they shall have also the power of raising, supporting and establishing a standing army in time of peace in your several towns, and I see not why in your several houses:—That should an insurrection or an invasion, however small, take place, in Georgia, the extremity of the Continent, it is highly expedient they should have the power of suspending the writ of Habeas Corpus in Massachusetts, and as long as they shall judge the public safety requires it:—You must also say, that your present Supreme Judicial Court shall be an Inferior Court to a Continental Court, which is to be inferior to the Supreme Court of the United States:—That from an undue biass which they are supposed to have for the citizens of their own States, they shall not be competent to determine title to your real estate, disputes which may arise upon a protested Bill of Exchange, a simple note of hand, or book debt, wherein your citizens shall be unfortunately involved with disputes of such or any other kind, with citizens either of other States or foreign States: In all such cases they shall have a right to carry their causes to the Supreme Court of the United States, whether for delay only or vexation; however distant from the place of your abode, or inconsistent with your circumstances:—That such appeals shall be extended to matters of fact as well as law, and a trial of the cause by jury you shall not have a right to insist upon.—In short, my fellow-citizens, previous to a capacity of giving a compleat answer to these proceedings, you must determine that the Constitution of your Commonwealth, which is instructive, beautiful and consistent in practice, which has been justly admired in Europe, as a model of perfection, and which the present Convention have affected to imitate, a Constitution which is especially calculated for your territory, and is made conformable to your genius, your habits, the mode of holding your estates, and your particular interests, shall be reduced in its powers to those of a City Corporation:—The skeleton of it may remain, but its vital principle shall be transferred to the new Government: Nay, you must go still further, and agree to invest the new Congress with powers, which you have yet thought proper to withhold from your own present Government.—All these, and more, which are contained in the proceedings of the Foederal Convention, may be highly proper and necessary.—In this overturn of all individual Governments, in this new-fashioned set of ideas, and in this total dereliction of those sentiments which animated us in 1775, the Political Salvation of the United States may be very deeply interested, but BE CAUTIOUS.

John DeWitt.

III

To the Free Citizens of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

4.3.10 Civil liberty, in all countries, hath been promoted by a free discussion of publick measures, and the conduct of publick men. The FREEDOM OF THE PRESS hath, in consequence thereof, been esteemed one of its safe guards. That freedom gives the right, at all times, to every citizen to lay his sentiments, in a decent manner, before the people. If he will take that trouble upon himself, whether they are in point or not, his countrymen are obliged to him for so doing; for, at least, they lead to an examination of the subject upon which he writes.—If any possible situation makes it a duty, it is our present important one, for in the course of sixty or ninety days you are to approve of or reject the present proceedings of your Convention, which, if established, will certainly effect, in a greater or less degree, during the remainder of your lives, those privileges which you esteem dear to you, and not improbably those of your children for succeeding ages. Now therefore is unquestionably the proper time to examine it, and see if it really is what, upon paper, it appears to be. If with yours eyes open, you deliberately accept it, however different it may prove in practice from what it appears in theory, you will have nobody to blame but yourselves; and what is infinitely worse, as I have before endeavoured to observe to you, you will be wholly without a remedy. It has many zealous advocates, and they have attempted, at least as far as their modesty would permit, to monopolize our gazettes, with their encomiums upon it. With the people they have to manage, I would hint to them, their zeal is not their best weapon, and exertions of such a kind, artful attempts to seize the moment, do seldom tend either to elucidate and explain principles, or ensure success. Such conduct ought to be an additional stimulous for those persons who are not its professed admirers, to speak their sentiments with freedom however unpopular.—Such conduct ought to inspire caution, for as a man is invariably known by his company, so is the tendency of principles known by their advocates—Nay, it ought to lead you to enquire who are its advocates? Whether ambitious men throughout America, waiting with impatience to make it a stepping stone to posts of honour and emolument, are not of this class? Whether men who openly profess to be tired of republican governments, and sick to the heart of republican measures; who daily ridicule a government of choice, and pray ardently for one of force, are not of the same class? And, whether there are not men among us, who disapprove of it only because it is not an absolute monarchy, but who, upon the whole, are among its advocates?—In such examinations as these, you cannot mispend a proportion of the sixty days.

All contracts are to be construed according to the meaning of the parties at the time of making them. By which is meant, that mutual communications shall take place, and each shall explain to the other their ideas of the contract before them.—If any unfair practices are made use of, if its real tendency is concealed by either party, or any advantage taken in the execution of it, it is in itself fraudulent and may be avoided. There is no difference in the constitution of government—Consent it is allowed is the spring—The form is the mode in which the people choose to direct their affairs, and the magistrates are but trustees to put that mode in force.—It will not be denied, that this people, of any under Heaven, have a right of living under a government of their own choosing.—That government, originally consented to, which is in practice, what it purports to be in theory, is a government of choice; on the contrary, that which is essentially different in practice, from its appearance in theory, however it may be in letter a government of choice, it never can be so in spirit. Of this latter kind appear to me to be the proceedings of the Foederal Convention—They are presented as a Frame of Government purely Republican, and perfectly consistent with the individual governments in the Union. It is declared to be constructed for national purposes only, and not calculated to interfere with domestic concerns. You are told, that the rights of the people are very amply secured, and when the wheels of it are put in motion, it will wear a milder aspect than its present one. Whereas the very contrary of all this doctrine appears to be true. Upon an attentive examination you can pronounce it nothing less, than a government which in a few years, will degenerate to a compleat Aristocracy, armed with powers unnecessary in any case to bestow, and which in its vortex swallows up every other Government upon the Continent. In short, my fellow-citizens, it can be said to be nothing less than a hasty stride to Universal Empire in this Western World, flattering, very flattering to young ambitious minds, but fatal to the liberties of the people. The cord is strained to the very utmost.—There is every spice of the SIC. JUBEO possible in the composition. Your consent is requested, because it is essential to the introduction of it; after having received-confirmation, your complaints may encrease the whistling of the wind, and they will be equally regarded.

4.3.12 It cannot be doubted at this day by any men of common sense, that there is a charm in politicks. That persons who enter reluctantly into office become habituated, grow fond of it, and are loath to resign it.—They feel themselves flattered and elevated, and are apt to forget their constituents, until the time returns that they again feel the want of them.—They uniformly exercise all the powers granted to them, and ninety-nine in a hundred are for grasping at more. It is this passionate thirst for power, which has produced different branches to exercise different departments and mutual checks upon those branches. The aristocratical hath ever been found to have the most influence, and the people in most countries have been particularly attentive in providing checks against it. Let us see if it is the case here.—A President, a Senate, and a House of Representatives are proposed. The Judicial Department is at present out of the question, being separated excepting in impeachments. The Legislative is divided between the People who are the Democratical, and the Senate who are the Aristocratical part, and the Executive between the same Senate and the President who represents the Monarchical Branch.—In the construction of this System, their interests are put in opposite scales. If they are exactly balanced, the Government will remain perfect; if there is a prepondency, it will finally prevail. After the first four years, each Senator will hold his seat for the term of six years. This length of time will be amply sufficient of itself to remove any checks that he may have upon his independency, from the fear of a future election. He will consider that it is a serious portion of his life after the age of thirty; that places of honour and trust are not generally obtained unsolicited. The same means that placed him there may be again made use of; his influence and his abilities arising from his opportunities, will, during the whole term encrease those means; he will have a compleat negative upon all laws that shall be general, or that shall favor individuals, and a voice in the appointment of all officers in the United States.—Thus habituated to power, and living in the daily practice of granting favors and receiving solicitations, he may hold himself compleatly independent of the people, and at the same time ensure his election. If there remains even a risque, the blessed assistance of a little well-distributed money, will remove it.

4.3.13 With respect to the Executive, the Senate excepting in nomination, have a negative upon the President, and if we but a moment attend to their situation and to his, and to the power of persuasion over the human mind, especially when employed in behalf of friends and favorites, we cannot hesitate to say, that he will be infinitely less apt to disoblige them, than they to refuse him. It is far easier for twenty to gain over one, than one twenty; besides, in the one case, we can ascertain where the denial comes from, and the other we cannot. It is also highly improbable but some of the members, perhaps a major part, will hold their seats during their lives. We see it daily in our own Government, and we see it in every Government we are acquainted with, however many the cautions, and however frequent the elections.

These considerations, added to their share above mentioned in the Executive department must give them a decided superiority over the House of Representatives.—But that superiority is greatly enhanced, when we consider the difference of time for which they are chosen. They will have become adepts in the mystery of administration, while the House of Representatives may be composed perhaps two thirds of members, just entering into office, little used to the course of business, and totally unacquainted with the means made use of to accomplish it.—Very possible also in a country where they are total strangers.—But, my fellow-citizens, the important question here arises, who are this House of Representatives? "A representative Assembly, says the celebrated Mr. Adams, is the sense of the people, and the perfection of the portrait, consists in the likeness."[10]—Can this Assembly be said to contain the sense of the people?—Do they resemble the people in any one single feature?—Do you represent your wants, your grievances, your wishes, in person? If that is impracticable, have you a right to send one of your townsmen for that purpose?—Have you a right to send one from your county? Have you a right to send more than one for every thirty thousand of you? Can he be presumed knowing to your different, peculiar situations—your abilities to pay publick taxes, when they ought to be abated, and when encreased? Or is there any possibility of giving him information? All these questions must be answered in the negative. But how are these men to be chosen? Is there any other way than by dividing the State into districts? May not you as well at once invest your annual Assemblies with the power of choosing them—where is the essential difference? The nature of the thing will admit of none. Nay, you give them the power to prescribe the mode. They may invest it in themselves.—If you choose them yourselves, you must take them upon credit, and elect those persons you know only by common fame. Even this privilege is denied you annually, through fear that you might withhold the shadow of controul over them. In this view of the System, let me sincerely ask you, where is the people in this House of Representatives?—Where is the boasted popular part of this much admired System?—Are they not couzin germans in every sense to the Senate? May they not with propriety be termed an Assistant Aristocratical Branch, who will be infinitely more inclined to co-operate and compromise with each other, than to be the careful guardians of the rights of their constituents? Who is there among you would not start at being told, that instead of your present House of Representatives, consisting of members chosen from every town, your future Houses were to consist of but ten in number, and these to be chosen by districts?—What man among you would betray his country and approve of it? And yet how infinitely preferable to the plan proposed?—In the one case the elections would be annual, the persons elected would reside in the center of you, their interests would be yours, they would be subject to your immediate controul, and nobody to consult in their deliberations—But in the other, they are chosen for double the time, during which, however well disposed, they become strangers to the very people choosing them, they reside at a distance from you, you have no controul over them, you cannot observe their conduct, and they have to consult and finally be guided by twelve other States, whose interests are, in all material points, directly opposed to yours. Let me again ask you, What citizen is there in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, that would deliberately consent laying aside the mode proposed, that the several Senates of the several States, should be the popular Branch, and together, form one National House of Representatives?—And yet one moment's attention will evince to you, that this blessed proposed Representation of the People, this apparent faithful Mirror, this striking Likeness, is to be still further refined, and more Aristocratical four times told.—Where now is the exact balance which has been so diligently attended to? Where lies the security of the people? What assurances have they that either their taxes will not be exacted but in the greatest emergencies, and then sparingly, or that standing armies will be raised and supported for the very plausible purpose only of cantoning them upon their frontiers? There is but one answer to these questions.—They have none. Nor was it intended by the makers they should have, for meaning to make a different use of the latter, they never will be at a loss for ways and means to expend the former. They do not design to beg a second time. Knowing the danger of frequent applications to the people, they ask for the whole at once, and are now by their conduct, teazing and absolutely haunting of you into a compliance.[11]—If you choose all these things should take place, by all means gratify them. Go, and establish this Government, which is unanimously confessed imperfect, yet incapable of alteration. Intrust it to men, subject to the same unbounded passions and infirmities as yourselves, possessed with an insatiable thirst for power, and many of them, carrying in them vices, tho' tinsel'd and concealed, yet, in themselves, not less dangerous than those more naked and exposed. But in the mean time, add an additional weight to the stone that now covers the remains of the Great WARREN and MONTGOMERY;[12] prepare an apology for the blood and treasure, profusely spent to obtain those rights which you now so tamely part with. Conceal yourselves from the ridicule of your enemies, and bring your New-England spirits to a level with the contempt of mankind. Henceforth you may sit yourselves down with propriety, and say, Blessed are they that never expect, for they shall not be disappointed.

IV

To the Free Citizens of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Place the Frame of Government proposed, in the most favorable point of view, magnify the priviledges held forth to the people to their fullest extent, and enlarge as much as you please, upon the great checks therein provided, notwithstanding all which, there cannot remain a doubt in the mind of any reflecting man, that it is a System purely Aristocratical, calculated to find employment for men of ambition, and to furnish means of sporting with the sacred principles of human nature. The great object throughout, is the acquisition of property and power, and every possible opportunity has been embraced to make ample provision for supplying a redundancy of the one, to exercise the other in its fullest extent. They have engrossed to themselves the riches of America, and are carefully silent what use they intend to put them to. Powers are there granted, that shall give to persons, greater strangers, and perhaps greater enemies to you than the people of Great-Britain, the right of entry into your habitations without your consent, not a lisp being mentioned as to the mode or time when such powers shall be exercised. They have taken to themselves the Purse and Sword of your country. 4.3.15

Like the performance of a fine painter, the Senate is the subject of the piece painted.—The people with their priviledges, to an attentive observer, may be seen in the back ground, composing an insignificant part of the drapery, but their existence depends upon the freshness of the colours.—Frequent handling, a little exposure, and the smallest inroads of time upon these shades, will soon destroy them, and they will no longer be considered a part of the composition. If this is true—if in any future period, however distant, we are to be governed by One Branch, it surely behoves us to provide for an equal voice in that Branch, that our respective influence shall bear some small proportion to our respective contributions and numbers: Whereas in this System, equality is totally disregarded. Five pounds in the Senate has an equal voice with fifty, and about five hundred thousand of the inhabitants the same number of votes with the remaining three millions. Where then is the probability the rights of the people will find equal security? Is it not demonstrable that your burthens will be great in proportion as your influence in that body that imposes them is small? As it respects this Commonwealth, infinitely better would be our situation in a representation in the British Parliament. The terms offered us by our enemies to place us as we stood in 1763,[13] bear no comparison in their consequences, to those which would flow from the exercise of the powers of this Government by the Senate, as now constructed. If the same proportion in numbers and property had been observed in this Branch as in the House of Representatives (and no reason why it was not hath yet appeared, excepting what the celebrated 4.3.16

Southern gentleman is pleased to term a "necessary compromise between contending interests["]][14] however successful they might be hereafter in arrogating all the powers of government to themselves, or however severe in executing them, still one gleam of hope with the spirit of consolation would be found in the breast of the subject, that his grievances were proportionate to those of his neighbours; but in the present case, even this satisfaction is denied him—the uncertainty is not left him—his reason instanter convinces him it is not so.

4.3.17 It is idle to expect more virtue in an American than in an individual of any other nation.—That in opposition to all other countries, we are disposed in this, to live peaceably with each other, to consult our neighbours[']] interest equally with our own, and to do to others as we should wish they should do to us. This being the case, we should not want any government.—Human nature is the same in all parts of the world, bad is the best:[15] Education and example may tend to check or promote good or bad qualities, and encourage different degrees of vice. Some passions are more encreased by exercise in some countries than in others; but in all, the original stock is the same. We see in America the same vices, as abroad, and we are not backward in the practice of both wit and ingenuity in cultivating them. The pleasure of controul is palatable to all mankind without a single exception from the cradle to the throne. Let our peculiar situations be what they may, our proportion of happiness great, our domestic circles pleasing, our love of money unbounded, without a moment of suspence, still we are ready to risque the sacrifice of them all for a share in the exercise of power over our fellow creatures,—for the sake of governing others, instead of being governed ourselves; and the more we examine the conduct of those men who have been intrusted with the administration of governments, the more assured we shall be in our position, that mankind have perhaps in every instance abused the authority vested in them, or attempted the abuse of it. In considering the present Government before us, we therefore certainly ought to look upon those who are to put it in motion, as our enemies—to be careful what we give—to see what use it is to be put to—and where to resort for a remedy, if it is abused.—Every door unguardedly left open, they will take care we never shall hereafter shut—every link in the chain unrevitted, they will provide shall always remain so.—It is of the last importance we set out right, we never can return to our present situation so well prepared to set out again.

4.3.18 This institution once established will not wear wholly out for thousands of years.—It will not be easy for any single State to alter it by force of arms.—To guard against such attempts, will claim the earliest attention of our new Governours.

4.3.19 To you, my fellow-citizens, let me now appeal: To you, who do not expect immediately to taste the sweets that flow from unlimited power, who determine upon principles that are immutable, who are not warped by private interest, and do not see through different mediums on different days—is there any among you who have had leisure to examine this Frame of Government, and without taking into consideration the powers granted therein, can say he approves of it—that he is pleased with the organization of the different branches, in their balances and their checks, that the people are fully and adequately represented, and let Human Nature be as depraved as Hell itself, (and we all know it is) yet the means provided to keep it within bounds are ample for the purposes?—I trust there is not one so passively disposed.—Indeed there cannot be, for it is grossly deficient in all these properties, it fails in a balance, and in a due seperation of the different departments—it totally fails in a fair, faithful, honest image of the people, and in an equality of representation, in the only powerful branch in it.—I feel a confidence that the good sense of the people of this Commonwealth, will secure a proper decision upon so important a subject. I feel animated, when I reflect, in what precious estimation they have held their liberties, from the settlement of their country to the present hour—with what ardour they have encountered distress, poverty and death, to preserve and secure them, and with what caution they have parted with even that proportion, which is necessary for the assistance of good order and society.—I go on further to contend, that though its frame was the best ever proposed to a people for their acceptance, and would last properly balanced for ages, yet powers are there given, more than are either fit or necessary in any case to be parted with.

The extent of our country, with all its striking features, while they conspire to promote a foederal union, are totally inconsistant with the plan of one Universal Empire, involving in it the destruction of the different State Governments.—I appeal to the most flaming zealots for the new Constitution, whether one of them, until the disclosure of the proceedings, entertained an idea, that the Convention would assume the power of internal taxation.—I dare affirm it was not lisped by an individual, throughout the whole Continent. Among all the conversations respecting the sending of members to that Convention; even the claim over the excises was not started.—It was on the contrary, a point universally conceded, that had the impost been vested in Congress by the States at the time proposed, with powers to collect it, there never would have been an occasion for a Convention. That foederal measures would have taken a favourable turn, and with the proceeds of that revenue, Congress would have been able to have supported her own household, paid the interest of her domestic debt, and the different instalments, and interest of her foreign. But now these same Gentlemen, despising every civil institution yet adopted in America, and finding the form of Government far more grateful to their ambitious spirits than they ever imagined, will tell you, that the existance of the Continent depends upon its adoption—that we are ruined and undone, if we do not cordially embrace it, but if we do, like the ingenious dentist, it will pull from the breast of every citizen, all his jarring, malevolent passions, making us a wise, virtuous and wealthy people, and though they do not in plain words say that the millennium is to commence on its birth day; yet they describe to you, all the blessed effects expectant upon such an aera.

4.3.21 A dry tax is at all times odious.[16] It is not congenial to the feelings of a free people. It is a visible demand upon a man at noon day, of that which he prefers to his life. He is called upon, when the necessity of giving it to support the society he lives in, does not strike him so forceably;—he for ever parts with it with reluctance, and would never consent, but under a conviction, that it is absolutely necessary—that it is his proportion—that it will be properly applied, and is laid upon him by his neighbour, chosen by himself, whom he controuls, and who bears an equal share of the same burthen.—It is a science difficult in its nature, duly to assess it. A man must not only be knowing to the different circumstances of every individual, the value of his real and personal estate—but also must be without passions, without prejudices, without connections, making it his whole business. This not being the case, produces heart burnings, evasions, false oaths, unequal assessments, delays of payment, and finally, inability. These inconveniences are still increased by the mode of collecting the tax when so assessed. This trust is placed, in general, in persons who have neither knowledge or discretion equal to the importance of it. An opportunity is put into their hands to gratify all their little prejudices and resentments. They will unreasonably press upon one, and at the same moment indulge another. Unused to handle large sums of money, they cannot help fingering untill they think it their own—They missapply first a small proportion, one extravagance leads to another, until they are in arrears when called upon—and the honest and industrious are obliged again to contribute to supply their deficiencies.—This is the operation of a dry tax in its best situation; and it serves to demonstrate, that taxation and representation are inseperable—that they never can be laid upon the subject but by himself, or his representative, not treble refined, but resident in his vicinity, who shall be conversant both in his ability as to quantum, and propriety as to time. Even then they ought not be resorted to, but in the last extremity, for surely this Commonwealth will not be backward to testify, that notwithstanding they have made the experiment under the most promising circumstances, still woeful experience demonstrates the utter impossibility of raising and collecting monies sufficient for the use of government in such an odious, unequal manner. The five taxes past, in their consequences, have introduced idleness, dissipation, fraud, discontent, bankruptcies, unlawful speculations, stock-jobbing, and every other vice incident to our species, without supplying the Treasury with scarce a farthing.[17] Government have always demonstrated a disposition to ease the people in the payment as much as in their power, notwithstanding which no one single person is satisfied, Government itself almost destroyed in consequence, and the end proposed in no one shape answered. If then, my fellow citizens, it is so easily demonstrated that dry taxes are attended with such fatal consequences, when we impose them ourselves, that the evils accompanying the collection of them in the best given circumstances, over-balance all the advantages accruing from the monies raised by such collections.—What reason have you to suppose that a Continental tax will be more beneficial in its consequences, more equal in its assessments, and milder in its mode of collection. A man must be distracted to suppose so, for there are no avenues open for either of those consequences to flow through. In the first instance, the sum will be laid upon you by people that cannot be sufficiently acquainted with your country. A new set of Continental pensioned Assessors will be introduced into your towns, whose interest will be distinct from yours.—They will be joined by another set of Continental Collectors, still less principled and less adequate than the former. Attempts will be made by interested men upon their integrity, and instances of their deviations will be daily before your eyes.—At a distance from their employers and removed from the Seat of Government, you will see them exulting with ideas, that they can practice their oppression upon you with impunity, and in their rioting and debauchery they will squander the proceeds of your industry.—The extremes of tyranny are commonly at the extreme parts of the country governed. You must kiss the rod, or they will make you feel it.—According to the spirit of obedience which you manifest; to the ease with which you part with your money, so will the mode of assessing and collecting it be varied from time to time by your new masters. If one man shall not be competent, he shall be attended with an host.—Whether that host shall be the posse of your country or a file of armed soliders, shall depend upon circumstances. They are to determine, and you are to make no laws inconsistent with such determination, whether such Collectors shall carry with them any paper, purporting their commission, or not—whether it shall be a general warrant, or a special one—whether written or printed—whether any of your goods, or your persons shall be exempt from distress, and in what manner either you or your property is to be treated when taken in consequence of such warrants. They will have the liberty of entering your houses by night as well as by day for such purposes.—All these points are given in letter and in spirit to the New Constitution, and the subject has not a shadow of security that they will not be executed.—Nay, if they ever should mean to exercise the right of taxation at all, I affirm it can be done with success by them in no other way, but in an arbitrary manner, and by previously subduing the spirit and strength of this Commonwealth.

In forming our own Constitution, by persons having one common interest, we deemed it of consequence, to preface such powers, with the mode in which they should be exercised.—We thought it highly proper to declare 4.3.22

"That every subject had a right to be secured from all unreasonable searches and seizures of his person, his houses, his papers, and all his possessions—that all warrants were contrary to this right, if the cause or foundation of them be not previously supported by oath or affirmation, and if the order in the warrant to a civil officer, be not accompanied with a special designation," &c.[18] &c. &c.—These checks are omitted, however, in the present proceedings, and the sole reason why appears to be this, that the makers of them know the power itself to be improper, that the people would always be convinced of that impropriety, and would never submit, so long as they could resist.—That of course it must be collected without these checks, or not collected at all.

4.3.23 These are serious thoughts.—They may by some be called bugbears; but they will be verified in the future history of America, with a vengeance.—That it will be in five, ten or fifteen years is not probable. Your rulers will be too knowing, to be over hasty in a display of their strength; they will not loose ground so easily as the Court of Great-Britain did for want of a little well timed policy.—Your chains will be gradual, and gilded. But finally they will be as visible as the Summer's Sun in the Meridian. Where is the Government under Heaven, where every farthing is not taken from the people, that they possibly can part with.—It must be the case here. Their interest will point out to them the policy in accustoming you to contributions, and their curiosity will be early excited to make the experiment to constitute a thermometer for your feelings.—They will have a plausible pretext.—They will tell you your burthens will be less when you get out of debt, and that they are the effect of not adopting it sooner.—They have large demands upon them, and matters of moment to undertake. The officers of their Government will be encreased an hundred fold, and the liberality with which they have expended their money in salaries plainly evinces the improbability that there ever will be a great sum lying idle in their treasury.

To the Free Citizens of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

4.3.24 The chief blessings of society, like individuals, are fond of association, and have a mutual dependence upon each other. They form links of one chain, and are all actuated by the same cause. Where freedom prevails, industry and science there also prevail. Industry produces wealth, and science preserves freedom in purity. The majority of the people in all such countries become so active in their different pursuits, that they are deprived both of their time and opportunity to inform themselves of the principles of the government by which those great blessings are secured to them, and almost implicitly rely both for the explaining and for the enforcing of those principles upon the patriotism of those, their fellow-citizens, who labour but in the field of enquiry, and who spend their whole time in researches after knowledge. Thanks be to Heaven, that in America, that majority always retaining the power, the others have never dared to enforce their principles, without previous explanation, and it has become natural to mankind, wherever they have a system of any kind, a favorite, if it is as genuine and honest in principle, as in appearance, they leave no active powers of the mind unessayed, in elucidating, explaining and enlarging upon its benefits to those whom they wish should adopt it—all its good qualities are delineated, and every exertion is made to refute all objections offered against it, which exertions will be crowned with success, if the objections in themselves are futile, and will not bear the force of light and argument.

The malevolent passions of the heart are not called in, private faults of individuals are not raked from oblivion and magnified, invidious representations are not made, neither are the slanderous, envenomed darts of malice and envy hurled against those characters, who yesterday were deemed praiseworthy and held sacred for a series of obligations conferred by them upon their country, but to day are execrated with passion, because they do not in all points see as other men see. On the contrary, cool reasoning and dispassionate argument, are of themselves sufficient to build up such a system, to unravel all its mysteries, and to present to the people in expressive, legible colours, the blessings that will result from its adoption. Where this mode of conduct is not pursued by its advocates, where instead of cool reasoning upon the subject in question, artful evasions are presented, the system itself is winked out of sight, instead of dispassionate endeavours to remove difficulties arising in honest minds, which are offered with decency to the public in order to be refuted, those who make them are loaded with the opprobrious terms of Insurgents, destroyers of all government, bankrupts, defaulters, and anti-federalists, which is worse than jacobitism: Where, instead of promoting free discussions upon the most important subject ever before a community, attempts are made to fetter and suppress such discussions, by THREATENING the Printer and DROPPING the papers that contain them: Where, instead of coming forward like men, in the full exercise of reason, like fellow-citizens warmed with a patriotick ardour for their country, emulous to secure and preserve its sacred principles, and with proper weapons disarming their fellow-citizens of those objections, they blast and asperse their characters (the dernier resort of all supporters of a bad cause) I say the people have a fair, undoubted right to presume those objections unanswerable, the system itself essentially defective, and that its advocates are, by their conduct, endeavouring not to reason, but to surprize the people into a hasty approbation of it.—

4.3.26 That this is the case with the supporters of the proceedings of the Foederal Convention, far be it from me to declare.—Judge, my fellow-citizens, for yourselves—examine the public prints from the promulgation of this Constitution. Objections there you will find in score—are they offered with decency? Do they attack men or measures? Are they answered in the same manner? And do you discover a desire in those who wish you to embrace this Government, to inform you of its principles, and the consequences which will probably ensue from such principles—why they have taken from you the sinews of your present government, and instead of revising and amending your Confederation; have handed you a new one, contrasted in the plenitude of its powers.—As you answer these questions, so you must make up your opinion upon that which is before you.

4.3.27 They have the power of "organizing, arming and disciplining the militia, and of governing them when in service of the United States, giving to the separate States the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." Let us enquire, why they have assumed this power, for if it is for the purpose of forming you into one uniform, solid body throughout the United States, making you respectable both at home and abroad—of arming you more compleatly and exercising you oftener—of strengthening the power which is now lodged in your hands, and relying upon you and you solely for aid and support to the civil power in the execution of all the laws of the New Congress, it certainly can be no where better placed under the restrictions therein mentioned, than in that body. But is this probable. Does the complection of the proceedings countenance such a supposition? When they unprecedently claim the power of raising and supporting standing armies, do they tell you for what purposes they are to be raised?—How they are to be employed?—How many they are to consist of, and where to be stationed?—Is this power fettered with any one of these necessary restrictions which will shew they depend upon the militia, and not upon this infernal engine of oppression to execute their civil laws. The nature of the demand in itself contradicts such a supposition, and forces you to believe that it is for none of these causes—but rather for the purpose of consolidating and finally destroying your strength, as your respective Governments are to be destroyed.

4.3.28 They well know the impolicy of putting or keeping arms in the hands of a nervous people, at a distance from the Seat of Government, upon whom they mean to exercise the powers granted in that Government.—They have no idea of calling upon the party aggrieved to support and enforce their own grievances. They are aware of the necessity of catching Samson asleep to trim him of his locks. It is asserted by the most respectable writers upon

Government, that a well regulated militia, composed of the yeomanry of the country have ever been considered as the bulwark of a free people; and, says the celebrated Mr. HUME, "without it, it is folly to think any free government will have stability or security—When the sword is introduced, as in our constitution (speaking of the British) the person entrusted will always neglect to discipline the militia, in order to have a pretext for keeping up a standing army; and it is evident this is a mortal distemper in the British parliament, of which it must finally inevitably perish."[20]—If they have not the same design, why do they wish a standing army unrestrained? It is universally agreed, that a militia and a standing body of troops never yet flourished in the same soil. Tyrants have uniformly depended upon the latter, at the expence of the former. Experience has taught them, that a standing body of regular forces, where ever they can be compleatly introduced, are always efficacious in enforcing their edicts, however arbitrary, and slaves by profession themselves, are "nothing loath" to break down the barriers of freedom with a gout.—No, my fellow-citizens, this plainly shews they do not mean to depend upon the citizens of the States alone to enforce their powers, wherefore it is their policy to neglect them, and lean upon something more substantial and summary. It is true, they have left the appointment of officers in the breast of the several States; but this to me, appears an insult, rather than a priveledge, for what avails this right, if they in their pleasure should choose to neglect to arm, organize and discipline the men over whom such Officers are to be appointed. It is a bait, that you might be led to suppose they did intend to apply to them in all cases, and to pay particular attention to making them the bulwark of this Continent.—And would they not be equal to such an undertaking?—Are they not abundantly able to give security and stability to your government as long as it is free? Are they not the only proper persons to do it? Are they not the most respectable body of yeomanry in that character upon earth? Have they not been deeply engaged in some of the most brilliant actions in America, and more than once decided the fate of armies? In short, do they not preclude the necessity of any standing army whatsoever, unless in case of invasion; and in that case it would be time enough to raise them, for no free government under Heaven, with a well disciplined militia was ever yet subdued by mercenary troups.[21]

The advocates at the present day, for a standing army in the New Con- 4.3.29
gress pretend it is necessary for the respectability of government. I defy them to produce an instance in any country, in the Old or New World, where they have not finally done away the liberties of the people:—Every writer upon government,—Lock, Sidney, Hamden, and a list of others have uniformly asserted, that standing armies are a solecism in any government; that no nation ever supported them, that did not resort to, rely on, and finally become a prey to them.—No Western Historians have yet been hardy enough to advance principles that look a different way. What historians have asserted, all the Grecian Republicks have verified.—They are brought up to obedience and unconditional submission.—With arms in their hands, they are taught to feel the weight of rigid discipline:—They are excluded from the enjoyments which liberty gives to its votaries, they, in consequence, hate and envy the rest of the community in which they are placed, and indulge a malignant pleasure in destroying those privileges to which they never can be admitted.—"Without them, says the Marquis of Beccaria, in every society there is an effort constantly tending to confer on one part the height of power, and to reduce the other to the extreme of weakness and misery, and this is of itself sufficient to employ the people's attention."[22] There is no instance of any government being reduced to a confirmed tyranny without military oppression; and the first policy of tyrants has been to annihilate all other means of national activity and defence, and to rely solely upon standing troops.—Repeated were the trials before the Sovereigns of Europe dared to introduce them upon any pretext whatever; and the whole record of the transactions of mankind cannot furnish an instance (unless the proceedings of the Convention may now be called a part of that record) where the motives which caused their establishment, were not completely disguised.—Pisistratus in Greece, and Dyonysius in Syracuse, Charles in France, and Henry in England, all cloaked their villainous intentions under an idea of raising a small body for a guard to their persons; and Spain, could not succeed in the same nefarious plan, until through the influence of the ambitious Priest, they were called upon to resist the progress of the Infidels. "Caesar, who first attacked the commonwealth with mines, very soon opened his batteries."[23]—Notwithstanding all these objections to this engine of oppression, which are made by the most experienced men, and confirmed by every country, where the rays of freedom ever extended.—Yet in America, which has hitherto been her favorite abode—in this civilized territory, where property is valuable, and men are found with feelings that will not patiently submit to arbitrary controul—in this Western region, where, my fellow-countrymen, it is confessedly proper that you should associate and dwell in society from choice and reflection, and not be kept together by force and fear, you are modestly requested to engraft into the component parts of your Constitution , a STANDING ARMY, without any qualifying restraints whatever,—certainly to exist somewhere within the bowels of your country in time of peace. It is very true, that the celebrated Mr. Wilson, a member of the Convention, and who we may suppose breathes, in some measure, the spirit of that body, tells you, it is for the purpose of forming cantonments upon your frontiers, and for the dignity and safety of your country, as it respects foreign nations.[24] No man that loves his country could object to their being raised for the first of these causes, but for the last it cannot be necessary. GOD has so separated us by an extensive ocean from the rest of mankind, he hath so liberally endowed us with privileges, and so abundantly taught us to esteem them precious, it would be impossible, while we retain our integrity and advert to first principles, for any nation whatever to subdue us. We have succeeded in an opposition to the most powerful people upon the globe; and the wound that America received in the struggle, where is it? As speedily healed as the track in the ocean is buried by the succeeding wave. It has scarcely stopped her progress, and our private dissentions only at this moment, tarnish the lustre of the most illustrious infant nation under Heaven.

4.3.30 You cannot help suspecting this gentleman, when he goes on to tell you, "that standing armies in time of peace, have always been a topic of popular declamation, but Europe hath found them necessary to maintain the appearance of strength in a season of the most profound tranquility."[25]—This shews you his opinion, and that he as one of the Convention, was for unequivocally establishing them in time of peace; and to object to them is mere popular declamation. But I will not, my countrymen, I cannot believe you to be of the same sentiment. Where is the standing army in the world, that, like the musquet they make use of, hath been, in time of peace, brightned and burnished for the sake only of maintaining an appearance of strength, without being put to a different use, without having had a pernicious influence upon the morals, the habits, and the sentiments of society, and finally, taking a chief part in executing its laws. But some say, that there is a controul over them, and that consists in the appropriation of monies for their support. Turn your attention to England, and see the popular part of this constitution by the influence of money, by the influence of military and revenue officers, brought gravely to give their annual assent to the existence of a standing army, and for monies to support it. It has long since been an insult on the good sense of that nation.

4.3.31 It may not be amiss to remind you of that swarm of revenue, excise, impost and stamp officers, Continental assessors and collectors, that your new Constitution will introduce among you. They will, of themselves, be a STANDING ARMY to you, and you will see them at your elections, active and industrious to secure the seats of those men who put them into office:—They will be very adequate to give you a surfeit of their company, to make you tired in meddling with government, and disposed to become indifferent about the exercise of it, without the blessed assistance of any military corps.—

4.3.32 Upon the whole, my countrymen, it appears to me, that this power as it now stands, is decidedly improper and dangerous. That Congress ought to have the power of raising armies when invaded by our enemies, is certain; that they ought not to have it for any other cause, is equally so. If they did not or do not mean to employ them in any other way, they ought in express terms to say so, in a Bill of Rights. They never ought to exist at all, but in subordination to civil authority. If the people are not in general disposed to execute the powers of government, it is time to suspect there is something wrong in that government, and rather than employ a standing army, they had better have another; for, in my humble opinion, it is yet much too early to set it down for a fact, that mankind cannot be governed, but by force.

Essays by Vox Populi

MASSACHUSETTS GAZETTE
October–November 1787

Vox Populi provides a rather good statement of the very widespread Anti-Federal objection to the power of Congress to make or alter regulations fixing the times, places, and manner of holding elections (4.4.2–8). He also discusses at length and with a good deal of competence the alleged incompatibility between the constitution of Massachusetts, including the oath its officers are required to give, and the proposed federal Constitution (4.4.26–40). Other subjects treated are the basis of civil society in jealousy and distrust of other men (4.4.16), the significance of past neglect and violations of the Articles of Confederation (4.4.18–19), the possibility of adoption of the new Constitution by a very small number (4.4.14, 20), the undesirability of curtailing the states' rights to secure new forms of taxation (4.4.21), and the absence of a bill of rights (6.6.22–24). The author was, according to one of his critics, a member of the Massachusetts legislature.[1]

As the proposed Federal Constitution is now before the impartial publick, 4.4.1
for their approbation or disallowance, I conceive it to be the duty, as well as the PRIVILEGE of each and every citizen of this commonwealth to investigate the matter fully, and ripen his mind for a suitable answer to the important question; and when he has thus furnished his own judgment, I conceive he has, at least, a right to hold up his sentiments to publick view, and throw all the light he is capable of before the publick; and in case of any doubt in his own mind with regard to said Constitution, or any part thereof, he may undoubtedly worth [throw?] such doubts before the publick, that they may be publickly taken up and obviated.

4.4.2 These things premised, I beg leave to lay before the candid publick the first clause in the fourth section of the first article of the proposed Constitution.—

"The times, places and manner of holding elections, for senators and representatives, shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations—except as to the places of choosing senators."

By this clause, the time, place and manner of choosing representatives is wholly at the disposal of Congress.

4.4.3 Why the Convention, who formed the proposed Constitution, wished to invest Congress with such a power, I am by no means capable of saying; or why the good people of this commonwealth should delegate such a power to them, is no less hard to determine.—But as the subject is open for discussion, I shall make a little free inquiry into the matter.

And, first. What national advantage is there to be acquired by giving them such a power?

The only advantage which I have heard proposed by it is, to prevent a partial representation of the several states in Congress; "for if the time, manner and place were left wholly in the hands of the state legislatures, it is probable they would not make provision by appointing time, manner and place for election; in which case there could be no election, and consequently the federal government weakened."[1]

4.4.4 But this provision is by no means sufficient to prevent an evil of that nature; for will any reasonable man suppose, that when the legislature of any state, who are annually chosen, are so corrupt as to break thro' that government which they have formed, and refuse to appoint time, place and manner of choosing representatives—I say, can any person suppose, that a state, so corrupt, would not be full as likely to neglect, or even refuse, to choose representatives at the time and place and in the manner prescribed by Congress? Surely they would.—So it could answer no good national purpose on that account; and I have not heard any other national advantage proposed thereby.

4.4.5 We will now proceed, in the next place, to consider why the people of this commonwealth should vest Congress with such a power.—

No one proposes that it would be any advantage to the people of this state; therefore, it must be considered as a matter of indifference, except there is an opportunity for its operating to their disadvantage: in which case, I conceive it ought to be disapprobated.

4.4.6 Whether there is danger of its operating to the good people's disadvantage, shall now be the subject of our inquiry.—

Supposing Congress should direct, that the representatives of this commonwealth should be chosen all in one town, (Boston, for instance) on the first day of March—would not that be a very injurious institution to the good people of this commonwealth?—Would not there be at least nine-tenths of the landed interest of this commonwealth intirely unrepresented? Surely one may reasonably imagine there would. What, then, would be the case if Congress should think proper to direct, that the elections should be held at the north-west, south-west or north-east part of the state, the last day of March? How many electors would there attend the business?—And it is a little remarkable, that any gentleman should suppose, that Congress could possibly be in any measure as good judges of the time, place and manner of elections as the legislatures of the several respective states.

These as objections I could wish to see obviated:—And I could wish the publick inquiry might extend to a consideration, whether or no it would not be more conducive, to prevent a partial representation, to invest Congress with power to levy such a fine as they might think proper on states not choosing representatives, than by giving them this power of appointing time, manner and place. 4.4.7

It is objected by some, that Congress could not levy, or, at least, could not collect, such a fine of a delinquent state. If that is the case, Congress could not collect any tax they might think proper to levy, nor execute any order whatever; but at any time any state might break through the national compact, dissolve the federal constitution, and set the whole structure afloat on the ocean of chaos. 4.4.8

It is, therefore, proposed to the publick to consider, whether the said clause in the fourth section of the first article can answer the only purposes for which it is said to have been provided, or any other which will prove any advantage either to the nation or state.

Vox Populi.

Boston, Oct. 29.

II

A Card.

Mr. Vox Populi presents his most respectful compliments to mr. Examiner,[2] returns him thanks for the attention he has paid his piece on the Constitution—is obliged to him for the candour he has discovered on the occasion, but is under the disagreeable necessity of informing him, that he apprehends he has done nothing towards obviating the doubts and scruples with which his mind was agitated with regard to the proposed Constitution. 4.4.9

Mr. Examiner was wholly right when he asserts Vox Populi's objections to the Constitution were founded on jealousy and distrust; for all doubts, scruples or objections against any form of government whatever, MUST, in the nature of things, be founded in jealousy and distrust, and NOTHING else. 4.4.10

Mr. Examiner doubtless imagined, that the introducing the reprobated words, jealousy and distrust, would be fully sufficient to silence all Vox Populi's doubts, but he will be convinced to the contrary when he considers that jealousy and distrust are by no means so heinous things as some may imagine, for all governments in existence (however great blessings they are) originated entirely from jealousy and distrust, as did also all deeds, bonds, receipts, notes, etc. etc. etc.

And all Mr. Examiner has said on this subject, will apply with equal force against all the governments established in the world, and even against the jealous and distrustful practice of taking deeds, bonds, notes, etc.

4.4.11 Mr. Examiner proceeds rather to ridicule Vox Populi's scruples with regard to the proposed Constitution, by giving an instance where more danger lay, than in the article objected to by Vox Populi: but can he imagine that can be any reason why the constitution should be adopted?

4.4.12 Vox Populi had other objections against the Constitution, but he thought it was best to lay one before the publick at first and see how that would be obviated, and when he considers mr. Examiner's abilities as well as his inclination, he concludes it is not in his power (and consequently not in the power of any other) to do it.

4.4.13 Had Mr. Examiner obviated Vox Populi's objections against the aforesaid article, he would have proceeded to have asked Mr. Examiner's opinion with regard to the propriety or impropriety of nine states establishing a government on the ruins of the articles of confederation, which were made in Congress, and after nearly three years examination, were ratified and confirmed by every state; in which it is stipulated and agreed by each state with the whole, and by the whole with each state, that said articles of confederation "shall be inviolably observed by EVERY STATE; and the union shall be PERPETUAL, nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them, unless such alteration be agreed to in a CONGRESS of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislature of every state."[3] He would have asked Mr. Examiner, whether it is possible for any number of states less than the whole contracting number, to make any, the least alteration in said federal system, without being involved in the guilt of an open and avowed violation of a sacred federal constitution, a total want of publick faith and destitution of national honour? Whether a government founded expressly on the principles and idea of unanimity can be dissolved or materially altered by any number of the contracting parties short of the whole? And whether if any thing of that nature is carried into effect by any of the contracting parties, it can be considered in any other point of light than that of a revolt (not to say rebellion) against the national Constitution?

Monday morning.

4.4.14 N. B. Is it not possible that the proposed Constitution may be adopted as a system of federal government according to the proposals of the Convention and have only 706,359 people in favour of it, and 2,346,340 people against it, or in that proportion?

Mr. Allen,

In your paper of this day, I find a piece signed Examiner, in which the writer makes a number of remarks on a Card which I did myself the honour to hand him, through the medium of your paper, of last Tuesday.[4] 4.4.15

How far his observations fall short of obviating the difficulties proposed in Card, is cheerfully submitted to the good sense of your readers, rather than undertake to be judge in that matter myself; but he will doubtless excuse me in making a few observations on his production, and lay them before the candid publick.

He is pleased to call government's originating from jealousy and distrust*, "A NEW IDEA;" but I shall challenge mr. Examiner to point out any other principle which could induce a rational person to make himself subject to civil government. If I was not jealous that some person would injure me in some way, what could I have to induce me to give up my natural liberty, and part with part of my natural rights? If I did not distrust the rectitude of my fellow-creatures' future conduct towards me, what advantage could I ever expect to reap from a system of jurisprudence? Are not all the advantages which a person can expect to derive from entering into a state of civil government (or at least all he ought to expect) of a negative nature? Are they not all comprehended in this one general idea, a prevention of injuries from others?—I think it is perfectly consistent with the most finished diffidence to answer in the affirmative. If that is the case, what kind of necessity, or even propriety, could there be in any person's making himself a subject of a civil government if he was not jealous somebody would injure him? 4.4.16

I next find him informing the world that I assert, "that no alteration can be made in the national government without the consent of all the states, because the confederation forbids it." Out of regard to the gentleman's nerves I shall forbear asking the Examiner to quote the passage, and shall content myself with proposing for his consideration this simple question—Is there no specifick difference between a quere and an assertion? 4.4.17

Mr. Examiner then proceeds to evince the contrary, and his argument therefor is full as new as my idea of the origination of government was.[5] It is needless to inform the publick, that, because the continental constitution has in some instances not been adhered to, therefore it ceases to be a crime to violate it—and implicitly charges all such as do not agree with him in this logical conclusion, with a destitution of common sense. If it would not be 4.4.18

*I make use of the word from, as that was the word in the Card, though mr. Examiner has thought proper to barter it away for the word in.—Perhaps he thought they were synonimous.

disagreeable to the Examiner's feelings I would just mention, that this ratiocination of his, puts me in mind of a certain clergyman who in company (by way of joke) asked an Indian woman, who was present bottoming chairs—"How many commandments are there?" "NINE," answered the old squaw. "Not but nine!" said the minister. "No, (rejoined the old native) there was ten, but you and me broke one to pieces 'tother night, you know, so there is but nine left."

4.4.19 In order to set this matter in a just point of light, I will bring an instance, which will forcibly apply in this case. There is in this commonwealth a statute law against murder—Suppose that A. should, with malice propense, kill B.—is taken up for the crime—is committed to prison—is indicted by the grand inquest—is brought to the bar—the jury impanelled—the indictment is read—the attorney-general arranges the evidence, which is plene proof—opens the matter to the jury—adduces the law—and sits down—The counsel for the prisoner arises—"May it please your honours, and you, gentlemen of the jury—I am for the prisoner at the bar, etc.—the fact of killing I do not deny, neither do I wish to conceal that it was done with malice propense, but my ground of defence is very different—the law on which the indictment is founded, is obsolete, null and void; for it has been violated and broken more than one hundred times since it was enacted, and there remains no force or validity in it." The figure which such a pleader would make at the bar, mr. Examiner, de facto, makes on the political and logical theatre!

4.4.20 By the time mr. Examiner had got thro' the whole concatination of his stupendous reasoning, his mental powers, by some means, forgot to execute their proper functions, so far as totally to mistake, not only my ideas, but my words, also; for he tells the publick, that my "last objection, that a small majority may choose the Congress," etc. whereas there was not a syllable about choosing Congress in the whole card; 'tis true I proposed this quere to his consideration. "Is it not possible that the proposed constitution may be adopted as a system of federal government, according to the proposals of the convention, and have only 706,359 people in favour of it, and 2,346,340 against it, or in that proportion? and I will now add, and have every person's voice in the United States taken upon the matter?" I proposed this question to set in a proper point of view the mode proposed by the convention for the acceptance of the constitution. I believe it is a maxim in politicks which will ever hold good, that no form of government ever ought to be accepted, unless a major part of the governed are in favour of it; and it is certain that no republican government ever can be established on any other principle; but according to the proposed plan, this federal system may be adopted by nine states, and the remaining four be unanimous against it; and at the same time these four dissenting states may be a considerable majority of the United States; and at the same time it is also possible that half the people in the approbating states, save nine, may be against it, which will leave a majority of about 22 against seven, disapprobating the constitution; and yet (amazing) the constitution be established as a plan of federal government! Is this consonant to the most remote principle of a republican government?

While I am thus intruding on the indulgent patience of the publick, I beg they would forgive me in suggesting one thing to their minds, which I apprehend is closely connected with their welfare; I dare say they will indulge me. 4.4.21

In the course of the late war, this commonwealth has involved itself deeply in a state debt, the discharging of which is inseparably joined with every, the smallest degree of the publick faith and honour—and we find, by woful experience, that an expectation of discharging it with the proceeds of a dry tax on polls and estates, is a baseless fabrick; and our only hope of ever discharging it, must be founded on a new system of taxation, viz. a suitable impost and excise, as well on imports as other superfluities and luxurious articles: Is it not then expedient for the citizens of this state to pause a moment, and ask themselves the important question, does policy dictate that we should curtail ourselves of the right of taxing ourselves in the mode appearing most proper?—Must we be confined to a dry tax on polls and estates, when there is many of us now taxed beyond our present power to pay? When it is no strange sight to see a person taxed more than his whole estate is worth? Must we give up the right of taxing ourselves except in a certain mode which has already sunk the landed interest, the last resort of our wealth, forty per cent. and which if persisted in will soon sink it ninety if not ninety-nine per cent.? I think every idea of policy, every principle of common sense, forbids a measure so pregnant with political perdition! I appeal to the good sense of all rational intelligences, whether or not that an individual, who conducted his private concerns upon as uneconomical a system as this, would not be put under guardianship as insane. Heavens! will the good sense of the eagle-eyed citizens of Massachusetts ever permit them to divest themselves of the power of adopting their own mode of taxation! Will it ever permit them to be nearly confined to a certain mode which their own woful experience in accents not less majestick than thunder, tells them is altogether impossible to be carried into effect, without bringing inevitable destruction and the most consumate distress on a great part—yea the greater part of the community?

Vox Populi.

(The remainder next Friday.)

I could wish to stop here, and proceed no further, but I must renew my address to the publick's indulgence for liberty to make another address to my fellow-citizens, which is for them to consider, how it comports with 4.4.22 policy for them to establish a system of government entirely disconnected with a bill of rights?

I long sought for the reason why a bill of rights was omitted; at last I had the two following reasons assigned viz. first, as the powers proposed to be vested in Congress were definite no bill of rights was necessary, for they could exercise no power but what is expressly given them by the constitution. The other reason is, because each state has a bill of rights of its own, a federal bill of rights must be wholly useless.[6]

4.4.23 With regard to the first, it will apply with equal force to any constitution of government extant; we will take our own state's for instance, where we shall find the powers vested in the General Court are as definite as those proposed to be vested in Congress; yet, when the constitution was formed, it was deemed absolutely necessary that the people should be protected by an explicit unequivocal bill of rights, and the publick are desired to consider whether that was a piece of ill-judged policy or not; and if it was not, whether the nature of things has so changed since as to render it needless.

4.4.24 The second reason given why it was omitted, I think cannot have much greater force than the former; we may as well say, that because each state has a constitution of its own, that a continental constitution was unnecessary, as to say that because we have a state bill of rights a continental one is unnecessary. But let us consider what is our bill of rights, and what was its original design. If we consider its nature, we shall find it was constructed as a barricado to prevent our own General Court from infringing on certain rights which the people did not mean should be at the disposal of the legislature, and is simply a rule of conduct for our legislature. But what will Congress have to do with our bill of rights, any more than they will with the rest of our constitution? Will any person suppose that the other parts of our constitution will be any rule of their conduct? I should imagine if they do, it will curtail some part of the powers which it is meant, by the proposed constitution, they should exercise.

4.4.25 The virtuous and enlightened citizens are requested to pay that attention to this matter which the importance of its nature demands, and act thereon the part which to them shall appear becoming free men, who have hazarded their lives and fortunes to establish a government founded on the principles of genuine civil liberty and undefiled republicanism.

4.4.26 I cannot persuade myself to put an end to this piece without suggesting one thing more to my fellow-citizens—which is this, That whereas the proposed constitution, if it is adopted, will make material inroads in the present established constitution of this commonwealth, and rip up, and turn topsy-turvy, a considerable number of its constituent parts, it is highly deserving their consideration, whether such alterations can possibly, in the nature of things, be made in our constitution, in the method now proposed. In order to assist the good people in this consideration, let the following things be carefully attended to.

The constitution of the commonwealth of Massachusetts was founded on 4.4.27 the idea of two thirds of the inhabitants approving of the same, and accepting it as a system of government; and if any number short of two thirds accepted it, it was to be null and void. Accordingly, it was laid before the several towns for the people's approbation or rejectment; and the number of votes, pro and con. from the several respective towns, were taken and returned to the convention, who were appointed to do that business; and on a strict examination it was found to be ratified, accepted and recognized by two thirds of the people in the state, in all its parts, as a constitution and frame of government for this commonwealth, and was accordingly declared to be such.—And can it possibly be a serious question in the mind of any man, whether any body of men, whatever can legally or constitutionally dissolve said constitution, or any part thereof, except it is done with the same solemnity, and with as high a power, as it was made by? or, in other words, whether any number of our citizens, less than two thirds, can, consistent with any system of constitutional principles, dissolve or alter the same, or any part thereof? I must imagine that such a question exists in the mind of no rational man; for it is a maxim founded in the nature of things, that a thing cannot be unmade but by that same power that created it; and 'tis also an axiom in all systems of jurisprudence, that no obligation, deed, agreement, contract or engagement, can be dissolved or altered but by an instrument of as high a nature as that which constitutes it; and no act, ordinance or decree, can be reversed but by the same authority that enacted, made or determined it. And we may add to these universally uncontroverted principles of civil policy, the express provision made in our constitution for its revision, where expressly the consent of two thirds is made necessary to such an event.[7]

Let us examine for one moment, whether the proposed plan of amend- 4.4.28
ment (for such in the present instance it is proper to call it) involves in its nature any thing which is correspondent with the aforesaid principles of civil policy. This commonwealth contains about 340 towns, each town will undoubtedly send a delegate to the convention, who will there act the sentiments of a major part of his constituents, and the majority of the convention will decide on the matter, and their decision may be only a bare majority of a bare majority: so that the proposed constitution, essentially altering our state constitution, may be established in this state by a minority of five against a majority of fourteen, which has every feature of that worst of all governments, ARISTOCRACY.

Paying an impartial attention to the foregoing observations, I freely sub- 4.4.29
mit it to the candid publick, whether a ratification of the proposed federal constitution is not wholly incompatible with that allegiance which is due from each of our citizens to the commonwealth and the constitution thereof; more especially I would recommend it to the serious consideration of all in office under government, as well as all who have been since the inauguration of our present constitution, how they can reconcile their approbating the proposed constitution, with that SOLEMN and UNEQUIVOCAL DECLARATION and OATH, which they, in the presence of God, made at their entering into office, and which is registered in Heaven, and still binding on them!

4.4.30 Let the publick reflect but a moment on the immense expense of treasure, toil, fatigue, hardship and danger, as well as blood, with which we last winter defended our invaluable constitution, and consider whether they will now reduce it to a mere skeleton! Let them further consider, that provided the alterations are made in our state constitution, which must be made in it if the proposed federal one is adopted, and if this is done only by a bare majority of a bare majority, I say let them consider in what respect such a revolution would differ from the bold and unprovoked one which was attempted to be made last winter!

4.4.31 But perhaps it may be asked, "if the proposals of the convention are so pregnant with mischief, how came the General Court to lay them before the publick?" I answer, the General Court acted merely officially in laying them before their constituents, according to the direction of Congress, the supreme council of the nation; and had the General Court withheld them from the community (whose servants they are) it would have been chargeable with arogating to itself the power of deciding on a question which only fell within the province of the people at large to determine upon, so that the General Court acted with the greatest propriety as well as constitutionality on the matter.

Vox Populi.

Nov. 9, 1787.

To the People of Massachusetts,

Fellow-Citizens,

4.4.32 At this all important crisis you should allow no object however great to divert your attention from the proposed system of federal government: now is its day of probation, but that day will soon expire, and you should work the work of the day while it is yet day, before the night cometh wherein no man can work; if you like the foolish virgins sleep till the midnight cry is heard, your applications after that will all prove fruitless.

4.4.33 The adoption of the proposed constitution ought not to be considered as a matter of indifference, that event will undoubtedly be very advantageous or injurious, and it is yours at present to investigate the matter fully, and determine on the matter according to the best judgment you are able to form on such an investigation; if you accept it you ought to be fully convinced it is for the best; if you reject you should do it from a conviction that it is not adapted to promote the publick good.

I have formerly invited your attention to the consideration of some of its parts, as well as some of the consequences which I conceived would result from its adoption; I now wish you to attend to the sixth article thereof, where you will find it is provided, That the federal constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding.—And the members of the several state legislatures and all judicial and executive officers, both of the United States and of the several states shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this constitution. 4.4.34

Here you have the arcana of federal blessings laid open before you. A part of the supreme law is to be such as may be diametrically opposed to the sentiments of every citizen of this state as well as the sentiments of your representatives and senators in the federal legislature, some of which may be made only by the president and two thirds of a quorum of the senate. 4.4.35

But is here not a difficulty involved in this matter which is rather hard of removal? Every officer[8] legislative, judicial or executive must be bound by oath or affirmation to support this constitution, and every such officer has taken or must take a solemn oath that he does ["]truly and sincerely acknowledge, profess, testify and declare that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is, and of right ought to be, a free sovereign and independent state.—and that he will bear true faith and allegiance to the said Commonwealth, and that he will defend the same against traiterous conspiracies and all hostile attempts whatsoever: and that no foreign prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate, hath or ought to have any jurisdiction, superiority, pre-eminence, dispensing authority or other power in any matter civil, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this Commonwealth; except the authority and power which is or may be vested by their constituents in the Congress of the United States: and that no man, or body of men hath or can have any right to absolve or discharge him from the obligation of this oath, etc. and that he doth make this acknowledgment, etc. heartily and truly according to the common meaning and acceptation of the foregoing words, without any equivocation, mental evasion or secret reservation whatsoever."[9] 4.4.36

How any honest man can take this oath almost every word of which is emphatical and the same hour perhaps take the other I must confess to me is truly paradoxical: In the first of which he swears that this Commonwealth is, and of right ought to be, a free, sovereign and independent state, and that he will bear true faith and allegiance to it, and that no man or body of men can absolve him from that obligation. In the other he swears he will support a constitution which (it appears to me) takes away every idea of sovereignty which is worth retaining. How these things can be reconciled is wholly beyond my conception. 4.4.37

4.4.38 Will any one pretend to say these two oaths are compatible, because there is an exception in the state oath of such power and authority as is or may be by their constituents vested in the Congress of the United States, which exception contains every thing comprehended in the proposed constitution which the last oath binds them to support? Is it possible that any person can advance any thing like this? I cannot suppose any rational person can, for these two reasons, first the epithet "the Congress of the United States," at the fabricating said oath, etc. was a definite phrase, its construction and organization were universally understood, and was known to be a body of men annually chosen, and recallable at pleasure, consisting of one branch only, and was a thing essentially different from the complex body which is to go under the name in the new proposed constitution, and we should do well to bear in mind that the oath concludes, "And I do make this declaration, etc. according to the common meaning and acceptation of the foregoing words, etc.["] and I can see no help that can be obtained in this case from that proviso. But, secondly, if this matter was entirely got over, there would remain one which at least has the appearance of being insurmountable, for admitting the word Congress in the said oath to mean any thing and every thing which is called by that name, even then that exception could not be applied to any thing but a Congress, yet in the proposed constitution there is provision made for the exercise of power and authority within and concerning this commonwealth, and to which we are subject by an authority different from the Congress of the United States.

4.4.39 According to the proposed constitution, treaties are to be made by the president, with the advise of two thirds of the senate present, if there is present a quorum. The president and senate are to appoint the judges, etc. The president, in person, is a potentate, holding free and exclusive power to pardon. Viewing him in military point of light, we are all personally to be under his immediate command, and at his disposal, etc. etc. etc. All this, and more, is proposed, in the new constitution, to be authorities to which we and our state-rulers are to be subject, which is distinct from Congress; for the president, or the president and senate, cannot be Congress: for it is expressly declared and defined in the proposed constitution, that Congress shall consist of a senate and a house of representatives, and I cannot conceive of any other way to get clear of the difficulty, at present.

4.4.40 Paying suitable attention to these things, I leave it cheerfully with every person to judge, if any man can take and subscribe the two oaths, aforesaid, without being guilty of the most unequivocal perjury.[10]

If after a mature investigation of the subject, that should appear to be the case, it is left to the reflection of every one to picture in his own mind the eligibility of our circumstances, when the proposed constitution is adopted; and consider the precarious tenure by which they will all hold their lives, liberties and properties, if it is impossible for any person to be in any state office over them, but such as are divested of the principles of honesty, and have reached the ne plus ultra of wickedness—Perjury.

These things, my fellow-citizens, are proposed for your consideration, and yours must be the consequence of the determination you make on the subject.

Vox Populi.

Boston, November 19.

1. This is probably not a quotation but a paraphrase of what Vox Populi considers to have been a typical Federalist argument. I have seen no Federalist claim that such state delinquency was probable, but many Federalists did argue that the possibility was properly guarded against in the Constitution. For major Federalist discussions of the regulation of elections for the Congress, see The Federalist nos. 59–61; Ford, Essays 30–31 (Cassius), 153 (The Landholder); Ford, Pamphlets 151–52 (An American Citizen), 227 (Aristides); McMaster and Stone 266 (Wilson), 272–73 (McKean). One Federalist, Noah Webster, writing as A Citizen of America, expressed disapproval of the power of Congress to alter state regulations of elections; Ford, Pamphlets 44. "This section cannot be too often repeated," said Centinel, and the Anti-Federalists endlessly criticized it. Examiner replied: "A short, and I think, conclusive answer to all objections of this kind, is, that it is an established principle in all free governments, that a majority of the people have at all times a right to alter the laws or the constitution, when the welfare of the peoples shall require a change. This right should be exercised at all times with great wisdom, but if it should not, the right still remains." Massachusetts Gazette 20 November 1787.

William Symmes

Letter to Capt. Peter Osgood, Jr.
15 November 1787

and

Speech in Massachusetts Convention
22 January 1788

Although the letter from William Symmes to Captain Peter Osgood, Jr., printed below was not, as his memorialist claims, "probably the earliest review made of the entire instrument,"[1] it is an early discussion of the Constitution, apparently uninfluenced by other men's opinion of the document. Symmes objects to the apportionment of direct taxes, which will encourage Southern luxury at the expense of the industry and economy of the North (4.5.2[1]). He objects to the discretion left to Congress in the exercise of virtually unlimited powers and to the extent of the judicial power. (4.5.2 [3–9, 12–13]). His comments on the presidency are especially keen, soberly anticipating the arguments for presidential prerogative to be made by Presidents Jackson and Lincoln (4.5.2 [10–11]). He supposes that most of the opposition will focus on the provision prohibiting states from emitting bills of credit and making tender laws, but he favors this prohibition, wishing only that it had been postponed (4.5.2 [8]). On the federal question Symmes is intriguingly ambiguous. He adds to the Anti-Federalist argument the telling points that the prohibition of interstate agreements without the consent of Congress and the guarantee of a republican form of government are inconsistent with a true federation of states (4.5.2 [9, 14]). At the same time, he objects to the provision for giving the states equal representation in the Senate (4.5.2[2]).

In his speech two months later in the Massachusetts Convention,[2] Symmes is concerned primarily with the unlimited taxing power of Congress. His arguments are noteworthy in the extent to which they attempt to meet the kind of defense of extensive national powers put forward, for example, by Publius in The Federalist. He reads the lesson of faction back at the Federalists (4.5.12); he explains the effects of time and precedent in extending and consolidating congressional powers (4.5.14); he exposes the weakness of the supposed restraints (4.5.15–19); and he argues the positive good of poverty, public and private (4.5.20).

Symmes was one of the delegates who was persuaded to support the Constitution in the compromise involving recommendatory amendments, and he explained his vote in a speech (not reprinted here) on 6 February 1788.[3]

1. The letter is taken from Historical Collections of the Essex Institute IV, no. 5 (October 1862) 211–17; the remark quoted was made by N. W. Hazen, "A Memorial Discourse on William Symmes, Esq.," delivered at Andover and North Andover in the winter of 1859–60, ibid. 198. This memorial is worth some attention on its own account as an example of thoughtful patriotic history and should be compared with the references in Impartial Examiner 5.14.22 n. 15.

2. Debates, Resolutions, and other Proceedings of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, Convened at Boston, on the 9th of January, 1788, and continued until the 7th of February following, for the purpose of assenting to and ratifying the Constitution recommended by the Grand Federal Convention (Boston 1788) 97–103. The speech can also be found in the reprinting of these debates in Elliot II, 70–75 and in Debates and Proceedings in the Convention of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, held in the Year 1788, and which Finally Ratified the Constitution of the United States (Boston 1856) 169–75.

3. Elliot II, 172–74; Debates and Proceedings (1856) 277–78; Debates, Resolutions, and other Proceedings (1788) 207–8. Hazen probably exaggerates when he suggests that Symmes' shift may have been sufficient to determine the outcome in Massachusetts and, therefore, in the country as a whole. Letter to Capt. Peter Osgood, Jr.

Andover, Nov. 15, 1787.

Dear Sir:

According to my promise, I sit down to sketch out my reasons for objecting against ye Federal Constitution. The essay will doubtless be imperfect, but I design it for your perusal only, and I can safely rely on your goodness for all necessary allowances. 4.5.1

I will consider the objectionable passages in course as they occur in the system, as well for your convenience as my own.

1st. The apportionment of taxes. 4.5.2

It appears to me that this will operate unequally against the Northern States. Let us suppose that two-fifths of the slaves in the five Southern States amount to at least 150,000 persons. What reason can be given, why, if taxes must be proportioned by population only, these should be rejected? That the profits of their labor are nothing? I deny the fact, for I believe that every negro that cultivates the valuable staples, Tobacco, Wheat, Rice, Indigo, he raises a greater profit to his master than any white can raise from his labor here. What then? That the Southern Nabob squanders it all in luxuries, so that the States are made, if anything, poorer? Very good; The Convention, then, have patronised luxury, and taxed industry and economy. But three-fifths include all the working slaves. Neither will this answer: for the Northern States are taxed as much for one infant, or a decrepid old man, as for a vigorous youth.

How, then, shall we be taxed? I say, not in proportion to actual wealth at present, but in proportion to a state's advantage for acquiring wealth. The soil and climate of Virginia are better than those of this state. The staples of Virginia are in high demand. Its rivers, the finest in the world. How rich might Virginia be? But Virginia is not rich. What then? Shall a man need no better excuse from taxes than Idleness? He will hardly pay his private debts so easily.

Taxes must certainly grow out of the ground. What, then, is there, more evident than that the best land and the best produce (supposing the advantage of commerce to be equal) should pay, (or, if you please, produce,) the most? And are not our long winters, in which we consume the labors of the summer, to be considered? No, but, yes, I beg pardon,—they are considered; We pay the more.

But 2. The Senate.

To what purpose is it that we have an equal representation in the House, if we are represented by States in the Senate? This is a great grievance in the present Congress. That little Delaware should weigh as much in all political debates as this State, is, in a government merely popular, quite ridiculous. Whose voice are we supposed to have in all public transactions? We accurate Republicans say, the voice of the people. Who are the people? We answer, the majority. But a majority of States may choose a President, &c. This is a close adherence to principles. "Two Senators from each State, and each Senator to have a vote." The present Congress mended and made worse! for now seven states are completed, when before it required the sanction of nine. But we shall have a proper House,—all will be right there. True! and that may be a good reason why we should not have a proper Senate. But I cannot see the force of it. Why any state should have more weight in one body than the other, let the Convention say. And yet poor Rhode Island was not there to speak for herself. I may speak of the duration of office in another place.

3. "Congress may make and alter the times, places and manner of holding elections, except the place of choosing Senators."

This is is a very complaisant exception indeed. The legislatures may sit where they please. It means this, if it means anything. And we are doubtless much obliged to the Convention for this decent privilege. But I presume the time of choosing Senators must be in the winter, for it will be too hot for a session in the summer at the Southward. And the place of choosing representatives may possibly be the county-town, or some place yet more remote. This would be very convenient. But the word Manner. Oh, it is an excellent word. It would not have been half so well, to have tied the hands of the future Congress, by saying all elections shall be made by ticket, or as the several states shall please. No, the States are to be made sensible, how much this Congress is above them in all wisdom, even to the knowledge of a particular acre of ground. Nay, the Convention itself seems dazzled by the prospect of this wisdom, for they dared not prescribe it any rules. Now that the future Congress may be as wise as this Convention, I have no great reason to doubt, from anything that's past. But they will certainly have a great deal more power, and we shall shortly hear no more of recommendations. That they should make use of their power, to enlarge the privileges of the people, let any expect that will. Well, then, if they do not enlarge them, why make provision for altering them? That they may take them away? Oh, no, never suspect such a thing. What, then, shall we think of it? That the Convention were fools? Hardly. I see no way but to recur to the great wisdom of this future Congress. It will be a wise Congress: a very wise Congress. Here now is a way to get rid of every doubt. But why need the Convention to care how the members are chosen, if they are but sent? Oh, Sir, it will be a very wise Congress. Just as good an answer as that of the clown in "All's well that ends well," which was, to everything, "Oh, Lord, Sir!"

4. "The Houses to keep a journal, and to publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secresy." Good again. A very wise Congress! The idea used to be, except private articles in foreign treaties, secret expeditions, &c. But this Constitution excels in the Laconic mode of speech, or rather perhaps the Convention were lazy, and could not conveniently go about to particularize either the rights of the people or the just prerogative of Congress. Who can complain, after this, that he knows nothing of public affairs, except the expenditure of the public money? If Congress, the convention say, [judge] it is best the people should not know, and indeed, if Congress are invested with all power, general knowledge might be inconvenient, as it would only produce discontents, and these might end in rebellion.

When the dark places in these journals are inspected by some young politician of future ages, who perchance may succeed his father in the National Council, what lessons may he not learn? There may he observe by what steps the form of government is imperceptibly changed: There by what process the genius of a free people is altered. But I say no more.

5. "Congress shall have power," &c., first clause.

"To lay," pretty well, when you read what and for what,—"taxes, imports, duties and excises," very well, and for what ends? "to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States.["]

A more general dedition or surrender of all ye property in the United States to Congress could not perhaps have been framed.[1] Gentlemen, it is all, all yours, to spend as you please, provided we may know how you spend it; and even then you may sink as many thousands as you please under the heads of incidental charges, secret services, &c. Take it all. I will paraphrase the whole of this passage in a short address from the States to Congress:

Gentlemen, Having chosen you to govern us, and believing that through all ages you will be a disinterested body, and will always spend money, if you can get it, with rigid economy, we give you full power to tax us.—And lest we should some of us prove refractory in the matter of payment, from some mistaken notion that you demand it too fast, we also give you full power to collect the taxes you lay, in the way most agreeable to yourselves; and we will pay all your collectors, deputies, and so forth, as you shall direct. And as you have power to contract debts for us to pay, you shall have all the money you want to pay them, and you shall have all you want to build forts, magazines, and arsenals; buy arms and ammunition; make war and peace, &c., and in short whatever you shall think will be in any degree for our good, you shall have money to do, and we will never trouble you with any enquiries into the motives of your conduct, always relying on your wisdom, with the most implicit confidence, and submitting our estates entirely to your disposal.

A very handsome donation! and when compared with the clause that throws all imposts and excises into the Continental treasury, produces a query how each state shall support its own government. By a dry tax, and one perhaps which cannot be collected, because the Federal Collectors must have the preference. So we must expect to be rid of State government as an expensive and useless thing; and then perhaps Congress will help us to a Federal Intendant, to save us the trouble of governing ourselves. But this may be more than my text will justify.

6. "To raise and support armies," &c.

That the Federal Head should have power to raise an army for some purposes, is perhaps quite necessary. Whether it is or not, the present Congress have such power. But here appears to be a fault, by no means singular, in this constitution, viz., the want of limitation. All is left to the discretion of Congress, and there is no bar against a standing army in time of peace. For though no appropriation of money to this use may be for a longer term than two years, yet this is long enough when the same appropriation may be continued for two years to the end of time. And we are to expect that this Congress will soon have such a system of policy as will bind their successors, either by the force of its obvious expediency, or by the danger of innovation, to persist in the same plan.

7. To exercise exclusive jurisdiction, &c.

I do not see so much of the terrible in this as some do, especially if the rest is granted. Congress will be secure from little mobs, and so it ought to be. It will be delivered from the persecution of the State in which it resides, and so it ought to be. It may build accommodations for a court, which will be, as it ought to be, the property of the United States. And that a body so powerful ought to be handsomely lodged, I believe every foreigner will imagine. But how this clause came into the constitution I know not. I believe any state might grant what is here demanded, if the whole, to Congress, or any body corporate by consent of Congress.

8. "No state shall emit bills of credit, or make tender laws."

Here I suppose the principal weight of opposition will hang. The point itself is of consequence, but it will receive more from the prejudices of men in our present embarrassed situation. You know my sentiments are directly opposed to paper money, as they would be in almost every case in which we could want it. But the query is, whether every state shall be in a worse situation than any individual, who, if he has not the cash in hand, may give his promissory note? I think it ought not to be, unless the United States will promise to lend us money whenever we want it. But I should agree to this, that no bills of credit shall ever be a tender. This requisition would be not only just, but comformable to my notions of sound policy.

As to other tender laws, they are, in fact, but poor expedients, and such as a state may possibly need. It is really better to have some kind of tender law, than to be thrown into confusion. And a State is so much a better judge of its own circumstances, that I had rather see this regulation in the State than in the Federal constitution. Yet, unless it were in all, some States might impose upon others, and so justice would not be equally and universally done. I wish that the abolition of these abuses might be deferred, until we are in a more prosperous situation. I had rather that Congress should have power to say hereafter, when they shall cease, than that they should have leave immediately upon the adoption of any new system.

I omit the next sentence, because I don't at present understand what effect it will have on the private debt of each particular State.

9. "No State shall, without the consent of Congress, "enter into any compact or agreement with any other State."

If I understand this, it is a curious passage. What, may we not even agree together? If there be a suit in the Federal Court between two States, may they not, like private parties, agree? Or in a hundred other cases, of no Federal concern, may they not treat and settle their disputes? I must have mistaken these wise men. It cannot be so. To accuse the convention of folly would be gross. I dare say, that most of them had rather be accused of design.

10. The President may, with the advice of two-thirds of the Senate, who are present, make treaties, and with consent of the Senate, appoint embassadors," &c.

The Senate. Who are the Senate? Look back and you will see that a majority is a quorum. This is fourteen, and two-thirds of fourteen are ten. The President and the Senators may make treaties; and the President and Senate by the same rule, i.e., eight Senators may appoint ambassadors, ministers, consuls, judges, and almost everybody else.

Where in God's name did they get this? From reason or from history? I fear, not from the former; and as to the latter, it has not come within my reading in any constitution where a republican form is guarantied. Are we then a commonwealth, and shall we have no voice in treaties? but our own President, or elected King? In four years' time (with good hope of another election,) cannot he pack a sufficient force to enable him to gratify his favorites, or sell his country? If this be not a servile adherence to the pattern of the King's privy Council of Great Britain, I confess I know not what is. Congress may declare war, indeed, but the President may make peace upon what terms he shall think proper. Is a peace of less consequence to a nation than war? Or is it ye more safe that this power should be given to one man? What is the privilege of declaring war compared with the power of making all kinds of treaties? If he make a bad treaty, what then? Why, he may be impeached, if anybody dares impeach him, before the very Senate that advised the measure. And if convicted, what? He shall be removed from his office, and perhaps disqualified to hold any other. And after this he may chance to lose his head by a trial at law, if the Judges, whom he has appointed, will bid the jury to convict him. And so, with a great deal of difficulty, for some (perhaps) irreparable detriment, we get the offender's head. Is there no better way than this? But I must not dwell longer.

That there must be an Executive power, independent of the legislature, appears to have been generally agreed among the fabricators of modern constitutions. But I believe it has not until now been supposed essential that this power should be vested in a single person. The execution of the law requires as much prudence as any other department, and the pardoning or refusing to pardon offences, is a very delicate matter. Yet he has no council or assistant, no restraint.

But was ever a commission so brief, so general, as this of our President? Can we exactly say how far a faithful execution of the laws may extend? or what may be called or comprehended in a faithful execution? If the President be guilty of a misdemeanor, will he not take care to have this excuse? And should it turn against him, may he not plead a mistake! or is he bound to understand the laws, or their operation? Should a Federal law happen to be as generally expressed as the President's authority; must he not interpret the Act! For in many cases he must execute the laws independent of any judicial decision. And should the legislature direct the mode of executing the laws, or any particular law, is he obliged to comply, if he does not think it will amount to a faithful execution? For to suppose that the legislature can make laws to affect the office of President, is to destroy his independence, and in this case to supersede the very constitution. Is there no instance in which he may reject the sense of the legislature, and establish his own, and so far, would he not be to all intents and purposes absolute?

12. "The Judicial Power, &c., shall extend to all cases between citizens of different States."

This seems a hardship on account of the appeal, which will carry men 600 miles, and cause them more expense than the matter in dispute may be worth. There is no reason why citizens of different States should not have as good a remedy against each other, as citizens of the same State, nor why a debtor in one state should have more cost than a debtor in the other. And supposing, that, to avoid cost, the appeal in this case should be taken away, (though by his constitution it cannot.) Yet this would be very unequal. I think this part of the judicial power not only grievous, but quite unnecessary; for disputes between inhabitants of different States have been hitherto very well determined in one of the States. And now all remedy for small dues is taken away in effect, for though judgment be obtained in the Superior Court, the debtor by appealing may discourage the creditor from any further pursuit.

13. "The Supreme Court shall have an appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, except," &c.

Except what? Here they are at it again! "with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make." A very wise Congress! This Convention have really saved themselves a great deal of labor by this presumption. I confess upon the principle, that there cannot be a fair trial before judges chosen by the State in which one of the parties resides, juries must also be excluded. But I deny the principle as too great a refinement. A Federal jury in the Supreme Court, but especially one from the vicinity, would be a chimera, if the court be stationary. But that the same men should be judges of the law and the fact, is against reason, and not congenial to a free government. Congress may make as many exceptions as they please. But to talk of regulating men's judgment of facts, would be to talk nonsense.

14. "The United States shall guarrantee to every State a Republican form of government."

Republics are either aristocratical or democratical: and the United States guarranty one of these forms to every State. But I disapprove of any guarranty in the matter. For though it is improbable, that any State will choose to alter the form of its government; yet it ought to be the privelege of every State to do as it will in this affair. If this regulation be admitted, it will be difficult to effect any important changes in State government. For the other States will have nearly as much to do with our government as we ourselves. And what Congress may see in our present constitution, or any future amendments, not strictly republican in their opinions, who can tell? Besides it is of no importance to any State how the government of any other State is administered, whether by a single magistrate or two, or by a king.

I therefore presume, that, as this clause meddles too much with the independence of the several States, so also it answers no valuable end to any or to the whole.

4.5.3 With regard to the Constitution taken into one view: It is a complete system of Federal government, every part of which is full of energy, and if it be established, I think it can never fail of being obeyed by the people; and no combination can ever be sufficiently extensive or secret to subvert it. There is some ambiguity in several important parts of it, which arises principally from the too general terms in which it is expressed. Too much is left perhaps for the future Congress to supply, which when supplied will be no part of the constitution. The States are strictly confined to their own business, and even these are not a little circumscribed. And the powers of all the Federal departments are very ample and adequate to their ends. In short, the system would make us formidable abroad, and keep us very peaceable at home, and, with some amendments, might do very well for us, if we would be contented to become citizens of America, and confuse the thirteen stripes, and change the stars into one glorious sun.[2]

Let us pause.

4.5.4 It is not in a few light strictures,—it is not, perhaps, in the most acute and methodical essay that the merits of this unexpected, this wonderful system, can be strictly defined. Reading cannot be applied, and experience is out of the question. Thus how much we may easily perceive, it is a great, almost a total, and probably a final change, with regard to every State. "To be, or not to be, that is the question." So great a revolution was never before proposed to a people for their consent. In a time of profound peace, that a matter of such infinite concern should be submitted to general debate throughout such an empire as this, is a phenomenon entirely new. Let us make a due return to that Providence by which we enjoy the privelege, by using it, like a wise, prudent and free people. Let us equally shun a hasty acceptance or a precipitate rejection of this all-important scheme. And if our final decision be the effect of true wisdom, let us never doubt but the end will be happy.

4.5.5 To close:

You must easily see, Sir, that what I have written is but a light sweep on the surface of things. Many things in the Constitution worthy of remark, I have wholly omitted; those I have mentioned, I have slightly criticised, and what is not in the Constitution that ought to be there, I have not attempted to say. I found you had prescribed me a task which few men, perhaps, can adequately perform, and that I had not by any means qualified myself to do it. But if this trifling attention to your wishes should prove a gratification, I shall be satisfied in that respect.

I am, Dear Sir,
Your Friend
& most ob't Serv't, W. Symmes.

Capt. Peter Osgood, Jr.

Mr. President, in such an assembly as this and on a subject, that puzzles the oldest politicians, a young man, sir, will scarcely dare to think for himself; but if he venture to speak, the effort must certainly be greater. This Convention is the first representative body in which I have been honoured with a seat, and men will not wonder that a scene at once so new, and so august, should confuse, oppress, and almost disqualify me to proceed. 4.5.6

Sir, I wish to bespeak the candour of the Convention—that candour which I know, I need but ask to have it extended to me, while I make a few indigested observations on the paragraph now in debate. I have hitherto attended with diligence but no great anxiety, to the reasoning of the ablest partizans on both sides of the question. Indeed, I could have wished for a more effectual, and (if I may term it so) a more feeling representation in the lower house, and for a representation of the people in the senate—I have been and still am desirous of a rotation in office, to prevent the final perpetuation of power in the same men.—And I have not been able clearly to see why the place and manner of holding elections should be in the disposal of Congress. 4.5.7

But, sir, in my humble opinion, these things are comparative by the lesser things of the law.—They doubtless have their influence in the grand effect, and so are essential to the system—But, sir, I view the section to which we have at length arrived [Art. I, sec. 8] as the cement of the fabrick, and this clause as the key-stone, or (if I may apply the metaphor) the magick talisman on which the fate of it depends. 4.5.8

Allow me, sir, to recall to your remembrance that yesterday, when States were in doubt about granting to Congress a five per cent. impost, and the simple power of regulating trade—the time, when so delicate was the patriotick mind, that power was to be transferred with reluctant, with a sparing hand—and the most obvious utility could scarcely extort it from the people. It appears to me of some importance, to consider this matter, and to demand complete satisfaction upon the question, why an unlimited power in the affair of taxation, is so soon required? Is our situation so vastly different, that the powers so lately sufficient, are now but the dust of the balance? I observe, sir, that many men, who within a few years past, were strenuous opposers of an augmentation of the power of Congress, are now the warmest advocates of power, so large as not to admit of a comparison with those which they opposed. Cannot some of them state their reasons then, and their reasons now, that we may judge of their consistency—or shall we be left to suppose that the opinions of politicians, like those of the multitude, vibrate from one extreme to the other, and that we have no men among us to whom we can intrust the philosophick task of pointing out the golden mean? 4.5.9

At present, Congress have no power to lay taxes, &c. nor even to compel a compliance with their requisitions. May we not suppose, that the members of the great Convention, had severely felt the impotency of Congress, while 4.5.10 they were in it, and therefore were rather too keenly set for an effectual increase of power? That the difficulties they had encountered, in obtaining decent requisitions, had wrought in them a degree of impatience, which prompted them to demand the purse-strings of the nation, as if we were insolvent, and the proposed Congress were to compound with our creditors?—Whence, Sir, can this great, I had almost said, this bold demand have originated? Will it be said that it is but a consistent and necessary part of the general system? I shall not deny these gentlemen the praise of inventing a system completely consistent with itself, and pretty free from contradiction—but I would ask, I shall expect to be answered, how a system can be necessary for us, of which this is a consistent and necessary part?

Here, Sir, (however kindly Congress may be pleased to deal with us) is a very good and valid conveyance of all the property in the United States—to certain uses indeed, but those uses capable of any construction, the trustee may think proper to make. This body is not amenable to any tribunal, and therefore, this Congress can do no wrong—It will not be denied that they may tax us to any extent, but some gentlemen are fond of arguing that this body never will do any thing but what is for the common good. Let us consider that matter.

4.5.12 Faction, Sir, is the vehicle of all transactions in publick bodies, and when gentlemen know this so well, I am rather surprized to hear them so sanguine in this respect.[3] The prevalent faction is the body—these gentlemen, therefore, must mean that the prevalent faction will always be right, and that the true patriots will always out number the men of less and selfish principles. From this it would follow, that no publick measure was ever wrong, because it must have been passed by the majority, and so, I grant no power ever was, or will be abused.—In short, we know that all governments have degenerated, and consequently have abused the powers reposed in them, and why we should imagine better of the proposed Congress than of myriads of publick bodies who have gone before them, I cannot at present conceive.

4.5.13 Sir, we ought (I speak it with submission) to consider that what we now grant from certain motives, well grounded at present, will be exacted of posterity as a prerogative when we are not alive, to testify the tacit conditions of the grant—that the wisdom of this age will then be pleaded by those in power—and that the cession we are now about to make will be actually clothed with the venerable habit of ancestral sanction.[4]

Therefore, sir, I humbly presume we ought not to take advantage of our situation in point of time, so as to bind posterity to be obedient to laws, they may very possibly disapprove, nor expose them to a rebellion which at that period will very probably end only in their farther subjugation.

4.5.14 The paragraph in question is an absolute decree of the people. The Congress shall have power—it does not say that they shall exercise it—but our necessities say, they must, and the experience of ages says, that they will,[5] and finally, when the expenses of the nation, by their ambition are grown enormous, that they will oppress and subject.—For sir, they may lay taxes, duties, imposts and excises! One would suppose that the Convention, sir, were not at all afraid to multiply words when any thing was to be got by it. By another clause, all imposts and duties, on exports and imports, wherever laid, go into the federal chest—so that Congress may not only lay imposts and excises, but all imposts and duties that are laid on imports and exports, by any State, shall be a part of the national revenue—and besides, Congress may lay an impost on the produce and manufactures of the country, which are consumed at home.—And all these shall be equal through the States.—Here sir, I raise two objections; 1st. that Congress should have this power. It is a universal, unbounded permission; and as such, I think, no free people ought ever to consent to it, especially in so important a matter as that of property. I will not descend, sir, to an abuse of this future Congress, until it exists, nor then, until it misbehaves, nor then, unless I dare. But I think that some certain revenue amply adequate to all necessary purposes, upon a peace establishment, but certain and definite would have been better, and the collection of it might have been guaranteed by every State to every other. We should then have known to what we were about to subscribe and should have chearfully granted it. But now, we may indeed grant, but who can chearfully grant he knows not what?

Again, sir, I object to the equality of these duties through the States. It matters not with me, in the present argument, which of them will suffer by this proportion. Some probably will, as the consumption of dutied articles will not, if we may judge from experience, be uniform in all. 4.5.15

But some say, with whom I have conversed, it was for this reason that taxes were provided, that by their assistance the defect of duties in some States ought to be supplied. Now then, let us suppose, that the duties are so laid, that if every State paid in proportion, to that which paid most, the duties alone would supply a frugal treasury. Some States will pay but half their proportion, and some will scarcely pay any thing. But those in general who pay the least duty, viz. the inland States, are least of all able to pay a land tax, and therefore I do not see but this tax would operate most against those who are least able to pay it. 4.5.16

I humbly submit it, sir, whether, if each State had its proportion of some certain gross sum assigned, according to its numbers, and a power was given to Congress, to collect the same, in case of default in the State, this would not have been a safer Constitution. For, sir, I also disapprove of the power to collect, which is here vested in Congress; it is a power, sir, to burden us with a standing army of ravenous collectors; harpies perhaps from another State, but who, however, were never known to have bowels for any purpose, but to fatten on the life-blood of the people. In one age or two this will be the case, and when the Congress shall become tyrannical, these vultures, their servants, will be the tyrants of the village, by whose presence, all freedom of speech and action, will be taken away. 4.5.17

Sir, I shall be told that these are imaginary evils—but I hold to this 4.5.18 maxim, that power was never given (of this kind especially) but it was exercised, nor ever exercised but it was finally abused. We must not be amused with handsome probabilities, but we must be assured that we are in no danger, and that this Congress could not distress us, if they were ever so much disposed.

These words, sir, I confess are an ornament to the page. And very musical words—But they are too general to be understood as any kind of limitations of the power of Congress, and not very easy to be understood at all. When Congress have the purse, they are not confined to rigid oeconomy, and the word debts here is not confined to debts already contracted, or indeed, if it were, the term "general welfare" might be applied to any expenditure whatever. Or if it could not, who shall dare to gainsay the proceedings of this body at a future day, when according to the course of nature it shall be too firmly fixed in the saddle, to be overthrown by any thing but a general insurrection? An event not to be expected considering the extent of this Continent; and if it were to be expected, a sufficient reason in itself for rejecting this or any Constitution that would tend to produce it.

4.5.20 This clause, sir, contains the very sinews of the Constitution. And I hope the universality of it may be singular; but it may be easily seen, that it tends to produce in time, as universal powers in every other respect. As the poverty of individuals prevents luxury, so the poverty of publick bodies, whether sole or aggregate, prevents tyranny. A nation cannot, perhaps, do a more politick thing, than to supply the purse of its sovereign with that parsimony, which results from a sense of the labour it costs, and so to compel him to comply with the genius of his people, and conform to their situation, whether he will or not. How different will be our conduct, if we give the entire disposal of our property to a body, as yet almost unknown in theory, in practice quite heterogeneous in its composition, and whose maxims are yet intirely unknown.

4.5.21 Sir, I wish the gentlemen, who so ably advocate this instrument, would enlarge upon this formidable clause and I most sincerely wish that the effect of their reasoning may be my conviction. For, sir, I will not dishonour my constituents, by supposing that they expect me to resist that which is irresistible; the force of reason. No, sir, my constituents ardently wish for a firm, efficient continental government, but fear the operation of this which is now proposed. Let them be convinced that their fears are groundless, and I venture to declare in their name, that no town in the commonwealth, will sooner approve the form, or be better subjects under it.

Letters of Agrippa

MASSACHUSETTS GAZETTE
November 1787–February 1788

The important Agrippa letters appear to have been written by James Winthrop.[1] The son of mathematics professor John Winthrop of Harvard, James became librarian of Harvard in 1770 following his graduation from that institution. He became register of probate in Middlesex in 1787 and Judge of Common Pleas in 1791. While Harvard librarian, he fought in the Revolution, was postmaster of Cambridge, and served as a volunteer against the Shays insurgents. Winthrop was twice passed over for his father's professorship in mathematics because, it is reported, his "intemperate manner and . . . eccentricities militated against him."[2] His chief literary effort was a study and interpretation of biblical prophecies.

The letters of Agrippa are vigorously and well argued, but were not much reprinted, probably because of their preoccupation with the interests of Massachusetts. That preoccupation deserves the reader's close attention, however, because it reflects the principled selfishness that is the ground of Agrippa's argument (VII, 4.6.26–29). The letters fall into two distinct sets, the first (I–XI, 4.6.1–47) addressed to the people of Massachusetts, the second (XII–XVI, 4.6.48–79) to the Massachusetts Convention. This fact explains much of the repetition and some of the variation in Agrippa's arguments. In both sets there are highly theoretical arguments as well as specific criticisms of the proposed Constitution and suggestions for action; but the differences in form and focus are due partly to the different circumstances and audiences to which the papers were addressed.

Each of the sets of letters has its own plan or outline, although Agrippa frequently allows the argument to stray, and indeed some of the most interesting and fruitful observations are made in the course of diversions or secondary arguments. The overall theme concerns the connection between freedom, commerce, and local institutions. The chief dangers of the proposed Constitution are, first, the destruction of the states, which are necessary because of the heterogeneity to be found in the United States, and, second, the stifling of commerce by excessive regulation.

The first set of papers is particularly interesting on the question of the small republic (IV, 4.6.14–17) and on commerce as the bond of Union (VIII, 4.6.30–33). Agrippa reveals here, in a particularly open way, a tension that is quite common in Anti-Federalist thought between the claims of civic virtue and of commerce as the bond of civil society. The second set of letters contains an extended and significant discussion of the Bill of Rights. A brief outline follows.

Part I—To the People

I. Introduction and general sketch: Freedom is necessary to industry; great objective should be to encourage the spirit of commerce (I, 4.6.1–6).

II. Advantages of present system: efficiency of states for internal regulation (II, III, 4.6.7–13).

III. Disadvantages of the consolidation implicit in the proposed Constitution (IV–VII, 4.6.14–29).

  A. Impossibility of governing an extensive empire on republican principles except as a confederated republic because of the heterogeneity of the parts. Yet the new system is a consolidation (IV, 4.6.14–17).

  B. Proof that the new system is a consolidation (V–VI, 4.6.18–25).

  C. Harm of this consolidation for Massachusetts (VII, 4.6.26–29).

IV. The true bond of Union is commerce (VIII–IX, 4.6.30–37).

  A. We are now a federal republic under that moderate political authority that is necessary to the peaceful operation of commercial intercourse (VIII, 4.6.30–33).

  B. Criticism of deficiencies of Articles of Confederation taken up:

    (1) regarding taxation (VIII, 4.6.30–33)

    (2) regarding regulation of intercourse with foreign nations (IX, 4.6.34–37).

V. Summary and suggested amendments to Articles of Confederation (X, 4.6.38–44).

(VI. P.S.—attack on Federalist Party [XI, 4.6.45–47]).

Part II—To the Massachusetts Convention

This second set of papers consists of a long paper devoted to the subject of the Federal Republic, and retracing much of the ground of the first set of papers (but sometimes with interesting elaborations), together with a new discussion of the Bill of Rights, and a set of proposed amendments to the Constitution.

I. Federal Republic is the form of government best suited to answer both internal and external needs. This is the system we now possess; it can be improved by modest amendments; it would be destroyed by the proposed Constitution (XII, 4.6.48–59).

II. Bill of Rights and Constitution (XIII–XV, 4.6.60–71).

III. Proposed Amendments to the Constitution (XVI, 4.6.72–79).

Ford's reprinting of these letters (Essays 53–122) contains errors of numbering and dating and an omission, which are identified in the notes here. As Ford points out (p. 51), Agrippa's letters called forth a number of replies; but none of these seriously took up his arguments. To the People.

4.6.1 Many inconveniencies and difficulties in the new plan of government have been mentioned by different writers on that subject. Mr Gerry has given the publick his objections against it, with a manly freedom.[1] The seceding members from the Pennsylvania Assembly also published theirs.[2] Various anonymous writers have mentioned reasons of great weight. Among the many objections have been stated the unlimited right of taxation—a standing army—an inadequate representation of the people—a right to destroy the constitution of the separate states, and all the barriers that have been set up in defence of liberty—the right to try causes between private persons in many cases without a jury; without trying in the vicinity of either party; and without any limitation of the value which is to be tried. To none of these or any other objections has any answer been given, but such as have acknowledged the truth of the objection while they insulted the objector. This conduct has much the appearance of trying to force a general sentiment upon the people.

4.6.2 The idea of promoting the happiness of the people by opposing all their habits of business, and by subverting the laws to which they are habituated, appears to me to be at least a mistaken proceeding. If to this we add the limitations of trade, restraints on its freedom, and the alteration of its course, and transfer of the market, all under the pretence of regulation for federal purposes, we shall not find any additional reason to be pleased with the plan.

4.6.3 It is now conceded on all sides that the laws relating to civil causes were never better executed than at present. It is confessed by a warm federalist in answer to mr. Gerry's sensible letter, that the courts are so arranged at present that no inconvenience is found, and that if the new plan takes place great difficulties may arise.[3] With this confession before him, can any reasonable man doubt whether he shall exchange a system, found by experience to be convenient, for one that is in many respects inconvenient, and dangerous? The expense of the new plan is terrifying, if there was no other objection. But they are multiplied. Let us consider that of the representation.

4.6.4 There is to be one representative for every thirty thousand people. Boston would nearly send one, but with regard to another there is hardly a county in the state which would have one. The representatives are to be chosen for two years. In this space, when it is considered that their residence is from two hundred to five [hundred?] miles from their constituents, it is difficult to suppose that they will retain any great affection for the welfare of the people. They will have an army to support them, and may bid defiance to the clamours of their subjects. Should the people cry aloud the representative may avail himself of the right to alter the time of election and postpone it for another year. In truth, the question before the people is, whether they will have a limited government or an absolute one?

4.6.5 It is a fact justified by the experience of all mankind from the earliest antiquity down to the present time, that freedom is necessary to industry. We accordingly find that in absolute governments, the people, be the climate what it may, are [in] general lazy, cowardly, turbulent, and vicious to an extreme. On the other hand, in free countries are found in general, activity, industry, arts, courage, generosity, and all the manly virtues.

Can there be any doubt which to choose? He that hesitates must be base indeed.

4.6.6 A favourite objection against a free government is drawn from the irregularities of the Greek and Roman republicks. But it is to be considered that war was the employment which they considered as most becoming freemen. Agriculture, arts, and most domestick employment were committed chiefly to slaves. But Carthage, the great commercial republick of antiquity, though resembling Rome in the form of its government, and her rival for power, retained her freedom longer than Rome, and was never disturbed by sedition during the long period of her duration.[4] This is a striking proof that the fault of the Greek and Roman republicks was not owing to the form of their government, and that the spirit of commerce is the great bond of union among citizens.[5] This furnishes employment for their activity, supplies their mutual wants, defends the rights of property, and producing reciprocal dependencies, renders the whole system harmonious and energetick. Our great object therefore ought to be to encourage this spirit. If we examine the present state of the world we shall find that most of the business is done in the freest states, and that industry decreases in proportion to the rigour of government.

Agrippa.

II

27 November 1787

To the People of Massachusetts.

4.6.7 In the Gazette of the 23d instant, I ascertained from the state of other countries and the experience of mankind, that free countries are most friendly to commerce and to the rights of property. This produces greater internal tranquillity. For every man, finding sufficient employment for his active powers in the way of trade, agriculture and manufactures, feels no disposition to quarrel with his neighbour, nor with the government which protects him, and of which he is a constituent part.[6] Of the truth of these positions we have abundant evidence in the history of our own country. Soon after the settlement of Massachusetts, and its formation into a commonwealth, in the earlier part of the last century, there was a sedition at Hingham and Weymouth. The governour passing by at that time with his guard, seized some of the mutineers and imprisoned them. This was complained of as a violation of their rights, and the governour lost his election the next year; but the year afterwards was restored and continued to be re-elected for several years. The government does not appear to have been disturbed again till the revocation of the charter in 1686, being a period of about half a century.[7]

4.6.8 Connecticut set out originally on the same principles, and has continued uniformly to exercise the powers of government to this time.

During the last year, we had decisive evidences of the vigour of this kind of government.[8] In Connecticut, the treason was restrained while it existed only in the form of conspiracy. In Vermont, the conspirators assembled in arms, but were suppressed by the exertions of the militia, under the direction of their sheriffs. In New-Hampshire, the attack was made on the legislature, but the insurrection was in a very few hours suppressed, and has never been renewed. In Massachusetts, the danger was, by delay, suffered to increase. One judicial court after another was stopped, and even the capital trembled. Still, however, when the supreme executive gave the signal, a force of many thousands of active, resolute men, took the field, during the severities of winter, and every difficulty vanished before them. Since that time we have been continually coalescing. The people have applied with diligence to their several occupations, and the whole country wears one face of improvement. Agriculture has been improved, manufactures multiplied, and trade prodigiously enlarged. These are the advantages of freedom in a growing country. While our resources have been thus rapidly increasing, the courts have set in every part of the commonwealth, without any guard to defend them; have tried causes of every kind, whether civil or criminal, and the sheriffs, have in no case been interrupted in the execution of their office. In those cases indeed, where the government was more particularly interested, mercy has been extended, but in civil causes, and in the case of moral offences, the law has been punctually executed. Damage done to individuals, during the tumults, has been repaired, by judgment of the courts of law, and the award has been carried into effect. This is the present state of affairs, when we are asked to relinquish that freedom which produces such happy effects.

The attempt has been made to deprive us of such a beneficial system, and 4.6.9 to substitute a rigid one in its stead, by criminally alarming our fears, exalting certain characters on one side, and villifying them on the other.[9] I wish to say nothing of the merits or demerits of individuals; such arguments always do hurt. But assuredly my countrymen cannot fail to consider and determine who are the most worthy of confidence in a business of this magnitude.—Whether they will trust persons, who have, from their cradles, been incapable of comprehending any other principles of government, than those of absolute power, and who have, in this very affair, tried to deprive them of their constitutional liberty, by a pitiful trick. They cannot avoid prefering those who have uniformly exerted themselves to establish a limited government, and to secure to individuals all the liberty that is consistent with justice, between man and man, and whose efforts, by the smiles of Providence, have hitherto been crowned with the most splendid success. After the treatment we have received, we have a right to be jealous, and to guard our present constitution with the strictest care. It is the right of the people to judge, and they will do wisely to give an explicit instruction to their delegates in the proposed convention, not to agree to any proposition that will, in any degree, militate with that happy system of government under which Heaven has placed them.

III

30 November 1787

To the People.

It has been proved, from the clearest evidence, in two former papers, that a 4.6.10 free government, I mean one in which the power frequently returns to the body of the people, is in principle the most stable and efficient of any kind; that such a government affords the most ready and effectual remedy for all injuries done to persons and the rights of property. It is true we have had a tender act. But what government has not some law in favour of debtors? The difficulty consists in finding one that is not more unfriendly to the creditors than ours. I am far from justifying such things. On the contrary I believe that it is universally true, that acts made to favour a part of the community are wrong in principle. All that is now intended is, to remark that we are not worse than other people in that respect which we most condemn. Probably the inquiry will be made, whence the complaints arise. This is easily answered. Let any man look round his own neighbourhood, and see if the people are not, with a very few exceptions, peaceable and attached to the government; if the country had ever within their knowledge more appearance of industry, improvement and tranquillity; if there was ever more of the produce of all kinds together for the market; if their stock does not rapidly increase; if there was ever a more ready vent for their surplus; and if the average of prices is not about as high as was usual in a plentiful year before the war. These circumstances all denote a general prosperity. Some classes of citizens indeed suffer greatly. Two descriptions I at present recollect. The publick creditors form the first of these classes and they ought to, and will be provided for. Let us for a moment consider their situation and prospects. The embarrassments consequent upon a war, and the usual reduction of prices immediately after a war, necessarily occasioned a want of punctuality in publick payments. Still however the publick debt has been very considerably reduced, not by the dirty and delusive scheme of depreciation, but the nominal sum. Applications are continually making for purchases in our eastern and western lands. Great exertions are making for clearing off the arrears of outstanding taxes, so that the certificates for interest on the state debt have considerably increased in value. This is a certain indication of returning credit. Congress this year disposed of a large tract of their lands towards paying the principal of their debt. Pennsylvania has discharged the whole of their part of the continental debt. New-York has nearly cleared its state debt, and has located a large part of their new lands towards paying the continental demands. Other states have made considerable payments. Every day from these considerations the publick ability and inclination to satisfy their creditors increases. The exertions of last winter were as much to support publick as private credit. The prospect therefore of the publick creditors is brightening under the present system. If the new system should take effect without amendments, which however is hardly probable, the increase of expense will be death to the hopes of all creditors both of the continental and of the state. With respect however to our publick delays of payment we have the precedent of the best established countries in Europe.

4.6.11 The other class of citizens to which I alluded was the ship-carpenters. All agree that their business is dull; but as nobody objects against a system of commercial regulations for the whole continent, that business may be relieved without subverting all the ancient foundations and laws which have the respect of the people. It is a very serious question whether giving to Congress the unlimited right to regulate trade would not injure them still further. It is evidently for the interest of the state to encourage our own trade as much as possible. But in a very large empire, as the whole states consolidated must be, there will always be a desire of the government to increase the trade of the capital, and to weaken the extremes. We should in that case be one of the extremes, and should feel all the impoverishment incident to that situation. Besides, a jealousy of our enterprising spirit, would always be an inducement to cramp our exertions. We must then be impoverished or we must rebel. The alternative is dreadful.

4.6.12 At present this state is one of the most respectable and one of the most influential in the union. If we alone should object to receiving the system without amendments, there is no doubt but it would be amended. But the case is not quite so bad. New-York appears to have no disposition even to call a convention. If they should neglect, are we to lend our assistance to compel them by arms, and thus to kindle a civil war without any provocation on their part. Virginia has put off their convention till May, and appears to have no disposition to receive the new plan without amendments. Pennsylvania does not seem to be disposed to receive it as it is. The same objections are made in all the states, that the civil government which they have adopted and which secures their rights will be subverted. All the defenders of this system undertake to prove that the rights of the states and of the citizens are kept safe. The opposers of it agree that they will receive the least burdensome system which shall defend those rights.

4.6.13 Both parties therefore found their arguments on the idea that these rights ought to be held sacred. With this disposition is it not in every man's mind better to recommit it to a new convention, or to Congress, which is a regular convention for the purpose, and to instruct our delegates to confine the system to the general purposes of the union, than to endeavour to force it through in its present form, and with so many opposers as it must have in every state on the continent. The case is not of such pressing necessity as some have represented. Europe is engaged and we are tranquil. Never therefore was an happier time for deliberation. The supporters of the measure are by no means afraid of insurrections taking place, but they are afraid that the present government will prove superiour to their assaults.

Agrippa.

IV

3 December 1787

To the People.

4.6.14 Having considered some of the principal advantages of the happy form of government under which it is our peculiar good fortune to live, we find by experience, that it is the best calculated of any form hitherto invented, to secure to us the rights of our persons and of our property, and that the general circumstances of the people shew an advanced state of improvement never before known. We have found the shock given by the war in a great measure obliterated, and the publick debt contracted at that time to be considerably reduced in the nominal sum. The Congress lands are fully adequate to the redemption of the principal of their debt, and are selling and populating very fast. The lands of this state, at the west, are, at the moderate price of eighteen pence an acre, worth near half a million pounds in our money. They ought, therefore, to be sold as quick as possible. An application was made lately for a large tract at that price, and continual applications are made for other lands in the eastern part of the state. Our resources are daily augmenting.

4.6.15 We find, then, that after the experience of near two centuries our separate governments are in full vigour. They discover, for all the purposes of internal regulation, every symptom of strength, and none of decay. The new system is, therefore, for such purposes, useless and burdensome.

4.6.16 Let us now consider how far it is practicable consistent with the happiness of the people and their freedom. It is the opinion of the ablest writers on the subject, that no extensive empire can be governed upon republican principles, and that such a government will degenerate to a despotism, unless it be made up of a confederacy of smaller states, each having the full powers of internal regulation.[10] This is precisely the principle which has hitherto preserved our freedom. No instance can be found of any free government of considerable extent which has been supported upon any other plan. Large and consolidated empires may indeed dazzle the eyes of a distant spectator with their splendour, but if examined more nearly are always found to be full of misery. The reason is obvious. In large states the same principles of legislation will not apply to all the parts. The inhabitants of warmer climates are more dissolute in their manners, and less industrious, than in colder countries. A degree of severity is, therefore, necessary with one which would cramp the spirit of the other.[11] We accordingly find that the very great empires have always been despotick. They have indeed tried to remedy the inconveniences to which the people were exposed by local regulations; but these contrivances have never answered the end. The laws not being made by the people, who felt the inconveniences, did not suit their circumstances. It is under such tyranny that the Spanish provinces languish, and such would be our misfortune and degradation, if we should submit to have the concerns of the whole empire managed by one legislature. To promote the happiness of the people it is necessary that there should be local laws; and it is necessary that those laws should be made by the representatives of those who are immediately subject to the want of them. By endeavouring to suit both extremes, both are injured.

4.6.17 It is impossible for one code of laws to suit Georgia and Massachusetts.

They must, therefore, legislate for themselves. Yet there is, I believe, not one point of legislation that is not surrendered in the proposed plan. Questions of every kind respecting property are determinable in a continental court, and so are all kinds of criminal causes. The continental legislature has, therefore, a right to make rules in all cases by which their judicial courts shall proceed and decide causes. No rights are reserved to the citizens. The laws of Congress are in all cases to be the supreme law of the land, and paramount to the constitutions of the individual states. The Congress may institute what modes of trial they please, and no plea drawn from the constitution of any state can avail. This new system is, therefore, a consolidation of all the states into one large mass, however diverse the parts may be of which it is to be composed. The idea of an uncompounded republick, on an average, one thousand miles in length, and eight hundred in breadth, and containing six millions of white inhabitants all reduced to the same standard of morals, or habits, and of laws, is in itself an absurdity, and contrary to the whole experience of mankind. The attempt made by Great-Britain to introduce such a system, struck us with horrour, and when it was proposed by some theorist that we should be represented in parliament,[12] we uniformly declared that one legislature could not represent so many different interests for the purposes of legislation and taxation. This was the leading principle of the revolution, and makes an essential article in our creed. All that part, therefore, of the new system, which relates to the internal government of the states, ought at once to be rejected.

To the People.

In the course of inquiry it has appeared, that for the purposes of internal regulation and domestick tranquillity, our small and separate governments are not only admirably suited in theory, but have been remarkably successful in practice. It is also found, that the direct tendency of the proposed system, is to consolidate the whole empire into one mass, and, like the tyrant's bed, to reduce all to one standard. Though this idea has been stated in different parts of the continent, and is the most important trait of this draft, the reasoning ought to be extensively understood. I therefore hope to be indulged in a particular statement of it. 4.6.18

Causes of all kinds, between citizens of different states, are to be tried before a continental court. This court is not bound to try it according to the 4.6.19

local laws where the controversies happen; for in that case it may as well be tried in a state court. The rule which is to govern the new courts, must, therefore, be made by the court itself, or by its employers, the Congress. If by the former, the legislative and judicial departments will be blended; and if by the Congress, though these departments will be kept separate, still the power of legislation departs from the state in all those cases. The Congress, therefore, have the right to make rules for trying all kinds of questions relating to property between citizens of different states. The sixth article of the new constitution provides, that the continental laws shall be the supreme law of the land, and that all judges in the separate states shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding. All the state officers are also bound by oath to support this constitution. These provisions cannot be understood otherwise than as binding the state judges and other officers, to execute the continental laws in their own proper departments within the state. For all questions, other than those between citizens of the same state, are at once put within the jurisdiction of the continental courts. As no authority remains to the state judges, but to decide questions between citizens of the same state, and those judges are to be bound by the laws of Congress, it clearly follows, that all questions between citizens of the same state are to be decided by the general laws and not by the local ones.

4.6.20 Authority is also given to the continental courts, to try all causes between a state and its own citizens.[13] A question of property between these parties rarely occurs. But if such questions were more frequent than they are, the proper process is not to sue the state before an higher authority; but to apply to the supreme authority of the state, by way of petition. This is the universal practice of all states, and any other mode of redress destroys the sovereignty of the state over its own subjects. The only case of the kind in which the state would probably be sued, would be upon the state notes. The endless confusion that would arise from making the estates of individuals answerable, must be obvious to every one.

4.6.21 There is another sense in which the clause relating to causes between the state and individuals is to be understood, and it is more probable than the other, as it will be eternal in its duration, and increasing in its extent. This is the whole branch of the law relating to criminal prosecutions. In all such cases the state is plaintiff, and the person accused is defendant. The process, therefore, will be, for the attorney-general of the state to commence his suit before a continental court. Considering the state as a party, the cause must be tried in another, and all the expense of the transporting witnesses incurred. The individual is to take his trial among strangers, friendless and unsupported, without its being known whether he is habitually a good or a bad man; and consequently with one essential circumstance wanting by which to determine whether the action was performed maliciously or accidentally. All these inconveniences are avoided by the present important restriction, that the cause shall be tried by a jury of the vicinity, and tried in the county where the offence was commited. But by the proposed derangement, I can call it by no softer name, a man must be ruined to prove his innocence. This is far from being a forced construction of the proposed form. The words appear to me not intelligible, upon the idea that it is to be a system of government, unless the construction now given, both for civil and criminal processes, be admitted. I do not say that it is intended that all these changes should take place within one year, but they probably will in the course of a half a dozen years, if this system is adopted. In the mean time we shall be subject to all the horrors of a divided sovereignty, not knowing whether to obey the Congress or the state. We shall find it impossible to please two masters. In such a state frequent broils will ensue. Advantage will be taken of a popular commotion, and even the venerable forms of the state be done away, while the new system will be enforced in its utmost rigour by an army. I am the more apprehensive of a standing army, on account of a clause in the new constitution which empowers Congress to keep one at all times; but this constitution is evidently such that it cannot stand any considerable time without an army. Upon this principle one is very wisely provided. Our present government knows of no such thing.

To the People.

To prevent any mistakes, or misapprehensions of the argument, stated in my last paper, to prove that the proposed constitution is an actual consolidation of the separate states into one extensive commonwealth, the reader is desired to observe, that in the course of the argument, the new plan is considered as an intire system. It is not dependent on any other book for an explanation, and contains no references to any other book. All the defences of it, therefore, so far as they are drawn from the state constitutions, or from maxims of the common law, are foreign to the purpose. It is only by comparing the different parts of it together, that the meaning of the whole is to be understood. For instance— 4.6.22

We find in it, that there is to be a legislative assembly, with authority to constitute courts for the trial of all kinds of civil causes, between citizens of different states. The right to appoint such courts necessarily involves in it the right of defining their powers, and determining the rules by which their judgment shall be regulated; and the grant of the former of those rights is 4.6.23

nugatory without the latter. It is vain to tell us, that a maxim of common law requires contracts to be determined by the law existing where the contract was made: for it is also a maxim, that the legislature has a right to alter the common law. Such a power forms an essential part of legislation. Here, then a declaration of rights is of inestimable value. It contains those principles which the government never can invade without an open violation of the compact between them and the citizens.[14] Such a declaration ought to have come to the new constitution in favour of the legislative rights of the several states, by which their sovereignty over their own citizens within the state should be secured. Without such an express declaration the states are annihilated in reality upon receiving this constitution—the forms will be preserved only during the pleasure of Congress.

4.6.24 The idea of consolidation is further kept up in the right given to regulate trade.[15] Though this power under certain limitations would be a proper one for the department of Congress; it is in this system carried much too far, and much farther than is necessary. This is, without exception, the most commercial state upon the continent. Our extensive coasts, cold climate, small estates, and equality of rights, with a variety of subordinate and concurring circumstances, place us in this respect at the head of the union. We must, therefore, be indulged if a point which so nearly relates to our welfare be rigidly examined. The new constitution not only prohibits vessels, bound from one state to another, from paying any duties, but even from entering and clearing. The only use of such a regulation is, to keep each state in complete ignorance of its own resources. It certainly is no hardship to enter and clear at the custom house, and the expense is too small to be an object.

4.6.25 The unlimitted right to regulate trade, includes the right of granting exclusive charters. This, in all old countries, is considered as one principal branch of prerogative. We find hardly a country in Europe which has not felt the ill effects of such a power. Holland has carried the exercise of it farther than any other state; and the reason why that country has felt less evil from it is, that the territory is very small, and they have drawn large revenues from their colonies in the East and West Indies. In this respect, the whole country is to be considered as a trading company, having exclusive privileges. The colonies are large in proportion to the parent state; so that, upon the whole, the latter may gain by such a system. We are also to take into consideration the industry which the genius of a free government inspires. But in the British islands all these circumstances together have not prevented them from being injured by the monopolies created there. Individuals have been enriched, but the country at large has been hurt. Some valuable branches of trade being granted to companies, who transact their business in London, that city is, perhaps, the place of the greatest trade in the world. But Ireland, under such influence, suffers exceedingly, and is impoverished; and Scotland is a mere bye-word. Bristol, the second city in England, ranks not much above this town in population. These things must be accounted for by the incorporation of trading companies; and if they are felt so severely in countries of small extent, they will operate with tenfold severity upon us, who inhabit an immense tract; and living towards one extreme of an extensive empire, shall feel the evil, without retaining that influence in government, which may enable us to procure redress. There ought, then, to have been inserted a restraining clause which might prevent the Congress from making any such grant, because they consequentially defeat the trade of the out-ports, and are also injurious to the general commerce, by enhancing prices and destroying that rivalship which is the great stimulus to industry.

To the People.

There cannot be a doubt, that, while the trade of this continent remains free, the activity of our countrymen will secure their full share. All the estimates for the present year, let them be made by what party they may, suppose the balance of trade to be largely in our favour. The credit of our merchants is, therefore, fully established in foreign countries. This is a sufficient proof, that when business is unshackled, it will find out that channel which is most friendly to its course. We ought, therefore, to be exceedingly cautious about diverting or restraining it. Every day produces fresh proofs, that people, under the immediate pressure of difficulties, do not, at first glance, discover the proper relief. The last year, a desire to get rid of embarrassments induced many honest people to agree to a tender-act, and many others, of a different description, to obstruct the courts of justice. Both these methods only increased the evil they were intended to cure. Experience has since shewn, that, instead of trying to lessen an evil by altering the present course of things, every endeavour[16] should have been applied to facilitate the course of law, and thus to encourage a mutual confidence among the citizens, which increases the resources of them all, and renders easy the payment of debts. By this means one does not grow rich at the expense of another, but all are benefited. The case is the same with the states. Pennsylvania, with one port and a large territory, is less favourably situated for trade than the Massachusetts, which has an extensive coast in proportion to its limits of jurisdiction. Accordingly a much larger proportion of our people are engaged in maritime affairs. We ought therefore to be particularly attentive to securing so great an interest. It is vain to tell us that we ought to overlook local interests. It is only by protecting local concerns, that the interest of the whole is preserved. No man when he enters into society, does it from a view to promote the good of others, but he does it for his own good. All men having the same view are bound equally to promote the welfare of the whole. To recur then to such a principle as that local interests must be disregarded, is requiring of one man to do more than another, and is subverting the foundation of a free government. The Philadelphians would be shocked with a proposition to place the seat of general government and the unlimited right to regulate trade in the Massachusetts. There can be no greater reason for our surrendering the preference to them. Such sacrifices, however we may delude ourselves with the form of words, always originate in folly, and not in generosity.[17]

4.6.27 Let me now request your attention a little while to the actual state of publick credit, that we may see whether it has not been as much misrepresented as the state of our trade.

At the beginning of the present year, the whole continental debt was about twelve millions of pounds in our money. About one quarter part of this sum was due to our foreign creditors. Of these France was the principal, and called for the arrears of interest. A new loan of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds was negotiated in Holland, at five per cent. to pay the arrears due to France. At first sight this has the appearance of bad economy, and has been used for the villainous purpose of disaffecting the people. But in the course of this same year, Congress have negotiated the sale of as much of their western lands on the Ohio and Missisippi, as amount nearly to the whole sum of the foreign debt; and instead of a dead loss by borrowing money at five per cent. to the amount of an hundred and twenty thousand pounds, in one sum, they make a saving of the interest at six per cent. on three millions of their domestick debt, which is an annual saving of an hundred and eighty thousand pounds. It is easy to see how such an immense fund as the western territory may be applied to the payment of the foreign debt. Purchasers of the land would as willingly procure any kind of the produce of the United States as they would buy loan office certificates to pay for the land. The produce thus procured would easily be negotiated for the benefit of our foreign creditors. I do not mean to insinuate that no other provision should be made for our creditors, but only to shew that our credit is not so bad in other countries as has been represented, and that our resources are fully equal to the pressure.

4.6.28 The perfection of government depends on the equality of its operation, as far as human affairs will admit, upon all parts of the empire, and upon all the citizens. Some inequalities indeed will necessarily take place. One man will be obliged to travel a few miles further than another man to procure justice.

But when he has travelled, the poor man ought to have the same measure of justice as the rich one. Small inequalities may be easily compensated. There ought, however, to be no inequality in the law itself, and the government ought to have the same authority in one place as in another. Evident as this truth is, the most plausible argument in favour of the new plan is drawn from the inequality of its operation in different states. In Connecticut, they have been told that the bulk of the revenue will be raised by impost and excise, and therefore they need not be afraid to trust Congress with the power of levying a dry tax at pleasure. New-York, and Massachusetts, are both more commercial states than Connecticut. The latter, therefore, hopes that the other two will pay the bulk of the continental expense. The argument is in itself delusive. If the trade is not over-taxed, the consumer pays it. If the trade is over-taxed, it languishes, and by the ruin of trade the farmer loses his market. The farmer has in truth no other advantage from imposts than that they save him the trouble of collecting money for the government. He neither gets or loses money by changing the mode of taxation. The government indeed finds it the easiest way to raise the revenue; and the reason is that the tax is by this means collected where the money circulates most freely. But if the argument was not delusive, it ought to conclude against the plan, because it would prove the unequal operation of it, and if any saving is to be made by the mode of taxing, the saving should be applied towards our own debt, and not to the payment of the part of a continental burden which Connecticut ought to discharge. It would be impossible to refute in writing all the delusions made use of to force this system through. Those respecting the publick debt, and the benefit of imposts, are the most important, and these I have taken pains to explain. In one instance indeed, the impost does raise money at the direct expense of the seaports. This is when goods are imported subject to a duty, and re-exported without a drawback. Whatever benefit is derived from this source, surely should not be transferred to another state, at least till our own debts are cleared.

Another instance of unequal operation is, that it establishes different degrees of authority in different states, and thus creates different interests. The lands in New-Hampshire having been formerly granted by this state, and afterwards by that state, to private persons, the whole authority of trying titles becomes vested in a continental court, and that state loses a branch of authority, which the others retain, over their own citizens. 4.6.29

I have now gone through two parts of my argument, and have proved the efficiency of the state governments for internal regulation, and the disadvantages of the new system, at least some of the principal. The argument has been much longer than I at first apprehended, or, possibly, I should have been deterred from it. The importance of the question has, however, prevented me from relinquishing it.

Agrippa.

25 December 1787

To the People.

4.6.30 It has been proved, by indisputable evidence, that power is not the grand principle of union among the parts of a very extensive empire; and that when this principle is pushed beyond the degree necessary for rendering justice between man and man, it debases the character of individuals, and renders them less secure in their persons and property. Civil liberty consists in the consciousness of that security, and is best guarded by political liberty, which is the share that every citizen has in the government. Accordingly all our accounts agree, that in those empires which are commonly called despotick, and which comprehend by far the greatest part of the world, the government is most fluctuating, and property least secure. In those countries insults are borne by the sovereign, which, if offered to one of our governours, would fill us with horrour, and we should think the government dissolving.

4.6.31 The common conclusion from this reasoning is an exceedingly unfair one, that we must then separate, and form distinct confederacies. This would be true if there was no principle to substitute in the room of power. Fortunately there is one. This is commerce.[18] All the states have local advantages, and in a considerable degree separate interests. They are, therefore, in a situation to supply each other's wants. Carolina, for instance, is inhabited by planters, while the Massachusetts is more engaged in commerce and manufactures. Congress has the power of deciding their differences. The most friendly intercourse may therefore be established between them. A diversity of produce, wants and interests, produces commerce, and commerce, where there is a common, equal and moderate authority to preside, produces friendship.

4.6.32 The same principles apply to the connection with the new settlers in the west. Many supplies they want, for which they must look to the older settlements, and the greatness of their crops enables them to make payments. Here, then, we have a bond of union which applies to all parts of the empire, and would continue to operate if the empire comprehended all America.

4.6.33 We are now, in the strictest sense of the terms, a federal republick. Each part has within its own limits the sovereignty over its citizens, while some of the general concerns are committed to Congress. The complaints of the deficiency of the Congressional powers are confined to two articles. They are not able to raise a revenue by taxation, and they have not a complete regulation of the intercourse between us and foreigners. For each of these complaints there is some foundation, but not enough to justify the clamour which has been raised. Congress, it is true, owes a debt which ought to be paid. A considerable part of it has been paid. Our share of what remains would annually amount to about sixty or seventy thousand pounds. If, therefore, Congress were put in possession of such branches of the impost as would raise this sum in our state, we should fairly be considered as having done our part towards their debt; and our remaining resources, whether arising from impost, excise, or dry tax, might be applied to the reduction of our own debt. The principal of this last amounts to about thirteen hundred thousand pounds, and the interest to between seventy or eighty thousand. This is, surely, too much property to be sacrificed; and it is as reasonable that it should be paid as the continental debt. But if the new system should be adopted, the whole impost, with an unlimited claim to excise and dry tax, will be given to Congress. There will remain no adequate fund for the state debt, and the state will still be subject to be sued on their notes.—This is, then, an article which ought to be limited. We can, without difficulty, pay as much annually as shall clear the interest of our state debt, and our share of the interest on the continental one. But if we surrender the impost, we shall still, by this new constitution, be held to pay our full proportion of the remaining debt, as if nothing had been done. The impost will not be considered as being paid by this state, but by the continent. The federalists, indeed, tell us, that the state debts will all be incorporated with the continental debt, and all paid out of one fund. In this, as in all other instances, they endeavour to support their scheme of consolidation by delusion. Not one word is said in the book in favour of such a scheme, and there is no reason to think it true. Assurances of that sort are easily given, and as easily forgotton. There is an interest in forgetting what is false. No man can expect town debts to be united with that of the state; and there will be as little reason to expect, that the state and continental debts will be united together.

Agrippa.

IX

28 December 1787

To the People.

We come now to the second and last article of complaint against the present confederation, which is, that Congress has not the sole power to regulate the intercourse between us and foreigners. Such a power extends not only to war and peace, but to trade and naturalization. This last article ought never to be given them; for though most of the states may be willing for certain 4.6.34 reasons to receive foreigners as citizens, yet reasons of equal weight may induce other states, differently circumstanced, to keep their blood pure. Pennsylvania has chosen to receive all that would come there. Let any indifferent person judge whether that state in point of morals, education, energy is equal to any of the eastern states; the small state of Rhode-Island only excepted. Pennsylvania in the course of a century has acquired her present extent and population at the expense of religion and good morals. The eastern states have, by keeping separate from the foreign mixtures, acquired, their present greatness in the course of a century and an half, and have preserved their religion and morals.[19] They have also preserved that manly virtue which is equally fitted for rendering them respectable in war, and industrious in peace.

4.6.35 The remaining power for peace and trade might perhaps be safely enough lodged with Congress under some limitations. Three restrictions appear to me to be essentially necessary to preserve the equality of rights to the states, which it is the object of the state governments to secure to each citizen. 1st. It ought not to be in the power of Congress either by treaty or otherwise to alienate part of any state without the consent of the legislature. 2d. They ought not to be able by treaty or other law to give any legal preference to one part above another. 3d. They ought to be restrained from creating any monopolies. Perhaps others may propose different regulations and restrictions. One of these is to be found in the old confederation, and another in the newly proposed plan. The third seems to be equally necessary.

4.6.36 After all that has been said and written on this subject, and on the difficulty of amending our old constitution so as to render it adequate to national purposes, it does not appear that any thing more was necessary to be done, than framing two new articles. By one a limited revenue would be given to Congress with a right to collect it, and by the other a limited right to regulate our intercourse with foreign nations. By such an addition we should have preserved to each state its power to defend the rights of the citizens, and the whole empire would be capable of expanding, and receiving additions without altering its former constitution. Congress, at the same time, by the extent of their jurisdiction, and the number of their officers, would have acquired more respectability at home, and a sufficient influence abroad. If any state was in such a case to invade the rights of the Union, the other states would join in defence of those rights, and it would be in the power of Congress to direct the national force to that object. But it is certain that the powers of Congress over the citizens should be small in proportion as the empire is extended; that, in order to preserve the balance, each state may supply by energy what is wanting in numbers. Congress would be able by such a system as we have proposed to regulate trade with foreigners by such duties as should effectually give the preference to the produce and manufactures of our own country. We should then have a friendly intercourse established between the states, upon the principles of mutual interest. A moderate duty upon foreign vessels would give an advantage to our own people, while it would avoid all the [dis]advantages arising from a prohibition, and the consequent deficiency of vessels to transport the produce of the southern states.

Our country is at present upon an average a thousand miles long from north to south, and eight hundred broad from the Missisippi to the Ocean. We have at least six millions of white inhabitants, and the annual increase is about two hundred and fifty thousand souls, exclusive of emigrants from Europe. The greater part of our increase is employed in settling the new lands, while the older settlements are entering largely into manufactures of various kinds. It is probable, that the extraordinary exertions of this state in the way of industry for the present year only, exceed in value five hundred thousand pounds. The new settlements, if all made in the same tract of country, would form a large state annually; and the time seems to be literally accomplished when a nation shall be born in a day. Such an immense country is not only capable of yielding all the produce of Europe, but actually does produce by far the greater part of the raw materials. The restrictions on our trade in Europe, necessarily oblige us to make use of those materials, and the high price of labour operates as an encouragement to mechanical improvements. In this way we daily make rapid advancements towards independence in resources as well as in empire. If we adopt the new system of government we shall by one rash vote lose the fruit of the toil and expense of thirteen years, at the time when the benefits of that toil and expense are rapidly increasing. Though the imposts of Congress on foreign trade may tend to encourage manufactures, the excise and dry tax will destroy all the beneficial effects of the impost, at the same time that they diminish our capital. Be careful then to give only a limited revenue, and the limited power of managing foreign concerns. Once surrender the rights of internal legislation and taxation, and instead of being respected abroad, foreigners will laugh at us, and posterity will lament our folly. 4.6.37

To the People.

Friends and Brethren,

It is a duty incumbent on every man, who has had opportunities for inquiry, to lay the result of his researches on any matter of publick im- 4.6.38

portance before the publick eye. No further apology will be necessary with the generality of my readers, for having so often appeared before them on the subject of the lately proposed form of government. It has been treated with that freedom which is necessary for the investigation of truth, and with no greater freedom. On such a subject, extensive in its nature, and important in its consequences, the examination has necessarily been long, and the topicks treated of have been various. We have been obliged to take a cursory, but not inaccurate view of the circumstances of mankind under the different forms of government to support the different parts of our argument. Permit me now to bring into one view the principal propositions on which the reasoning depends.

4.6.39 It is shewn from the example of the most commercial republick of antiquity, which was never disturbed by a sedition for above seven hundred years, and at last yielded after a violent struggle to a foreign enemy, as well as from the experience of our own country for a century and an half; that the republican, more than any other form of government is made of durable materials. It is shewn from a variety of proof, that one consolidated government is inapplicable to a great extent of country; is unfriendly to the rights both of persons and property, which rights always adhere together; and that being contrary to the interest of the extreme of an empire, such a government can be supported only by power, and that commerce is the true bond of union for a free state. It is shewn from a comparison of the different parts of the proposed plan, that it is such a consolidated government.

4.6.40 By article 3, section 2, Congress are empowered to appoint courts with authority to try civil causes of every kind, and even offences against particular states; by the last clause of article 1, section 8, which defines their legislative powers, they are authorized to make laws for carrying into execution all the "powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof;" and by article 6, the judges in every state are to be bound by the laws of Congress. It is therefore a complete consolidation of all the states into one, however diverse the parts of it may be. It is also shewn that it will operate unequally in the different states, taking from some of them a greater share of wealth; that in this last respect it will operate more to the injury of this commonwealth than of any state in the union; and that by reason of its inequality it is subversive of the principles of a free government, which requires every part to contribute an equal proportion. For all these reasons this system ought to be rejected, even if no better plan was proposed in the room of it. In case of a rejection we must remain as we are, with trade extending, resources opening, settlements enlarging, manufactures increasing, and publick debts diminishing by fair payment. These are mighty blessings, and not to be lost by the hasty adoption of a new system. But great as these benefits are, which we derive from our present system, it has been shewn, that they may be increased by giving Congress a limited power to regulate trade, and assigning to them those branches of the impost on our foreign trade only, which shall be equal to our proportion of their present annual demands. While the interest is thus provided for, the sale of our lands in a very few years will pay the principal, and the other resources of the state will pay our own debt. The present mode of assessing the continental tax is regulated by the extent of landed property in each state. By this rule the Massachusetts has to pay one eighth. If we adopt the new system, we shall surrender the whole of our impost and excise, which probably amount to a third of those duties of the whole continent, and must come in for about a sixth part of the remaining debt. By this means we shall be deprived of the benefit arising from the largeness of our loans to the continent, shall lose our ability to satisfy the just demands on the state. Under the limitations of revenue and commercial regulation contained in these papers, the balance will be largely in our favour; the importance of the great states will be preserved, and the publick creditors both of the continent and state will be satisfied without burdening the people. For a more concise view of my proposal, I have thrown it into the form of a resolve supposed to be passed by the convention which is shortly to set in this town.

"Commonwealth of Massachusetts. 4.6.41

Resolved, That the form of government lately proposed by a federal convention, held in the city of Philadelphia, is so far injurious to the interests of this commonwealth, that we are constrained by fidelity to our constituents to reject it; and we do hereby reject the said proposed form and every part thereof. But in order that the union of these states may, as far as possible, be promoted, and the federal business as little obstructed as may be, we do agree on the part of this commonwealth, that the following addition be made to the present articles of confederation.

"XIV. The United States shall have power to regulate the intercou[r]se 4.6.42 between these states and foreign dominions, under the following restrictions; viz 1st. No treaty, ordinance, or law shall alienate the whole or part of any state, without the consent of the legislature of such state. 2d. The United States shall not by treaty or otherwise give a preference to the ports of one state over those of another; Nor, 3d create any monopolies or exclusive companies; Nor, 4th, extend the privileges of citizenship to any foreigner. And for the more convenient exercise of the powers hereby and by the former articles given, the United S[t]ates shall have authority to constitute judicatories, whether supreme or subordinate, with power to try all piracies and felonies done on the high seas, and also all civil causes in which a foreign state, or subject thereof actually resident in a foreign country and not being British absentees, shall be one of the parties. They shall also have authority to try all causes in which ambassadours shall be concerned. All these trials shall be by jury and in some sea-port town. All imposts levied by Congress on trade shall be confined to foreign produce or foreign manufactures imported, and to foreign ships trading in our harbours, and all their absolute prohibitions shall be confined to the same articles. All imposts and confiscations shall be to the use of the state in which they shall accrue, excepting in such branches as shall be assigned by any state as a fund for defraying their proportion of the continental. And no powers shall be exercised by Congress but such as are expressly given by this and the former articles. And we hereby authorize our delegates in Congress to sign and ratify an article in the foregoing form and words, without any further act of this state for that purpose, provided the other states shall accede to this proposition on their part on or before the first day of January, which will be in the year of our Lord 1790. All matters of revenue being under the controul of the legislature, we reccommend to the general court of this commonwealth, to devise, as early as may be, such funds arising from such branches of foreign commerce, as shall be equal to our part of the current charges of the continent, and to put Congress in possession of the revenue arising therefrom, with a right to collect it, during such term as shall appear to be necessary for the payment of the principal of their debt, by the sale of the western lands."

4.6.43 By such an explicit declaration of the powers given to Congress, we shall provide for all federal purposes, and shall at the same time secure our rights. It is easier to amend the old confederation, defective as it has been represented, than it is to correct the new form. For with what ever view it was framed, truth constrains me to say, that it is insiduous in its form, and ruinous in its tendency. Under the pretence of different branches of the legislature, the members will in fact be chosen from the same general description of citizens. The advantages of a check will be lost, while we shall be continually exposed to the cabals and corruption of a British election. There cannot be a more eligible mode than the present, for appointing members of Congress, nor more effectual checks provided than our separate state governments, nor any system so little expensive, in case of our adopting the resolve just stated, or even continuing as we are. We shall in that case avoid all the inconvenience of concurrent jurisdictions, we shall avoid the expensive and useless establishments of the Philadelphia proposition, we shall preserve our constitution and liberty, and we shall provide for all such institutions as will be useful. Surely then you cannot hesitate, whether you will chuse freedom or servitude. The object is now well defined. By adopting the form proposed by the convention, you will have the derision of foreigners, internal misery, and the anathemas of posterity. By amending the present confederation, and granting limited powers to Congress, you secure the admiration of strangers, internal happiness, and the blessings and prosperity of all succeeding generations. Be wise then, and by preserving your freedom, prove, that Heaven bestowed it not in vain. Many will be the efforts to delude the convention. The mode of judging is itself suspicious, as being contrary to the antient and established usage of the commonwealth. But since this mode is adopted, we trust, that the numbers [members?] of that venerable assembly will not so much regard the greatness of their power, as the sense and interest of their constituents. And they will do well to remember that even a mistake in adopting it, will be destructive, while no evils can arise from a total, and much less, probably, from such a partial rejection as we have proposed.

I have now gone through my reasonings on this momentous subject, and 4.6.44 have stated the facts and deductions from them, which you will verify for yourselves. Personal interest was not my object, or I should have pursued a different line of conduct. Though I conceived that a man who owes allegiance to the state is bound, on all important occasions, to propose such inquiries as tend to promote the publick good; yet I did not imagine it to be any part of my duty to present myself to the fury of those, who appear to have other ends in view. For this cause, and for this only, I have chosen a feigned signature. At present all the reports concerning the writer of these papers are merely conjectural. I should have been ashamed of my system if it had needed such feeble support as the character of individuals. It stands on the firm ground of the experience of mankind. I cannot conclude this long disquisition better than with a caution derived from the words of inspiration. Discern the things of your peace now in the days thereof, before they be hidden from your eyes.[20]

To the People.

My last Address contained the outlines of a system fully adequate to all the 4.6.45 useful purposes of the union. Its object is to raise a sufficient revenue from the foreign trade, and the sale of our publick lands, to satisfy all the publick exigencies, and to encourage, at the same time, our internal industry and manufactures. It also secures each state in its own separate rights, while the continental concerns are thrown into the general department. The only deficiencies that I have been able to discover in the plan, and in the view of federalists they are very great ones, are, that it does not allow the interference of Congress in the domestick concerns of the state, and that it does not render our national councils so liable to foreign influence. The first of these articles tends to guard us from that infinite multiplication of officers which the report of the Convention of Philadelphia proposes. With regard to the second, it is evidently not of much importance to any foreign nation to purchase, at a very high price, a majority of votes in an assembly, whose members are continually exposed to a recall. But give those members a right to sit six, or even two, years, with such extensive powers as the new system proposes, and their friendship will be well worth a purchase. This is the only sense in which the Philadelphia system will render us more respectable in the eyes of foreigners. In every other view they lose their respect for us, as it will render us more like their own degraded models. It is a maxim with them, that every man has his price. If, therefore we were to judge of what passes in the hearts of the federalists when they urge us, as they continually do, to be like other nations, and when they assign mercenary motives to the opposers of their plan, we should conclude very fairly, that themselves wish to be provided for at the publick expense. However that may be, if we look upon the men we shall find some of their leaders to have formed pretty strong attachments to foreign nations. Whether those attachments arose from their being educated under a royal government, from a former unfortunate mistake in politicks, or from the agencies for foreigners, or any other cause, is not in my province to determine. But certain it is, that some of the principal fomenters of this plan have never shewn themselves capable of that generous system of policy which is founded in the affections of freemen. Power and high life are their idols, and national funds are necessary to support them.

4.6.46 Some of the principal powers of Europe have already entered into treaties with us, and that some of the rest have not done it, is not owing, as is falsely pretended, to the want of power in Congress. Holland never found any difficulty of this kind from the multitude of sovereignties in that country, which must all be consulted on such an occasion. The resentment of Great Britain for our victories in the late war has induced that power to restrain our intercourse with their subjects. Probably an hope, the only solace of the wretched, that their affairs would take a more favourable turn on this continent, has had some influence on their proceedings. All their restrictions have answered the end of securing our independence by driving us into many valuable manufactures. Their own colonies in the mean time have languished for want of an intercourse with these states. The new settlement in Nova Scotia has miserably decayed, and the West India Islands have suffered for want of our supplies, and by the loss of our market. This has affected the revenue; and however contemptuously some men may affect to speak of our trade, the supply of six millions of people is an object worth the attention of any nation upon earth. Interest in such a nation as Britain will surmount their resentment. However their pride may be stung, they will pursue after wealth. Increase of revenue to a nation overwhelmed with a debt of near two hundred and ninety millions sterling is an object to which little piques must give way; and there is no doubt that their interest consists in securing as much of our trade as they can.

4.6.47 These are topicks from which are drawn some of the most plausible reasons that have been given by the federalists in favour of their plan, as derived from the sentiments of foreigners. We have weighed them and found them wanting. That they had not themselves full confidence in their own reasons at Philadelphia is evident from the method they took to bias the state Convention. Mess'rs Wilson and M'Kean, two Scottish names, were repeatedly worsted in the argument. To make amends for their own incapacity, the gallery was filled with a rabble, who shouted their applause, and these heroes of aristocracy were not ashamed, though modesty is their national virtue, to vindicate such a violation of decency:[21] Means not less criminal, but not so flagrantly indecent, have been frequently mentioned among us to secure a majority. But those who vote for a price, can never sanctify wrong, and treason will still retain its deformity.

11 January 1788

To the Massachusetts Convention.

Gentlemen,

Suffer an individual to lay before you his contemplations on the great subject that now engages your attention. To you it belongs, and may Heaven direct your judgment, to decide on the happiness of all future generations as well as the present. 4.6.48

It is universally agreed, that the object of every just government is to render the people happy, by securing their persons and possessions from wrong. To this end it is necessary that there should be local laws and institutions; for a people inhabiting various climates will unavoidably have local habits and different modes of life, and these must be consulted in making the laws. It is much easier to adapt the laws to the manners of the people, than to make manners conform to laws. The idle and dissolute inhabitants of the south, require a different regimen from the sober and active people of the north. Hence, among other reasons, is derived the necessity of local governments, who may enact, repeal, or alter regulations as the circumstances of each part of the empire may require. This would be the case, even if a very great state was to be settled at once. But it becomes still more needful, when the local manners are formed, and usages sanctified by the practice of a century and an half. In such a case, to attempt to reduce all to one standard, is absurd in itself, and cannot be done but upon the principle of power, which debases the people, and renders them unhappy, till all dignity of character is put away. Many circumstances render us an essentially different people from the inhabitants of the southern states. The unequal distribution of property, the toleration of slavery, the ignorance and poverty of the lower classes, the softness of the climate, and dissoluteness of manners, mark their character. Among us, the care that is taken of education, small and nearly equal estates, equality of rights, and the severity of the climate, renders the people active, industrious and sober. Attention to religion and good morals is a distinguishing trait in our character. It is plain, therefore, that we require for our regulation laws, which will not suit the circumstances of our southern brethren, and the laws made for them would not apply to us.[23] Unhappiness would be the uniform product of such laws; for no state can be happy, when the laws contradict the general habits of the people, nor can any state retain its freedom, while there is a power to make and enforce such laws. We may go further, and say, that it is impossible for any single legislature so fully to comprehend the circumstances of the different parts of a very extensive dominion, as to make laws adapted to those circumstances. Hence arises in most nations of extensive territory, the necessity of armies, to cure the defect of the laws. It is actually under the pressure of such an absurd government, that the Spanish provinces have groaned for near three centuries; and such will be our misfortune and degradation, if we ever submit to have all the business of the empire done by one legislature. The contrary principle of local legislation by the representatives of the people, who alone are to be governed by the laws, has raised us to our present greatness; and an attempt on the part of Great-Britain, to invade this right, brought on the revolution, which gave us a separate rank among the nations. We even declared, that we would not be represented in the national legislature, because one assembly was not adequate to the purposes of internal legislation and taxation.[24]

(concluded from our last)[25]

To the Massachusetts Convention.

Gentlemen,

4.6.49 The question then arises, what is the kind of government best adapted to the object of securing our persons and possessions from violence? I answer, a FEDERAL REPUBLICK. By this kind of government each state reserves to itself the right of making and altering its laws for internal regulation, and the right of executing those laws without any external restraint, while the general concerns of the empire are committed to an assembly of delegates, each accountable to his own constituents. This is the happy form under which we live, and which seems to mark us out as a people chosen of God. No instance can be produced of any other kind of government so stable and energetick as the republican. The objection drawn from the Greek and Roman states does not apply to the question.[26] Republicanism appears there in its most disadvantageous form. Arts and domestick employments were generally commited to slaves, while war was almost the only business worthy of a citizen. Hence arose their internal dissensions. Still they exhibited proofs of legislative wisdom and judicial integrity hardly to be found among their monarchick neighbours. On the other hand we find Carthage cultivating commerce, and extending her dominions for the long space of seven centuries, during which term the internal tranquillity was never disturbed by her citizens. Her national power was so respectable, that for a long time it was doubtful whether Carthage or Rome should rule. In the form of their government they bore a strong resemblance to each other. Rome might be reckoned a free state for about four hundred and fifty years. We have then the true line of distinction between those two nations, and a strong proof of the hardy materials which compose a republican government. If there was no other proofs we might with impartial judges risk the issue upon this alone. But our proof rests not here. The present state of Europe, and the vigour and tranquillity of our own governments, after experiencing this form for a century and an half, are decided proofs in favour of those governments which encourage commerce. A comparison of our own country, first with Europe and then with the other parts of the world, will prove, beyond a doubt, that the greatest share of freedom is enjoyed by the citizens, so much more does commerce flourish. The reason is, that every citizen has an influence in making the laws, and thus they are conformed to the general interests of the state; but in every other kind of government they are frequently made in favour of a part of the community at the expense of the rest.

The argument against republicks, as it is derived from the Greek and Roman states, is unfair. It goes on the idea that no other government is subject to be disturbed. As well might we conclude, that a limited monarchy is unstable, because, that under the feudal system, the nobles frequently made war upon their king, and disturbed the publick peace. We find, however, in practice, that limited monarchy is more friendly to commerce, because more friendly to the rights of the subject, than an absolute government; and that it is more liable to be disturbed than a republick, because less friendly to trade and the rights of individuals. There cannot, from the history of mankind, be produced an instance of rapid growth in extent, in numbers, in arts, and in trade, that will bear any comparison with our country. This is owing to what the friends of the new system, and the enemies of the revolution, for I take them to be nearly the same, would term our extreme liberty. Already, have our ships visited every part of the world, and brought us their commodities in greater perfection, and at a more moderate price, than we ever before experienced. The ships of other nations crowd to our ports, seeking an intercourse with us. All the estimates of every party make the balance of trade for the present year to be largely in our favour. Already have some very useful, and some elegant manufactures got established among us, so that our country every day is becoming independent in her resources. Two thirds of the continental debt has been paid since the war, and we are in alliance with some of the most respectable powers of Europe. The western lands, won from Britain by the sword, are an ample fund for the principal of all our publick debts; and every new sale excites that manly pride which is essential to national virtue. All this happiness arises from the freedom of our institutions and the limitted nature of our government; a government that is respected from principles of affection, and obeyed with alacrity. The sovereigns of the old world are frequently, though surrounded with armies, treated with insult; and the despotick monarchies of the east, are the most fluctuating, oppressive and uncertain governments of any form hitherto invented. These considerations are sufficient to establish the excellence of our own form, and the goodness of our prospects.

4.6.51 Let us now consider the probable effects of a consolidation of the separate states into one mass; for the new system extends so far. Many ingenious explanations have been given of it; but there is this defect, that they are drawn from maxims of the common law, while the system itself cannot be bound by any such maxims. A legislative assembly has an inherent right to alter the common law, and to abolish any of its principles, which are not particularly guarded in the constitution. Any system therefore which appoints a legislature without any reservation of the rights of individuals, surrender[s] all power in every branch of legislation to the government. The universal practice of every government proves the justness of this remark; for in every doubtful case it is an established rule to decide in favour of authority. The new system is, therefore, in one respect at least, essentially inferiour to our state constitutions. There is no bill of rights, and consequently a continental law may controul any of those principles, which we consider at present as sacred; while not one of those points, in which it is said that the separate governments misapply their power, is guarded. Tender acts and the coinage of money stand on the same footing of a consolidation of power. It is a mere fallacy, invented by the deceptive powers of mr. Wilson, that what rights are not given are reserved. The contrary has already been shewn.[27] But to put this matter of legislation out of all doubt, let us compare together some parts of the book; for being an independent system, this is the only way to ascertain its meaning.

4.6.52 In article III, section 2, it is declared, that "the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority." Among the cases arising under this new constitution are reckoned, "all controversies between citizens of different states," which include all kinds of civil causes between those parties. The giving Congress a power to appoint courts for such a purpose is as much, there being no stipulation to the contrary, giving them power to legislate for such causes, as giving them a right to raise an army, is giving them a right to direct the operations of the army when raised. But it is not left to implication. The last clause of article I, section 8, expressly gives them power "to make all laws which shall be needful and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." It is, therefore, as plain as words can make it, that they have a right by this proposed form to legislate for all kinds of causes respecting property between citizens of different states. That this power extends to all cases between citizens of the same state, is evident, from the sixth article, which declares all continental laws and treaties to be the supreme law of the land, and that all state judges are bound thereby, "any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." If this is not binding the judges of the separate states in their own office, by continental rules, it is perfect nonsense. There is then a complete consolidation of the legislative powers in all cases respecting property. This power extends to all cases between a state and citizens of another state. Hence a citizen, possessed of the notes of another state, may bring his action, and there is no limitation that the execution shall be levied on the publick property of the state but the property of individuals is liable. This is a foundation for endless confusion and discord. This, right to try causes between a state and citizens of another state, involves in it all criminal causes; and a man who has accidentally transgressed the laws of another state, must be transported, with all his witnesses, to a third state, to be tried. He must be ruined to prove his innocence. These are necessary parts of the new system, and it will never be complete till they are reduced to practice. They effectually prove a consolidation of the states, and we have before shewn the ruinous tendency of such a measure.[28]

By sect. 8, of article 1, Congress are to have the unlimitted right to regulate commerce, external and internal, and may therefore create monopolies which have been universally injurious to all the subjects of the countries that have adopted them, excepting the monopolists themselves. They have also the unlimited right to imposts and all kinds of taxes as well to levy as to collect them.[29] They have indeed very nearly the same powers claimed formerly by the British parliament. Can we have so soon forgot our glorious struggle with that power, as to think a moment of surrendering it now? It makes no difference in principle whether the national assembly was elected for seven years or for six. In both cases we should vote to great disadvantage, and therefore ought never to agree to such an article. Let us make provision for the payment of the interest of our part of the debt, and we shall be fairly acquitted. Let the fund be an impost on our foreign trade, and we shall encourage our manufactures. But if we surrender the un- 4.6.53 limitted right to regulate trade and levy taxes, imposts will oppress our foreign trade for the benefit of other states, while excises and taxes will discourage our internal industry. The right to regulate trade, without any limitations, will, as certainly as it is granted, transfer the trade of this state to Pennsylvania.[30] That will be the seat of business and of wealth, while the extremes of the empire will, like Ireland and Scotland, be drained to fatten an overgrown capital. Under our present equal advantages, the citizens of this state come in for their full share of commercial profits. Surrender the rights of taxation and commercial regulation, and the landed states at the southward will all be interested in draining our resources; for whatever can be got by impost on our trade and excises on our manufactures, will be considered as so much saved to a state inhabited by planters. All savings of this sort ought surely to be made in favour of our own state; and we ought never to surrender the unlimitted powers of revenue and trade to uncommercial people. If we do, the glory of the state from that moment departs, never to return.

4.6.54 The safety of our constitutional rights consists in having the business of government lodged in different departments, and in having each part well defined. By this means each branch is kept within the constitutional limits. Never was a fairer line of distinction than what may be easily drawn between the continental and state governments. The latter provide for all cases, whether civil or criminal, that can happen ashore, because all such causes must arise within the limits of some state. Transactions between citizens may all be fairly included in this idea, even although they should arise in passing by water from one state to another. But the intercourse between us and foreign nations, properly forms the department of Congress. They should have the power of regulating trade under such limitations as should render their laws equal. They should have the right of war and peace, saving the equality of rights, and the territory of each state. But the power of naturalization and internal regulation should not be given them. To give my scheme a more systematick appearance, I have thrown it into the form of a resolve, which is submitted to your wisdom for amendment, but not as being perfect.

4.6.55 "Resolved, that the form of government proposed by the federal convention, lately held in Philadelphia, be rejected on the part of this commonwealth; and that our delegates in Congress are hereby authorised to propose on the part of this commonwealth, and, if the other states for themselves agree thereto, to sign an article of confederation, as an addition to the present articles, in the form following, provided such agreement be made on or before the first day of January, which will be in the year of our Lord 1790; the said article shall have the same force and effect as if it had been inserted in the original confederation, and is to be construed consistently with the clause in the former articles, which restrains the United States from exercising such powers as are not expressly given.

"XIV. The United States shall have power to regulate, whether by treaty, 4.6.56 ordinance, or law, the intercourse between these states and foreign dominions and countries, under the following restrictions. No treaty, ordinance, or law shall give a preference to the ports of one state over those of another; nor 2d. impair the territory or internal authority of any state; nor 3d. create any monopolies or exclusive companies; nor 4th. naturalise any foreigners. All their imposts and prohibitions shall be confined to foreign produce and manufactures imported, and to foreign ships trading in our harbours. All imposts and confiscations shall be to the use of the state where they shall accrue, excepting only such branches of impost, as shall be assigned by the separate states to Congress for a fund to defray the interest of their debt, and their current charges. In order the more effectually to execute this and the former articles, Congress shall have authority to appoint courts, supreme & subordinate, with power to try all crimes, not relating to state securities, between any foreign state, or subject of such state, actually residing in a foreign country, and not being an absentee or person who has alienated himself from these states on the one part, and any of the United States or citizens thereof on the other part; also all causes in which foreign ambassadours or other foreign ministers resident here shall be immediately concerned, respecting the jurisdiction or immunities only. And the Congress shall have authority to execute the judgment of such courts by their own affairs. Piracies and felonies committed on the high seas shall also belong to the department of Congress for them to define, try, and punish, in the same manner as the other causes shall be defined, tried, and determined. All the before-mentioned causes shall be tried by jury and in some sea-port town. And it is recommended to the general court at their next meeting to provide and put Congress in possession of funds arising from foreign imports and ships sufficient to defray our share of the present annual expenses of the continent."

Such a resolve explicitly limitting the powers granted is the farthest we 4.6.57 can proceed with safety. The scheme of accepting the report of the Convention, and amending it afterwards, is merely delusive. There is no intention among those who make the proposition to amend it at all. Besides, if they have influence enough to get it accepted in its present form, there is no probability, that they will consent to an alteration when possessed of an unlimited revenue. It is an excellence in our present confederation, that it is extremely difficult to alter it. An unanimous vote of the states is required. But this newly proposed form is founded in injustice, as it proposes that a fictitious consent of only nine states shall be sufficient to establish it. Nobody can suppose that the consent of a state is any thing more than a fiction, in the view of the federalists, after the mobbish influence used over the Pennsylvania convention. The two great leaders of the plan, with a modesty of Scotsmen, placed a rabble in the gallery to applaud their speeches, and thus supplied their want of capacity in the argument. Repeatedly were Wilson and M'Kean worsted in the argument by the plain good sense of Findly and Smilie. But reasoning or knowledge had little to do with the federal party. Votes were all they wanted by whatever means obtained. Means not less criminal have been mentioned among us. But votes that are bought can never justify a treasonable conspiracy. Better, far better, would it be to reject the whole, and remain in possession of present advantages. The authority of Congress to decide disputes between states is sufficient to prevent their recurring to hostility: and their different situation, wants and produce is a sufficient foundation for the most friendly intercourse. All the arts of delusion and legal chicanery will be used to elude your vigilance, and obtain a majority. But keeping the constitution of the state, and the publick interest in view, will be your safety.

(We are obliged contrary to our intention, to postpone the remainder of Agrippa till our next.)

18 January 1788

(Concluded from our last.)

To the Massachusetts Convention.

Gentlemen,

4.6.58 To tell us that we ought to look beyond local interests, and judge for the good of the empire, is sapping the foundation of a free state.[31] The first principle of a just government is, that it shall operate equally. The report of the convention is extremely unequal. It takes a larger share of power from some, and from others, a larger share of wealth. The Massachusetts will be obliged to pay near three times their present proportion towards continental charges. The proportion is now ascertained by the quantity of landed property, then it will be by the number of persons. After taking the whole of our standing revenue, by impost and excise, we must still be held to pay a sixth part of the remaining debt. It is evidently a contrivance to help the other states at our expense. Let us then be upon our guard, and do no more than the present confederation obliges. While we make that our beacon we are safe. It was framed by men of extensive knowledge and enlarged ability, at a time when some of the framers of the new plan were hiding in the forests to secure their precious persons. It was framed by men, who were always in favour of a limitted government, and whose endeavours Heaven has crowned with success. It was framed by men, whose idols were not power and high life, but industry and constitutional liberty, and who are now in opposition to this new scheme of oppression. Let us then cherish the old confederation like the apple of our eye. Let us confirm it by such limitted powers to Congress, and such an enlarged intercourse, founded on commerce and mutual want, with the other states, that our union shall outlast time itself. It is easier to prevent an evil than to cure it. We ought therefore to be cautious of innovations. The intrigues of interested politicians will be used to seduce even the elect. If the vote passes in favour of the plan, the constitutional liberty of our country is gone forever. If the plan should be rejected, we always have it in our power, by a fair vote of the people at large, to extend the authority of Congress. This ought to have been the mode pursued. But our antagonists were afraid to risk it. They knew that the plan would not bear examining. Hence we have seen them insulting all who were in opposition to it, and answering arguments only with abuse. They have threatened and they have insulted the body of the people. But I may venture to appeal to any man of unbiassed judgment, whether his feelings tell him, that there is any danger at all in rejecting the plan. I ask not the palsied or the jaundiced, nor men troubled with bilious or nervous affections, for they can see danger in every thing. But I apply to men who have no personal expectations from a change, and to men in full health. The answer of all such men will be, that never was a better time for deliberation. Let us then, while we have it in our power, secure the happiness and freedom of the present and future ages. To accept of the report of the convention, under the idea that we can alter it when we please, will be sporting with fire-brands[,] arrows and death. It is a system which must have an army to support it, and there can be no redress but by a civil war. If, as the federalists say, there is a necessity of our receiving it, for heaven's sake let our liberties go without our making a formal surrender. Let us at least have the satisfaction of protesting against it, that our own hearts may not reproach us for the meanness of deserting our dearest interests.

Our present system is attended with the inestimable advantage of preventing unnecessary wars. Foreign influence is assuredly smaller in our publick councils, in proportion as the members are subject to be recalled. At present, their right to sit continues no longer than their endeavours to secure the publick interest. It is therefore not an object for any foreign power to give a large price for the friendship of a delegate in Congress. If we adopt the new system, every member will depend upon thirty thousand people, mostly scattered over a large extent of country, for his election. Their distance from the seat of government will make it extremely difficult for the electors to get information of his conduct. If he is faithful to his constituents, his conduct will be misrepresented, in order to defeat his influence at home. Of this we have a recent instance, in the treatment of the dissenting members of the late federal convention. Their fidelity to their constituents was their whole fault. We may reasonably expect similar conduct to be adopted, when we shall have rendered the friendship of the members valuable to foreign powers, by giving them a secure seat in Congress. We shall too have all the intrigues, cabals and bribery practised, which are usual at elections in Great-Britain. We shall see and lament the want of publick virtue; and we shall see ourselves bought at a publick market, in order to be sold again to the highest bidder. We must be involved in all the quarrels of European powers, and oppressed with expense, merely for the sake of being like the nations round about us. Let us then, with the spirit of freemen, reject the offered system, and treat as it deserves the proposition of men who have departed from their commission; and let us deliver to the rising generation the liberty purchased with our blood.

Agrippa.

XIII

22 January 1788

To the Massachusetts Convention.

Gentlemen,

4.6.60 Truly deplorable, in point of argument, must be that cause, in whose defence persons of acknowledged learning and ability can say nothing pertinent. When they undertake to prove that the person elected is the safest person in the world to controul the exercise of the elective powers of his constituents, we know what dependence is to be had upon their reasonings. Yet we have seen attempts to shew, that the fourth section of the proposed constitution, is an additional security to our rights. It may be such in the view of a Rhode-Island family (I think that state is quoted) who have been for some time in the minority: but it is extraordinary, that an enlightened character in the Massachusetts should undertake to prove, that, from a single instance of abuse in one state, another state ought to resign its liberty.[32] Can any man, in the free exercise of his reason, suppose, that he is perfectly represented in the legislature, when that legislature may at pleasure alter the time, manner, and place of election. By altering the time they may continue a representative during his whole life; by altering the manner, they may fill up the vacancies by their own votes without the consent of the people; and by altering the place, all the elections may be made at the seat of the federal government. Of all the powers of government perhaps this is the most improper to be surrendered. Such an article at once destroys the whole check which the constituents have upon their rulers. I should be less zealous upon this subject, if the power had not been often abused. The senate of Venice, the regencies of Holland, and the British parliament have all abused it. The last have not yet perpetuated themselves; but they have availed themselves repeatedly of popular commotions to continue in power. Even at this day we find attempts to vindicate the usurpation by which they continued themselves from three to seven years. All the attempts, and many have been made, to return to triennial elections, have proved abortive. These instances are abundantly sufficient to shew with what jealousy this right ought to be guarded. No sovereign on earth need be afraid to declare his crown elective, while the possessor has the right to regulate the time, manner, and place of election. It is vain to tell us, that the proposed government guarantees to each state a republican form. Republicks are divided into democraticks, and aristocraticks. The establishment of an order of nobles, in whom should reside all the power of the state, would be an aristocratick republick. Such has been for five centuries the government of Venice, in which all the energies of government, as well as of individuals, have been cramped by a distressing jealousy that the rulers have of each other. There is nothing of that generous, manly confidence that we see in the democratick republicks of our own country. It is a government of force, attended with perpetual fear of that force. In Great-Britain, since the lengthening of parliaments, all our accounts agree, that their elections are a continued scene of bribery, riot and tumult; often a scene of murder. These are the consequences of choosing seldom, and for extensive districts. When the term is short, nobody will give an high price for a seat. It is an insufficient answer to these objections to say, that there is no power of government but may sometimes be applied to bad purposes. Such a power is of no value unless it is applied to a bad purpose. It ought always to remain with the people. The framers of our state constitution were so jealous of this right, that they fixed the days for election, meeting and dissolving of the legislature, and of the other officers of government. In the proposed constitution not one of these points is guarded, though more numerous and extensive powers are given them than to any state legislature upon the continent. For Congress is at present possessed of the direction of the national force, and most other national powers, and in addition to them are to be vested with all the powers of the individual states, unrestrained by any declarations of right. If these things are for the security of our constitutional liberty, I trust we shall soon see an attempt to prove that the government by an army will be more friendly to liberty than a system founded in consent, and that five states will make a majority of thirteen. The powers of controuling elections, of creating exclusive companies in trade, of internal legislation and taxations ought, upon no account, to be surrendered. I know it is a common complaint, that Congress want more power. But where is the limitted government that does not want it? Ambition is in a governour what money is to a misar—he can never accumulate enough. But it is as true in politicks as in morals, he that is unfaithful in little, will be unfaithful also in much. He who will not exercise the powers he has, will never properly use more extensive powers. The framing entirely new systems, is a work that requires vast attention; and it is much easier to guard an old one. It is infinitely better to reject one that is unfriendly to liberty, and rest for a while satisfied with a system that is in some measure defective, than to set up a government unfriendly to the rights of states, and to the rights of individuals—one that is undefined in its powers and operations. Such is the government proposed by the federal convention, and such, we trust, you will have the wisdom and firmness to reject.

Gentlemen,

4.6.61 That the new system, proposed for your adoption, is not founded in argument, but in party spirit, is evident from the whole behaviour of that party, who favour it. The following is a short, but genuine specimen of their reasoning. The South-Carolina legislature have established an unequal representation, and will not alter it: therefore Congress should be invested with an unrestrained power to alter the time, manner and place of electing members into that body. Directly the contrary position should have been inferred. An elected assembly made an improper use of their right to controul elections, therefore such a right ought not to be lodged with them. It will be abused in ten instances, for one in which it will serve any valuable purpose. It is said also that the Rhode Island assembly intend to abuse their power in this respect, therefore we should put Congress in a situation to abuse theirs. Surely this is not a kind of reasoning that, in the opinion of any indifferent person, can vindicate the fourth section. Yet we have heard it publickly advanced as being conclusive.

4.6.62 The unlimitted power over trade, domestick as well as foreign, is another power that will more probably be applied to a bad than to a good purpose. That our trade was for the last year much in favour of the commonwealth is agreed by all parties. The freedom that every man, whether his capital is large or small, enjoys, of entering into any branch that pleases him, rouses a spirit of industry and exertion, that is friendly to commerce. It prevents that stagnation of business which generally precedes publick commotions. Nothing ought to be done to restrain this spirit. The unlimitted power over trade, however, is exceedingly apt to injure it.

4.6.63 In most countries of Europe, trade has been confined by exclusive charters. Exclusive companies are, in trade, pretty much like an aristocracy in government, and produce nearly as bad effects. An instance of it we have ourselves experienced. Before the revolution, we carried on no direct trade to India. The goods imported from that country, came to us through the medium of an exclusive company. Our trade in that quarter is now respectable, and we receive several kinds of their goods at about half the former price.—But the evil of such companies does not terminate there. They always, by the greatness of their capital, have an undue influence on the government.

In a republick, we ought to guard, as much as possible, against the predominance of any particular interest. It is the object of government to protect them all. When commerce is left to take its own course, the advantages of every class will be nearly equal.—But when exclusive privileges are given to any class, it will operate to the weakening of some other class connected with them. 4.6.64

To the Massachusetts Convention

Gentlemen,

This appears to be the universal effect of such establishments. A point of such magnitude ought, then, to be particularly guarded. In some respects it is beneficial that a system of commerce should be established by national authority. But if it is found, as it will upon examination, that most governments establish those companies, from occasional and temporal motives, and that they produce ill effects on government and on trade; the power ought in this respect to be restrained. As we are situated at one extreme of the empire, two or three such companies would annihilate the importance of our seaports, by transferring the trade to Philadelphia. With the decay of trade is connected the depreciation of lands and estates for want of a market for the produce. At present our exports are great and our manufactures are every day rising in importance. It seems to be agreed on all sides, that from the port of Boston only the balance was last year as much as an hundred & fifty thousand pounds in favour of the state; a comparison of that and former years is far from proving the distressed state of commerce. Complaints in that respect are about as well founded as in most others. They are made to serve a present purpose, and when that is accomplished, there is no redress for the disappointment of the publick expectation. It becomes us then to consider well of the powers before we surrender them. There is no recovering them when once given. It is vain to flatter ourselves with the idea, that 4.6.65 three quarters of the members of the new government will ever be for restraining their own power. If it was so easy as the federalists pretend to procure an alteration of the system after its adoption, I think, that it is a circumstance not much in its favour. In order to be perfect a constitution should be permanent. The new system sets out with a violation of the compact between the states. While it is in discussion, we ought to consider, that injustice never can be the basis of a good government. I have met with an account of one government uniformly supported by that principle, and I do not wish even my antagonists to become the subjects of that kingdom.

4.6.66 In answer to the favourite remark of the federalists, that what is not given is reserved, it is sufficient to reply, that the framers of the proposed constitution have themselves thought it necessary to make an explicit reservation of the power to grant titles of nobility.[34] Why did they reserve this point, if it would not otherwise have been given up? The conversation of the party is in direct opposition to any design ever to alter the system in favour of the liberties of the people. It is said that a constitution is itself a bill of rights. The fallacy of this position is easily shewn, but the length of this paper makes it necessary to postpone that part of the argument. At present we shall only observe, that a constitution does not necessarily point out any other dependencies than of the parts of the government upon each other, and not those between the government and people. Has Venice no constitution? Yet the people have no share in the government.

XV

29 January 1788[35]

To the Massachusetts Convention.

Gentlemen,

4.6.67 As it is essentially necessary to the happiness of a free people, that the constitution of government should be established in principles of truth, I have endeavoured, in a series of papers, to discuss the proposed form, with that degree of freedom which becomes a faithful citizen of the commonwealth. It must be obvious to the most careless observer, that the friends of the new plan appear to have nothing more in view than to establish it by a popular current, without any regard to the truth of its principles. Propositions, novel, erroneous and dangerous, are boldly advanced to support a system, which does not appear to be founded in, but in every instance to contradict, the experience of mankind. We are told, that a constitution is in itself a bill of rights; that all power not expressly given is reserved; that no powers are given to the new government which are not already vested in the state governments; and that it is for the security of liberty that the persons elected should have the absolute controul over the time, manner and place of election. These, and an hundred other things of the like kind, though they have gained the hasty assent of men, respectable for learning and ability, are false in themselves, and invented merely to serve a present purpose. This will, I trust, clearly appear from the following considerations.

It is common to consider man at first as in a state of nature, separate from all society. The only historical evidence, that the human species ever actually existed in this state, is derived from the book of Gen. There, it is said, that Adam remained a while alone. While the whole species was comprehended in his person was the only instance in which this supposed state of nature really existed. Ever since the completion of the first pair, mankind appear as natural to associate with their own species, as animals of any other kind herd together. Wherever we meet with their settlements, they are found in clans. We are therefore justified in saying, that a state of society is the natural state of man. Wherever we find a settlement of men, we find also some appearance of government. The state of government is therefore as natural to mankind as a state of society. Government and society appear to be co-eval. The most rude and artless form of government is probably the most ancient. This we find to be practised among the Indian tribes in America. With them the whole authority of government is vested in the whole tribe. Individuals depend upon their reputation of valour and wisdom to give them influence. Their government is genuinely democratical. This was probably the first kind of government among mankind, as we meet with no mention of any other kind, till royalty was introduced in the person of Nimrod. Immediately after that time, the Asiatick nations seem to have departed from the simple democracy, which is still retained by their American brethren, and universally adopted the kingly form. We do indeed meet with some vague rumors of an aristocracy in India so late as the time of Alexander the great. But such stories are altogether uncertain and improbable. For in the time of Abraham, who lived about sixteen hundred years before Alexander, all the little nations mentioned in the Mosaick history appear to be governed by kings. It does not appear from any accounts of the Asiatick kingdoms that they have practised at all upon the idea of a limitted monarchy. The whole power of society has been delegated to the kings; and though they may be said to have constitutions of government, because the succession to the crown is limitted by certain rules, yet the people are not benefitted by their constitutions, and enjoy no share of civil liberty. The first attempt to reduce republicanism to a system, appears to be made by Moses when he led the Israelites out of Egypt. This government stood a considerable time, about five centuries, till in a frenzy the people demanded a king, that they might resemble the nations about them. They were dissatisfied with their judges, and instead of changing the administration, they madly changed their constitution. However they might flatter themselves with the idea, that an high spirited people could get the power back again when they pleased; they never did get it back, and they fared like the nations about them. Their kings tyrannized over them for some centuries, till they fell under a foreign yoke. This is the history of that nation. With a change of names, it describes the progress of political changes in other countries. The people are dazzled with the splendour of distant monarchies, and a desire to share their glory induces them to sacrifice their domestick happiness.

4.6.69 From this general view of the state of mankind it appears, that all the power of government originally reside in the body of the people; and that when they appoint certain persons to administer the government, they delegate all the powers of government not expressly reserved. Hence it appears, that a constitution does not in itself imply any more than a declaration of the relation which the different parts of the government bear to each other, but does not in any degree imply security to the rights of individuals. This has been the uniform practice. In all doubtful cases the decision is in favour of the government. It is therefore impertinent to ask by what right government exercises powers not expressly delegated. Mr. Wilson, the great oracle of federalism, acknowledges, in his speech to the Philadelphians, the truth of these remarks, as they respect the state governments, but attempts to set up a distinction between them and the continental government.[36] To any body who will be at the trouble to read the new system, it is evidently in the same situation as the state constitutions now possess. It is a compact among the people for the purposes of government, and not a compact between states. It begins in the name of the people and not of the states.

4.6.70 It has been shown in the course of this paper, that when people institute government, they of course delegate all rights not expressly reserved. In our state constitution the bill of rights consists of thirty articles. It is evident therefore that the new constitution proposes to delegate greater powers than are granted to our own government, sanguine as the person was who denied it. The complaints against the separate governments, even by the friends of the new plan, are not that they have not power enough, but that they are disposed to make a bad use of what power they have. Surely then they reason badly, when they purpose to set up a government possess'd of much more extensive powers than the present, and subject to much smaller checks.

4.6.71 Bills of rights, reserved by authority of the people, are, I believe, peculiar to America. A careful observance of the abuse practised in other countries has had its just effect by inducing our people to guard against them. We find the happiest consequences to flow from it. The separate governments know their powers, their objects, and operations. We are therefore not perpetually tormented with new experiments. For a single instance of abuse among us there are thousands in other countries. On the other hand, the people know their rights, and feel happy in the possession of their freedom, both civil and political. Active industry is the consequence of their security; and within one year the circumstances of the state and of individuals have improved to a degree never before known in this commonwealth. Though our bill of rights does not, perhaps, contain all the cases in which power might be safely reserved, yet it affords a protection to the persons and possessions of individuals not known in any foreign country. In some respects the power of government is a little too confined. In many other countries we find the people resisting their governours for exercising their power in an unaccustomed mode. But for want of a bill of rights the resistance is always by the principles of their government, a rebellion which nothing but success can justify. In our constitution we have aimed at delegating the necessary powers of government and confining their operation to beneficial purposes. At present we appear to have come very near the truth. Let us therefore have wisdom and virtue enough to preserve it inviolate. It is a stale contrivance to get the people into a passion, in order to make them sacrifice their liberty. Repentance always comes, but it comes too late. Let us not flatter ourselves that we shall always have good men to govern us. If we endeavour to be like other nations we shall have more bad men than good ones to exercise extensive powers. That circumstance alone will corrupt them. While they fancy themselves the vicegerants of God, they will resemble him only in power, but will always depart from his wisdom and goodness.

Agrippa.

5 February 1788

To the Massachusetts Convention.

Gentlemen,

In my last address I ascertained, from historical records, the following principles: that, in the original state of government, the whole power resides in the whole body of the nation; that when a people appoint certain persons to govern them, they delegate their whole power; that a constitution is not itself a bill of rights; and that, whatever is the form of government, a bill of rights is essential to the security of the persons and property of the people. It is an idea favourable to the interest of mankind at large, that government is founded in compact. Several instances may be produced of it; but none is more remarkable than our own. In general I have chosen to apply to such facts as are in the reach of my readers. For this purpose I have chiefly confined myself to examples drawn from the history of our own country, 4.6.72 and to the old testament. It is in the power of every reader to verify examples thus substantiated. Even in the remarkable argument on the fourth section, relative to the power over election, I was far from stating the worst of it, as it respects the adverse party. A gentleman, respectable in many points, but more especially for his systematick and perspicuous reasoning in his profession, has repeatedly stated to the Convention among his reasons in favour of that section, that the Rhode-Island assembly have for a considerable time past had a bill lying on their table for altering the manner of elections for representatives in that state.[37] He has stated it with all the zeal of a person who believed his argument to be a good one. But surely a bill lying on a table can never be considered as any more than an intention to pass it, and nobody pretends that it ever actually did pass. It is in strictness only the intention of a part of the assembly, for nobody can aver that it ever will pass.* I write not with an intention to deceive, but that the whole argument may be stated fairly. Much eloquence and ingenuity have been employed in shewing that side of the argument in favour of the proposed constitution; but it ought to be considered that if we accept it upon mere verbal explanations, we shall find ourselves deceived. I appeal to the knowledge of every one, if it does not frequently happen, that a law is interpreted in practice very differently from the intention of the legislature. Hence arises the necessity of acts to amend and explain former acts. This is not an inconvenience in the common and ordinary business of legislation; but is a great one in a constitution. A constitution is a legislative act of the whole people. It is an excellence that it should be permanent, otherwise we are exposed to perpetual insecurity from the fluctuation of government. We should be in the same situation as under absolute government, sometimes exposed to the pressure of greater, and sometimes unprotected by the weaker power in the sovereign.

4.6.73 It is now generally understood, that it is for the security of the people, that the powers of the government should be lodged in different branches. By this means publick business will go on when they all agree, and stop when they disagree. The advantage of checks in government is thus manifested, where the concurrence of different branches is necessary to the same act, but the advantage of a division of business is advantageous in other respects.[39] As in every extensive empire, local laws are necessary to suit the different interests, no single legislature is adequate to the business. All human capacities are limited to a narrow space; and as no individual is capable of practising a great variety of trades, no single legislature is capable of managing all the variety of national and state concerns. Even if a legislature was capable of it, the business of the judicial department must, from the same cause, be slovenly done. Hence arises the necessity of a division of the business into national and local. Each department ought to have all the powers necessary for executing its own business, under such limitations as tend to secure us from any inequality in the operations of government. I know it is often asked against whom in a government by representation is a bill of rights to secure us? I answer, that such a government is indeed a government by ourselves; but as a just government protects all alike, it is necessary that the sober and industrious part of the community should be defended from the rapacity and violence of the vicious and idle. A bill of rights therefore, ought to set forth the purposes for which the compact is made, and serves to secure the minority against the usurpation and tyranny of the majority. It is a just observation of his excellency, doctor Adams in his learned defence of the American constitutions, that unbridled passions produce the same effect whether in a king, nobility, or a mob.[40] The experience of all mankind has proved the prevalence of a disposition to use power wantonly. It is therefore as necessary to defend an individual against the majority in a republick as against the king in a monarchy. Our state constitution has wisely guarded this point. The present confederation has also done it.

*A writer in the Gazette of 29th January, under the signature of Captain McDaniel having with civility and apparent candour, called for an explanation of what was said in one of my former papers, I have chosen to mention him with respect, as the only one of my reviewers who deserves an answer.[38]

I confess that I have yet seen no sufficient reason for not amending the confederation, though I have weighed the argument with candour. I think it would be much easier to amend it than the new constitution. But this is a point on which men of very respectable character differ. There is another point in which nearly all agree, and that is, that the new constitution would be better in many respects if it had been differently framed. Here the question is not so much what the amendments ought to be, as in what manner they shall be made; whether they shall be made as conditions of our accepting the constitution, or whether we shall first accept it, and then try to amend it. I can hardly conceive that it should seriously be made a question. If the first question, whether we will receive it as it stands, be negatived, as it undoubtedly ought to be, while the conviction remains that amendments are necessary; the next question will be, what amendments shall be made? Here permit an individual, who glories in being a citizen of Massachusetts, and who is anxious that the[her?] character may remain undiminished, to propose such articles as appear to him necessary for preserving the rights of the state. He means not to retract any thing with regard to the expediency of amending the old confederation, and rejecting the new one totally; but only to make a proposition which he thinks comprehends the general idea of all parties. If the new constitution means no more than the friends of it acknowledge, they certainly can have no objection to affixing a declaration in favour of the rights of states and of citizens, especially as a majority of the states have not yet voted upon it— 4.6.74

4.6.75 "Resolved, that the constitution lately proposed for the United States be received only upon the following conditions:

"1. Congress shall have no power to alter the time, place or manner of elections, nor any authority over elections, otherwise than by fining such state as shall neglect to send its representatives or senators, a sum not exceeding the expense of supporting its representatives or senators one year.

"2. Congress shall not have the power of regulating the intercourse between the states, nor to levy any direct tax on polls or estates," or any excise.

"3. Congress shall not have power to try causes between a state and citizens of another state, nor between citizens of different states; nor to make any laws relative to the transfer of property between those parties, nor any other matter which shall originate in the body of any state.

"4. It shall be left to every state to make and execute its own laws, except laws impairing contracts, which shall not be made at all.

"5. Congress shall not incorporate any trading companies, nor alienate the territory of any state. And no treaty, ordinance or law of the United States shall be valid for these purposes.

"6. Each state shall have the command of its own militia.

"7. No continental army shall come within the limits of any state, other than garrison to guard the publick stores, without the consent of such states in time of peace.

"8. The president shall be chosen annually and shall serve but one year, and shall be chosen successively from the different states, changing every year.

"9. The judicial department shall be confined to cases in which ambassadours are concerned, to cases depending upon treaties, to offences committed upon the high seas, to the capture of prizes, and to cases in which a foreigner residing in some foreign country shall be a party, and an American state or citizen shall be the other party; provided no suit shall be brought upon a state note.

"10. Every state may emit bills of credit without making them a tender, and may coin money, of silver, gold or copper, according to the continental standard.

"11. No powers shall be exercised by Congress or the president but such as are expressly given by this constitution and not excepted against by this declaration. And any office [officer?] of the United States offending against an individual state shall be held accountable to such state as any other citizen would be.

"12. No officer of Congress shall be free from arrest for debt by authority of the state in which the debt shall be due.

"13. Nothing in this constitution shall deprive a citizen of any state of the benefit of the bill of rights established by the constitution of the state in which he shall reside, and such bills of rights shall be considered as valid in any court of the United States where they shall be pleaded.

"14. In all those causes which are triable before the continental courts, the trial by jury shall be held sacred."

These at present appear to me the most important points to be guarded. I 4.6.76 have mentioned a reservation of excise to the separate states, because it is necessary, that they should have some way to discharge their own debts, and because it is placing them in an humiliating & disgraceful situation to depute them to transact the business of internal government without the means to carry in on. It is necessary also, as a check on the national government, for it has hardly been known that any government having the powers of war, peace, and revenue, has failed to engage in needless and wanton expense.[41] A reservation of this kind is therefore necessary to preserve the importance of the state governments: without this the extremes of the empire will in a very short time sink into the same degradation and contempt with respect to the middle state as Ireland, Scotland, & Wales, are in with regard to England. All the men of genius and wealth will resort to the seat of government, that will be center of revenue, and of business, which the extremes will be drained to supply.

This is not mere vision, it is justified by the whole course of things. We 4.6.77 shall therefore, if we neglect the present opportunity to secure ourselves, only encrease the number of proofs, already too many, that mankind are incapable of enjoying their liberty. I have been the more particular in stating the amendments to be made, because many gentlemen think it would be preferrable to receive the new system with corrections. I have by this means brought the corrections into one view, and shewn several of the principal points in which it is unguarded. As it is agreed, at least professedly, on all sides, that those rights should be guarded, it is among the inferiour questions in what manner it is done, provided it is absolutely and effectually done. For my own part, I am fully of opinion, that it would be best to reject this plan, and pass an explicit resolve, defining the powers of Congress to regulate the intercourse between us and foreign nations, under such restrictions as shall render their regulations equal in all parts of the empire. The impost, if well collected, would be fully equal to the interest of the foreign debt, and the current charges of the national government. It is evidently for our interest that the charges should be as small as possible. It is also for our interest that the western lands should, as fast as possible, be applied to the purpose of paying the home debt. Internal taxation and that fund have already paid two thirds of the whole debt, notwithstanding the embarrassments usual at the end of a war.

We are now rising fast above our difficulties, every thing at home has the 4.6.78 appearance of improvement, government is well established, manufactures increasing rapidly, and trade expanding. Till since the peace we never sent a ship to India, and the present year, it is said, sends above a dozen vessels from this state only, to the countries round the Indian ocean. Vast quantities of our produce are exported to those countries. It has been so much the practice of European nations to farm out this branch of trade, that we ought to be exceedingly jealous of our right. The manufactures of the state probably exceed in value one million pounds, for the last year. Most of the useful and some ornamental fabricks are established. There is great danger of these improvements being injured unless we practice extreme caution at setting out. It will always be for the interest of the southern states to raise a revenue from the more commercial ones. It is said that the consumer pays it; But does not a commercial state consume more foreign goods than a landed one? The people are more crouded, and of consequence the land is less able to support them. We know it is to be a favourite system to raise the money where it is. But the money is to be expended at another place, and is therefore so much withdrawn annually from our stock. This is a single instance of the difference of interest; it would be very easy to produce others. Innumerable are[42] the differences of manners, and these produce differences in the laws. Uniformity in legislation is of no more importance than in religion; Yet the framers of this new constitution did not even think it necessary that the president should believe that there is a God, although they require an oath of him. It would be easy to shew the propriety of a general declaration upon that subject. But this paper is already extended too far.

4.6.79 Another reason which I had in stating the amendments to be made, was to shew how nearly those who are for admitting the system with the necessary alterations, agree with those who are for rejecting this system and amending the confederation. In point of convenience, the confederation amended would be infinitely preferable to the proposed constitution. In amending the former, we know the powers granted, and are subject to no perplexity; but in reforming the latter, the business is excessively intricate, and great part of the checks on Congress are lost. It is to be remembered too, that if you are so far charmed with eloquence, and misled by fair representations and charitable constructions, as to adopt an undefined system, there will be no saying afterwards that you were mistaken, and wish to correct it. It will then be the constitution of our country, and entitled to defence. If Congress should chuse to avail themselves of a popular commotion to continue in being, as the fourth section justifies, and as the British parliament has repeatedly done, the only answer will be, that it is the constitution of our country, and the people chose it. It is therefore necessary to be exceedingly critical. Whatsoever way shall be chosen to secure our rights, the same resolve ought to contain the whole system of amendment. If it is rejected, the resolve should contain the amendations of the old system; and if accepted, it should contain the corrections of the new one.

It may be observed that Agrippa's examples, which follow, support the proposition that a republican government will be energetic enough to suppress sedition, not that it will be exempt from it.

13. This alleged authority, upon which a considerable part of Agrippa's proof of the consolidating tendency of the Constitution depends, is not of course given explicitly in the Constitution. Although Ford (Essays 105) identifies this argument as having been made by Caleb Strong on 16 January 1788, the report of Strong's speech of this day contains no explicit reference to Rhode Island. There is a reference to such an argument in an exchange between Bishop, King, and Gorham; and J. C. Jones argues explicitly that the clause is necessary because "a state may refuse to send to Congress its representatives as Rhode Island has done." Elliot II, 23–24, 28–29. 37. Although Ford (Essays 116) finds no record of this in the Debates of the Massachusetts Convention, both Judge Dan and Rufus King refer to proposals before the Rhode Island legislature to select representatives by corporations rather than numbers. Elliot II, 49–50.

38. The writer had objected to Agrippa's comment that "it was said" that the Rhode Island Assembly intended to abuse its power over election and that therefore "we should put Congress in a situation to abuse theirs." See above XIV, 4.6.61.

Essay by A Federalist

BOSTON GAZETTE
26 November 1787

In rich prose A Federalist inveighs against the Massachusetts advocates of aristocracy and "rigid government"; these—and especially the lawyers among them—are the forces behind the proposed Constitution. He would rather be a free citizen of the small state of Massachusetts than an oppressed subject of a great American empire. A passing allusion to an important Anti-Federalist theme, the need for government to be (in A Federalist's words) "suitable to the GENIUS and HABITS of the citizens of these states," was the object of a penetrating Federalist criticism a few days later.

Mess'rs. Edes',

I am pleased to see a spirit of inquiry burst the band of constraint upon the 4.7.1
subject of the NEW PLAN for consolidating the governments of the United States, as recommended by the late Convention. If it is suitable to the GENIUS and HABITS of the citizens of these states, it will bear the strictest scrutiny.[1] The PEOPLE are the grand inquest who have a RIGHT to judge of its merits. The hideous daemon of Aristocracy has hitherto had so much influence as to bar the channels of investigation, preclude the people from inquiry and extinguish every spark of liberal information of its qualities. At length the luminary of intelligence begins to beam its effulgent rays upon this important production; the deceptive mists cast before the eyes of the people by the delusive machinations of its INTERESTED advocates begins to dissipate, as darkness flies before the burning taper; and I dare venture to predict, that in spite of those mercenary declaimers, the plan will have a candid and complete examination—those furious zealots who are for cramming it down the throats of the people, without allowing them either time or opportunity to scan or weigh it in the balance of their understandings, bear the same marks in their features as those who have been long wishing to erect an aristocracy in THIS COMMONWEALTH—their menacing cry is for a RIGID government, it matters little to them of what kind, provided it answers THAT description—As the plan now offered comes something near their wishes, and is the most consonant to their views of any they can hope for, they come boldly forward and DEMAND its adoption—they brand with infamy every man who is not as determined and zealous in its favour as themselves—they cry aloud the whole must be swallowed or none at all, thinking thereby to preclude any amendment; they are afraid of having it abated of its present RIGID aspect—they have strived to overawe or seduce printers to stifle and obstruct a free discussion, and have endeavoured to hasten it to a decision before the people can duly reflect upon its properties,—in order to deceive them, they incessantly declare that none can discover any defect in the system but bankrupts who wish no government, and officers of the present government who fear to lose a part of their power.—These zealous partizans may injure their own cause, and endanger the public tranquility by impeding a proper inquiry; the people may suspect the WHOLE to be a dangerous plan, from such COVERED and DESIGNING schemes to enforce it upon them: compulsive or treacherous measures to establish any government whatever, will always excite jealousy among a free people: better remain single and alone, than blindly adopt whatever a few individuals shall demand, be they ever so wise; I had rather be a free citizen of the small republic of Massachusetts, than an oppressed subject of the great American empire: let all act understandingly or not at all—If we can confederate upon terms that will secure to us our liberties, it is an object highly desirable, because of its additional security to the whole—if the proposed plan proves such an one, I hope it will be adopted, but if it will endanger our liberties as it stands, let it be amended; in order to which it must and ought to be open to inspection and free inquiry—the inundation of abuse that has been thrown out upon the heads of those who have had any doubts of its universal good qualities, have been so redundant, that it may not be improper to scan the characters of its most strenuous advocates: it will first be allowed that many undesigning citizens may wish its adoption from the best motives, but these are modest and silent, when compared to the greater number, who endeavour to suppress all attempts for investigation; these violent partizans are for having the people gulp down the gilded pill blind-folded, whole, and without any qualification whatever, these consist generally, of the NOBLE order of C[incinnatu]s, holders of public securities, men of great wealth and expectations of public office, B[an]k[er]s and L[aw]y[er]s: these with their train of dependents from the Aristocratick combination—the L[aw]y[e]r in particular, keep up an incessant declamation for its adoption, like greedy gudgeons they long to satiate their voracious stomacks with the golden bait—The numerous tribunals to be erected by the new plan of consolidated empire, will find employment for ten times their present numbers; these are the LOAVES AND FISHES for which they hunger; they will probably find it suited to THEIR HABITS, if not to the HABITS OF the PEOPLE—There may be reasons for having but few of them in the State Convention, lest THEIR 'OWN' INTEREST should be too strongly considered.—The time draws near for the choice of Delegates, I hope my fellow-citizens will look well to the characters of their preference, and remember the Old Patriots of 75; they have never led them astray, nor need they fear to try them on this momentous occasion.

A Federalist.

1. To this another writer, who also took the pseudonym "A Federalist" replied: "I would ask this writer, if civil habits are antecedent, and prior to civil institutions? Would a wise legislator who was about to form a system of government, for a nation, in a state of nature, adapt his plan to the prevailing habits of such a people? No; his object would be, to introduce a code of laws that would induce those habits of civilization and order, which must result from good government. The truth of the case is, that as a people, we are destitute of FEDERAL FEATURES, and HABITS—the several State Constitutions are local, partial, and selfish; they are not calculated in their construction, to form national views; this great object is beyond their limits—and dear bought experience proves that the unbounded sovereignty of the individual governments, is incompatible with a national system.

"For want of those HABITS OF NATIONALITY, we have been brought into our present contemptible and deplorable situation. The proposed Federal Constitution is happily calculated to form us to a national spirit, and to diffuse those generous federal sentiments, without which, we never can be a happy and flourishing people." Boston Gazette 3 December 1787. See the similar criticism by "Convention" of another Massachusetts Anti-Federalist, above, 4.1.1 n. 1. For other discussions of this theme see Federal Farmer III, 2.8.24 n. 19.

Essay by One of the Common People

BOSTON GAZETTE
3 December 1787

This essay is a reply to a good short Federalist piece by One of the Middle-Interest, dealing mainly with the Bill of Rights, published in the Massachusetts Centinel 28 November 1787. One of the Common People contends that the state bills of rights will be no protection against congressional encroachments made possible by the broad and loose constitutional grants of power. In a short time American fundamental law will have become as undefined as the unwritten common law—made worse, indeed, by the different legislative jurisdictions—and Americans will have none but the weak security of the virtue of their legislators. The liberty of the press can easily be abridged by prosecuting for libel against the United States, and the trial by jury in civil cases could and should have been given constitutional protection.

Messieurs Edes,

4.8.1 A Writer in the Centinel who calls himself "One of the middle-interest," has gone into a long inquiry to find out "where we learned the idea of a Bill of Rights."[1] It is of little moment where it was learned, since we are possessed of so important and so invaluable a discovery, to guard the people against the increasing powers of artificial aristocracy, whose seeds are every where disseminated in free states. This writer thinks it would be superfluous to preface or combine with the federal constitution, a bill of rights, because the state constitution is already guarded by one.[2]—If the new plan is adopted, every one knows the state constitution will be very materially and essentially altered; and so far will the security of our rights be precarious and dependent on meer acts of congress, which, without this barrier, may, and by the present tenor of the new constitution, will render our priviledges as undefined as this writer says are those of the subjects of England; which are only to be "collected from meer opinions of the learned and contradictory authors". If we alienate a great part of the powers, at present contained in our state constitution, and vest them in congress, why is it not as necessary that those alienated powers should be secured and limited by a declaration of rights, as that the remaining powers which are left in the hands of the state government should be thus guarded, especially if the greater half are alienated? This writer says, a bill of rights is not necessary, because the first section declares "that all legislative powers herein GIVEN (viz. given in the new constitution) shall be vested in congress;" and then says, "the legislative powers NOT GIVEN are not surely in congress."—But will he say that the powers therein given are clearly and explicitly defined? that the boundary line of the legislative jurisdiction given to congress is so plain as not to be mistaken or abused? that it will never clash with the jurisdiction claimed by the legislature of this state? Is the following clause of such a nature as to have any fixed or definite limits? "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the SUPREME LAW OF THE LAND; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, any thing in the CONSTITUTION or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."—Unless some additional guard is added to define the above clause, here will be a fine field for ambitious or designing men to extend the federal jurisdiction.—In the course of a few years our state legislature will be annihilated, together with our bill of rights, which this writer says is a sufficient security: our rights will then depend on the virtue of the federal legislature; our privileges will then be sought after in a mass of mutilated laws, in volumes of contradictory reports of the learned. When this federal government is established, we shall have two bodies to legislate for us, and unless the powers which each body will have a right to exercise, be clearly defined, we must expect nothing but rival discord and contention, until the federal authority gains the ascendancy, as above predicted; or what may be worse, a revolt from their domination.[3] This writer asks—"Where is the liberty of the press taken away?"[4] If congress have a right to controul it, they may be said to have a right to take it away.—Will not the United States Attorney have the power to prosecute any printer for a pretended libel against the United States? Will not a printer be triable for a pretended libel against any foreign minister or consul, or for a libel against any of the individual states, by a federal tribunal? Are not such prosecutions warranted by the following clause in the new constitution? "all controversies wherein the United States shall be a party, all cases affecting foreign ministers and consuls, and all controversies between a citizen and a state," shall be cognizable before a federal tribunal.—Cannot congress by virtue of this clause, restrain all publick information of mal-administration? And will not congress have absolute uncontrouled power over printers, and every other person within the United States territory, where there will undoubtedly be a great city?

4.8.2 Never was the trial by jury in civil cases thought so lightly of in America as at this day: we have bled for it, and are now almost ready to trifle it away—because in cases of default (which implies a consent of parties) there is no trial by jury, we must give up that inestimable privilege in all civil cases whatever.[5]—This is fine reasoning sure; because we will not have a jury when we do not want them, we shall not when we do—This gentleman cannot be serious when he asserts, that "if it were to be expressed WHAT civil causes should be tried by jury, it might take a volume of laws, instead of an article of rights;" If it did I would have the volume, rather than hazard the priviledge.—But I will ask whether it requires this volume of laws to express that privilege in our state constitution? and whether there would be any difficulty in having it declared, that the citizens of each state shall enjoy it conformably to the usage in the state where the tribunal shall be established? he says, "doubtless congress will make some general regulations in this matter," but it will be well to recollect that they may unmake them, or not make them too, if they please, and when they please; but if it is a part of the constitution, the people alone will have the power to change or annul it.[6]—It is too great a privilege to be left at loose. I sincerely believe if the federal constitution which shall be given, be clearly defined, and a boundary line be marked out, declaratory of the extent of their jurisdiction, of the rights which the state hold unalienable, and the privilege which the citizens thereof can never part with, the republick of America will last for ages, and be free.

1. One of the Middle-Interest, writing in the Massachusetts Centinel for 28 November 1787, argued that the idea of a Bill of Rights arose in and was appropriate to a country where there was no written constitution. "Because their constitution being only to be collected out of the dust of ages, and from the meer opinions of the learned, it was just they should procure their kings to sign and seal, if I may so express it, a plain and express confirmation of those parts of their constitution which former monarchs had denied or violated." For references to Federalist claims that no bill of rights is necessary, see Mason 1.2.21 n. 1.

2. The argument of One of the Middle-Interest is more complex and defensible than appears from this characterization, and it was in fact one of the better Federalist statements on this (for the proponents of the Constitution) very difficult matter. See Brutus II, 2.9.32 n. 23. The author's conclusion is that "we retain all those rights which are prefixed to our state constitution, and which are not expressly given up to the national government; in addition to which we have those other rights which are not in the state constitution, but which are expressed in the federal."

3. See Monroe 5.21.17 n. 8.

4. He goes on: "For if the several state constitutions already protect the liberty of the press, and no legislative power is given to Congress to restrict that liberty; but if on the other hand the republican forms of government are guaranteed to the several states, then surely the liberty of the press is most amply provided for. The first section in the federal constitution already quoted, plainly shews, that Congress have no legislative powers but what are given them by that constitution—they therefore can never restrict the liberty of the press, unless they have some power given them by the constitution so to do, which no where appears." This is the argument made by James Wilson in his Statehouse Speech (McMaster and Stone 143); cf. the citations in Federal Farmer II, 2.8.50 n. 39.

5. One of the Middle Interest makes the standard Federalist argument that the practice of the states is extremely various, agreeing only in not requiring a jury trial for all civil causes. Cf. Federal Farmer II, 2.8.19 n. 16. For other Anti-Federal discussions, see Plebeian 6.11.15 n. 13.

6. "The answer is, that all legislatures must be trusted with something—to suppose they will so form the judicial departments merely to oppress, without a possibility of serving avarice, ambition or any known human motive, is to suppose that men will be so disinterested as to act against their own existence, and from no given cause that can be described." Massachusetts Centinel 28 November 1787. See Smith 6.12.34 n. 32.

Essays by Candidus

(BOSTON) INDEPENDENT CHRONICLE
December 1787–January 1788

The essays of Candidus are ascribed to Samuel Adams or his follower, Benjamin Austin, Jr.[1]

Beginning with a somewhat labored defense of full deliberation and denial of any necessity to accept the Constitution in its entirety, Candidus goes on to list the usual objections (4.9.11). The chief contribution of the essay lies in the author's discussion of the state of American commerce. What is wanted is a union "of commerce and amity" rather than "of legislation and taxation" (4.9.13–16). The whole power of legislation and taxation given to the legislature and the extensive jurisdiction given to the judiciary in the new Constitution are dangerous and unnecessary. The writer ends on a perennial Anti-Federalist and "old republican" theme, warning against the tendency to blame on a lack of energy in government what is really due to dissipation and living beyond the means available; the remedy is to be found, not in governmental reform, but in industry and frugality.

In the second essay Candidus attempts to meet the criticism that the Anti-Federalists propose no alternative to the Constitution by sketching the outlines of a new plan, taken from previous resolutions of Congress, the Articles of Confederation, and the proposed Constitution. The plan provides for congressional power to pass a navigation act, regulate all commerce, and raise revenue by impost. The states would enter into a treaty of amity with one another to pay the existing debt, to maintain peace, to conduct foreign affairs, to establish a supreme court for specified federal purposes (see summary, 4.9.23). Candidus ends with a further discussion of commerce, the importance of a better federal system, and the danger of going too far and surrendering everything to a new government. It would be safer and more effective to confine Congress to the objects of defense and promoting commerce. In the very brief third letter, Candidus defends himself against being "branded as an anti federalist."

1. See Harding, Contest over Ratification 22–23. Harding is mistaken in saying that there were "several articles" by Candidus published in the Chronicle in December; there were two articles in December and one in January. See Charles Warren, Massachusetts Historical Society, Proceedings 64: 147 n. 6, 151, 153.

6 December 1787

Mess'rs. Adams & Nourse,

The Constitution recommended by the Convention, is a subject of the greatest importance, to every individual of these States; and ought to be seriously considered. The respectability of the characters who composed that Assembly, without doubt, will have its due weight; yet it cannot be supposed, that the citizens of America, will so far rely on the abilities of those gentlemen, as to concur in their measures, while any doubts remain on their minds, respecting their salutary operations. 4.9.1

Some leading arguments offered in favour of the Constitution, are, that our situation, is such, as renders it absolutely necessary, we should establish some Federal Plan of Government;—that the present Constitution, is the only one that can ever be adopted; and that if we reject this, the consequences will be fatal to this country. These dreadful apprehensions seem to preclude every candid enquiry on the subject: For if we must comply, without even a lisp of hesitation, it is needless to offer it to the people, for their consideration. If the authors are deified, and their works pronounced infallible, it is delivered to the people, rather for their implicit acquiescence, than for their free deliberations. 4.9.2

It is also said, that the States have no other alternative, than to accept it in every particular, or totally to reject it. These observations, however, I conceive, are mere assertions, without evidence. The people being called on to convene, and deliberate, proves that the Convention themselves, supposed the plan was subject to amendments. Neither can we imagine, those respectable characters, would insinuate an idea so affronting, and degrading, to the Freemen of these States, as that they must submit in the gross, to the Constitution offered, notwithstanding they might have the most weighty reasons to reject some particular parts. 4.9.3

It is further said, that anarchy and civil war, will ensue, provided we reject the proposed Constitution: This is a bugbear, raised to influence a very respectable part of the community. Can it be supposed that the people, are so savage, and void of every principle of common prudence, that they would abandon all their deliberations in Council, and rush immediately to arms? The people of these States, are too wise and considerate, to be guilty of such horrid imprudencies: They are too enlightened to decide their political controversies by the SWORD. Those persons therefore, who raise such vile suggestions, are endeavouring to effect certain purposes, by working on the tender passions of the honest and well-disposed.[1] 4.9.4

Some persons are for adopting the Constitution, without any farther consideration, as they say it is impossible for us to be in a worse situation than at present.[2] Such men are fit subjects to answer any purposes whatever, and 4.9.5

are acting a part which they cannot justify to themselves or posterity. Are not such sentiments degrading to the character of Freemen? It must be a melancholly crisis when the people are tired of guarding their liberties; and are resigned to whatever government is dealt to them. If our commerce is failing, and our industrious citizens are distressed, so far from being dilatory, the more caution is required, to adopt such a plan as will remedy their complaints. Let such persons read the history of other nations, and then judge whether it is impossible that our situation should be worse.

4.9.6 Is it presumed, that the wisdom of this people has so far forsaken them, that they are willing to accede without any examination, to a mode of government, which may affect millions of their posterity? Or is it conceived that the period has arrived when they are ready to resign every pretension to judge for themselves, and dare not scrutinize any establishments on which depend their political happiness and welfare?

4.9.7 On the other hand, if the State Conventions do not approve of every paragraph, must the whole plan become null and void? Shall the people, after being at the trouble of choosing members to meet in Convention; and taxing themselves with the expence of their assembling, be obliged to relinquish the whole business, and throw up every prospect of succeeding in their attempts, to establish a permanent government? These suggestions I conceive are artfully introduced to mislead the people, and are calculated to operate on their fears, so far as to influence them to accede in every particular to the proposed plan, although they might wish to make some very essential alterations.

4.9.8 Is it not the greatest absurdity to suppose, that the plan offered, cannot be amended previous to its adoption,—when it expressly provides for proposing amendments after it has begun to operate? Would it not be the height of folly, to adopt a plan entire, in expectation of altering some very essential parts at a future period? Surely the most prudent method is, to rectify all important matters, while we are assembled to deliberate on the subject, rather than to hazard the chance of feeling evils, when possibly it may be too late to remedy them? These are considerations, worthy our serious attention.

4.9.9 Some zealots are in extacy, when they speak of the present Constitution, and think it as sacred as the Commandments delivered from Sinai. But if we recur to what gave rise to the Convention, we shall not find that any thing super-natural was expected. The plain truth of the case is, these States finding the necessity of adopting a Federal plan to regulate their commerce, promote their agriculture and manufactures, chose from each State a number of respectable characters to meet for the above purposes.—They accordingly met, and after four months deliberation, they matured the plan now offered for our consideration. No man I presume did suppose at the time of their choice, that the devised plan, whatever it might be, was to be rejected or approved in every particular. The principal design at first was, to bring forward some preliminary articles, by which the people might know the general disposition of the States; and from thence they would be able to judge, how far it was probable a Federal system could be adopted. The Constitution now offered is the outlines of a plan, which probably might be agreed on with certain amendments by the whole confederacy. This knowledge of the inclination of the several States, is as much as we could rationally have expected at the first meeting of the Convention.

4.9.10 Those persons who are in such great haste to adopt the present plan, should consider that even the smallest treaties and most common business of legislation require many overtures before they are accomplished. Certainly then so great an undertaking as the Federal Constitution of thirteen Independent Sovereign States, so various in their interests, cannot be compleated without the greatest caution and deliberation. We should not be so greatly impatient if we considered this important truth, that on the wise establishment of a Federal plan, the liberties we have so dearly purchased, wholly depend.

4.9.11 The grand question therefore now is, what objections have we to the system offered? The State Conventions when they assemble, without doubt will keep the original plan, as entire as possible. It is not supposed, that they will object to any matters, but such as they conceive are destructive to the liberties of the people. Provided objections are made, "that a bill of rights is wanted: That the liberty of the press is not fully secured: That the powers of Congress to raise armies, lay impost, excise and direct taxation, are too great and dangerous: That the representation is inadequate: That the executive is vested with too extensive authority, and may tend to despotism: That the Legislatures of the several States would in time be annihilated: That the Congressional body would become independent of their constituents, by being paid out of the public treasury: That the choice of President by a detached body of electors was dangerous and tending to bribery; or if it is conceived that the States ought to confederate for the purposes of commerce and amity, rather than for those of legislation and taxation." If after a mature and candid examination the State Conventions should consider the foregoing objections of the highest importance, without doubt they would propose, that such particulars should be erased, and amendments inserted.

4.9.12 The State Conventions in case any alterations are required, have it in their power to choose delegates to meet again in Continental Convention. The objections (if any) of the several States would then be fully known, and after examining the sentiments of the whole, some plan it is probable would be devised, that would meet the approbation of the confederacy. As the people are now convinced (even more than when the late Convention was chosen) of the necessity of adopting some permanent foederal Constitution.

4.9.13 Many people are sanguine for the Constitution, because they apprehend our commerce will be benefited. I would advise those persons to distinguish between the evils that arise from extraneous causes and our private imprudencies, and those that arise from our government. It does not appear that the embarrassments of our trade will be removed by the adoption of this Constitution. The powers of Europe do not lay any extraordinary duties on our oil, fish or tobacco, because of our government; neither do they discourage our ship building on this account. I would ask what motive would induce Britain to repeal the duties on our oil, or France on our fish, if we should adopt the proposed Constitution? Those nations laid these duties to promote their own fishery, &c. and let us adopt what mode of government we please, they will pursue their own politicks respecting our imports and exports, unless we can check them by some commercial regulations.

4.9.14 But it may be said, that such commercial regulations will take place after we have adopted the Constitution, and that the northern States would then become carriers for the Southern. The great question then is, whether it is necessary in order to obtain these purposes, for every State to give up their whole power of legislation and taxation, and become an unwieldly republick, when it is probable the important object of our commerce could be effected by a uniform navigation act, and giving Congress full power to regulate the whole commerce of the States? This power, Congress have often said was sufficient to answer all their purposes. The circular letter from the Boston merchants and others, was urgent on this subject. Also the navigation act of this State, was adopted upon similar principles, and was declared[3] by our Minister in England, to be the most effectual plan to promote our navigation, provided it had been adopted by the whole confederacy.[4]

4.9.15 But it may be said, this regulation of commerce, without energy to enforce a compliance is quite ideal: coertion with some persons seems the principal object, but I believe we have more to expect from the affections of the people, than from an armed body of men. Provided an uniform commercial system was adopted, and each State felt its agreeable operations, we should have but little occasion to exercise force.[5] But however, as power is thought necessary to raise an army, if required, to carry into effect any foederal measure, I am willing to place it, where it is likely to be used with the utmost caution. This power I am willing to place among the confederated States, to be exercised when two thirds of them in their Legislative capacities shall say the common good requires it. But to trust this power in the hands of a few men delegated for two, four and six years, is complimenting the ambition of human nature too highly, to risque the tranquility of these States on their absolute determination. Certain characters now on the stage, we have reason to venerate, but though this country is now blessed with a Washington, Frnaklin, Hancock and Adams, yet posterity may have reason to rue the day when their political welfare depends on the decision of men who may fill the places of these worthies.

4.9.16 In considering the proposed Constitution, it is very necessary to distinguish what may give an undue influence to a particular profession and what ought to be adopted for national purposes. This party-influence is very evident in the powers vested in the Supreme Judicial. These powers extending "between citizens of different States," also "between citizens of a State, and citizens of foreign States," will I apprehend occasion innumerable judicial controversies; and the people will become exposed to the most expensive law suits; as almost every cause (even those originally between citizens of the same State) may be so contrived as to be carried to this foederal court. A poor man may be harrassed by tedious and expensive appeals to this Supreme Court, or "such inferiour Courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

4.9.17 The question then on this subject is, whether the judicial power ought to extend to any other than national matters. such as "treaties," &c. And whether the Judicial Courts of the several States are not competent, to decide as usual on the controversies of the individuals of the several States?

It is said, that the parties by this establishment, may appeal to a disinterested foederal Court, which will secure to them a fair trial, and an impartial judgment. But this mode of reasoning is calculated to mislead, by a false insinuation, rather than to prevent any evils which at present exist. The equity of our State Judicial Courts, has never been a subject of complaint. Why then should we give up these State trials, and suffer ourselves to be harrassed by a long and expensive appeal to a Continental Supreme Judicial Court? Would not such appeals serve to give every advantage to the rich over the poor? The tradesman, mechanic, and farmer, would by this establishment, be exposed to every imposition from the wealthy; as the former could not spare the time, and defray the expence of prosecuting their legal claims, distant from home. This mode also gives every advantage to British and other foreign creditors to embarrass the American merchant by appeals to this Court.

4.9.18 Upon the whole, we are too apt to charge those misfortunes to the want of energy in our government, which we have brought upon ourselves by dissipation and extravagance; and we are led to flatter ourselves, that the proposed Constitution will restore to us peace and happiness, notwithstanding we should neglect to acquire these blessings by industry and frugality.[6]—I will venture to affirm, that the extravagance of our British importations,—the discouragement of our own manufactures, and the luxurious living of all ranks and degrees, have been the principal cause of all the evils we now experience; and a general reform in these particulars, would have a greater tendency to promote the welfare of these States, than any measures that could be adopted.—No government under heaven could have preserved a people from ruin, or kept their commerce from declining, when they were exhausting their valuable resources in paying for superfluities, and running themselves in debt to foreigners, and to each other for articles of folly and dissipation:—While this is the case, we may contend about forms of government, but no establishment will enrich a people, who wantonly spend beyond their income.

4.9.19 The foregoing observations are intended solely to guard us against the artful suggestions of partizans on either side, and to remove every undue biass, while we are deliberating on this important subject.—I cannot but console myself, that some measures will be adopted by the several States, to promote the great purposes of agriculture, trade and manufactures; and provided the plan now offered should not be wholly accepted, it is presumed the wisdom of the States will not suffer the materials to be thrown away; but will carefully select the choicest, and on the basis of PUBLIC CONFIDENCE establish some foederal system, that will not be dissolved till the consummation of all things.

"Remember, O my Friends, the Laws, the Rights,
The generous plan of Power, deliver'd down
From age, to age, by your renowned forefathers,
So dearly bought, the price of so much Blood!
O! Let them never perish in your hands,
But piously transmit them to your Children."

Addison[7]

4.9.20 In my last, I endeavoured to guard my countrymen, against the artful suggestions of many who say that the proposed Constitution is the only one that can be adopted: that we must receive it without any amendments; and that anarchy and civil war, will be the consequences of rejecting it.—The two former pleas, I contended was derogatory to freemen, and the latter affronting to our understanding.

I need not urge my countrymen, to a serious consideration of the important business before them; presuming that the wisdom and prudence which have ever been the characteristic of Americans, will lead the members of the convention to consider maturely, before they decide on so momentous a question.

4.9.21 Many arguments have been offered to the public, both for, and against the new Constitution; on one side we have the rapturous strains of a Wilson, on the other the nervous reasoning of Brutus:[8]—But the advocates for the Constitution, have always assumed an advantage by saying, that their opposers have never offered any plan as a substitute; the following outlines are therefore submitted, not as originating from an individual, but as copied from former resolutions of Congress, and united with some parts of the Constitution proposed by the respectable Convention. This being the case, I presume it will not be invalidated by the cant term of antifederalism, viz.

1st. That the Legislature of each State, empower Congress to frame a navigation act, to operate uniformly throughout the States; reserving to Congress all necessary powers to regulate our commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes. The revenue arising from the impost to be subject to their appropriations, "to enable them to fulfil their public engagements with foreign creditors."[9] 4.9.22

2d. That the Legislature of each State, instruct their delegates in Congress to frame a treaty of AMITY, for the purposes of discharging each State's proportion of the public debt, and support of the foederal government. To assist each other in cases of insurrections and invasion: and in case any State within the confederacy should be delinquent in discharging their proportion of the public debt, either foreign or domestic, to enforce (if necessary) their immediate payment. Each State obligating themselves in the treaty of amity, to furnish (whenever required by Congress) a proportionate number of the Militia, who are ever to be well organized and disciplined, for the purposes of repelling any invasion; suppressing any insurrection; or reducing any delinquent State within the confederacy, to a compliance with the foederal treaty of commerce and amity.—Such assistance to be furnished by the Supreme Executive of each State, on the application of Congress.—The troops in cases of invasion to be under the command of the Supreme Executive of the State immediately in danger; but in cases of insurrection, and when employ'd against any delinquent State in the confederacy, the troops to be under the command of Congress.

3d. That such States as did not join the confederacy of commerce and amity, should be considered as aliens; and any goods brought from such State into any of the confederated States, together with their vessels, should be subject to heavy extra duties.

4th. The treaty of amity, agreed to by the several States, should expressly declare, that no State (without the consent of Congress) should enter into any treaty, alliances or confederacy, grant letters of marque and reprisal; make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder; expost facto law, impairing the obligations of contracts; engage in war, or declare peace.[10]

5th. A Supreme Judicial Court to be constituted for the following foederal purposes, viz. To extend to all treaties made previous to, or which shall be made under the authority of the confederacy. All cases affecting Ambassadors, and other public Ministers and Consuls; controversies between two or more States; and between citizens of the same State, claiming lands under grants of different States.—To define and punish piracies, and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations.

6th. That it be recommended to Congress, that the said navigation act, and treaty of amity, be sent to the Legislatures (or people) of the several States, for their assenting to, and ratifying the same.—The ratification of nine States, to be sufficient for the establishment of such a navigation act, and treaty of amity, between the States, so ratifying the same.[11]

7th. A regular statement and account of the receipt and expenditures, of all public monies, should be published from time to time.[12]

4.9.23 The above plan it is humbly conceived secures the internal government of the several States, promotes the commerce of the whole union; preserves a due degree of energy; lays restraints on aliens; secures the several States against invasions and insurrections, by a MILITIA, rather than a STANDING ARMY; checks all expost facto laws; cements the States by certain foederal restrictions; confines the judiciary powers to national matters; provides for the public information of receipts and expenditures: in a word, places us in a compleat foederal state.

4.9.24 Every man must be sensible, that a foederal system, is of the utmost importance to our national prosperity.—The deranged situation of our public affairs, now calls on us to adopt such measures as will relieve the distresses of the PEOPLE, and establish upon a permanent basis the COMMERCE of these States.

4.9.25 The encouragement of a beneficial commerce must be acknowledged, to be of the greatest public utility; as the value of our produce and our lands, must either rise or fall in proportion to the prosperous, or adverse state of trade. This essential concern, has ever claimed the particular attention of Congress; their earnest solicitations to vest them with sufficient powers for this purpose, fully evince of what importance they considered this object. Provided their requisitions had been complied with, our trade would probably have been upon a respectable footing,—and foreigners would largely have contributed to the payment of our national debt.

4.9.26 The question now is, what public measures must be adopted to restore our decayed commerce, and give energy to government? These I presume, are the great objects to be considered: And, provided this business is earnestly undertaken, every embarrassment we now experience would subside; our public credit would revive; our government would receive every support; a circulation of currency would ensue; our taxes would be quickly collected; the husbandman, merchant and tradesman, would experience the salutary effects; and public confidence, which has long been wanting among us, would be again restored.

4.9.27 Notwithstanding the many advocates for the adoption of the new Constitution, I cannot but doubt, whether this establishment will remedy our complaints. It is true the government of these States has been for many years in a decline; for want of a federal system, all our measures to promote the public interest have proved abortive. But in order to remedy these evils, shall we now pass to the other extreme; and, from denying Congress every power whatever, wantonly surrender into their hands our Excises, and submit to their direct taxation? with powers to raise armies, &c. &c.

4.9.28 The readiness of the people to adopt the new Constitution, arises in a great degree from the apprehension that no other mode can be adopted: But this is a mistaken idea, as Congress a few years since, pointed out a mode similar to a part of the plan now offered,—which they recommended to the several States for their adoption.

4.9.29 The resolves of Congress, 18th April, 1783, "recommends to the several States, to invest them with powers to levy for the use of the United States, certain duties upon goods, imported from any foreign port, island or plantation;" which measure is declared by them, "To be a system more free, from well founded exceptions, and is better calculated to receive the approbation of the several States, than any other, that the wisdom of Congress could devise; and if adopted, would enable them to fulfil their public engagements with their foreign creditors."[13]

4.9.30 The address of the General Court of this Commonwealth, to the people, 30th October, 1786, fully evinces, that measure much short of the proposed Constitution, would restore these States to the highest degree of harmony and respectability.

They say "Of the national debt, that part which is due to foreigners, must be paid in gold and silver;—if the Continental Impost, should take place, which there is much reason to expect, it would immediately discharge us from the principal of this debt; with respect to the Continental domestic debt, Congress have resolved that the lands ceded to them, by the individual States, shall be disposed of, for the payment of that debt; the particular debt of this Commonwealth, is almost wholly due to its citizens; considerable sums are expected from the sale of lands in the easterly part of this State."[14]

4.9.31 From the above quotations, it does appear, that the Continental Impost, is fully adequate to enable Congress to fulfil their engagements with their foreign Creditors. The lands ceded to Congress, are to be disposed of, for the payment of the Continental domestic debt:* And the particular debt of this State, will probably, (exclusive of the Western territory) be discharged in a great measure, from the sale of the Eastern lands. If then, these three great national objects, can be accomplished, without a total surrender of the Sovereignty of these States, why should each State with such alacrity, reduce themselves to mere corporations,—and submit their Excises, with

*The Continental domestic debt, is £27,000,000; Congress have already sold lands to the amount of £6,000,000, and about £11,000,000 are already collected in the different State Treasuries; so that there remains to be redeemed, not more than £10,000,000.

every other tax, to the unlimited controul of Congress? This conduct in the American annals, may appear as inglorious, as King John's resignation of the Crown, to the Pope's Legate. The magnitude of the surrender is expressed most forcibly by Mr. Wilson, when he says, "Thirteen Sovereign States, some of which, in territorial jurisdiction, population, and resource, equal the most respectable nations of Europe; but likewise myriads of citizens, who in future ages, shall inhabit the vast uncultivated regions of the Continent." Certainly then, the importance of the business before us, ought to "fill our minds with awe and apprehension."[15]

4.9.32 The creditors of the particular States, would become great sufferrers, if the Excises are wholly subject to the use of Congress. The interest of the State debt must remain for many years unpaid; as the necessary arrangements of Congress; the pay of their officers; the great expences naturally attending so extensive a system of government; the parade and pagentry necessary to keep up the etiquette of Dignities; together with the enormous expenditures, within the confines of the Federal town, will call for the greatest part of the money that can be for many years collected.

4.9.33 Provided the Constitution should be adopted in all its parts, the Congressional Body, would have so many important matters to consider, that the most essential object of Commerce might not claim that particular attention, which our present situation requires. The merchant and tradesman, might be waiting with earnest expectations for some commercial regulations, while Congress were busily engaged in framing other systems of legislation.

4.9.34 When we consider the great revenue requisite to support the proposed Constitution, we ought to reflect whether the abilities of the people are proportionate. How can the tradesman, farmer and merchant in the present feeble state of their several occupations, and employments, be able to support the immediate expences of the new Constitution? The demands on them, would be hastily made; and they must be answered, even before any beneficial operations could arise from the establishment; and after those great advances of taxes, it is quite uncertain, whether we should not be disappointed in our expectations, of the revival of our commerce.

4.9.35 But should we adopt the plan proposed by Congress, in their resolves of the 18th April, 1783, (already mentioned) no extraordinary expences would arise, and Congress having but one object to attend, every commercial regulation would be uniformly adopted; the duties of impost and excise, would operate equally throughout the States; our ship-building and carrying trade, would claim their immediate attention. And in consequence thereof, our agriculture, trade and manufactures would revive and flourish. No acts of legislation, independent of this great business, would disaffect one State against the other; but the whole, uniting in one Federal System of commerce, would serve to remove all local attachments, and establish our navigation upon a most extensive basis. The powers of Europe, would be alarmed at our Union, and would fear lest[16] we should retaliate on them by laying restrictions on their trade.

These being the probable consequences of a commercial system, the questions are, Whether it is necesssary, to adopt the Constitution proposed; or whether each State, complying with the request of Congress, together with the other parts of the plan proposed, would not answer every purpose we would wish to effect? If the latter is competent to these purposes, why should we be so urgent to adopt a plan of government, among other defects, destitute of that basis of freedom, A BILL OF RIGHTS; and which exposes every man, within these States, to be drag'd hundreds of miles, to a Federal Judicial Court?* 4.9.36

The Constitution proposed, may aggrandize a few individuals: The offices of honor and profit, may please the AMBITION of some, and relieve the EMBARRASSMENTS of others. It may serve to multiply Judicial controversies, and embarrass the citizens of the several States, by appeals to a Federal Court. It may give an undue influence to Congress, by the appointment of a numerous Body of officers. It may discourage Industry, by promoting an infinite train of dependants and seekers.—But the great object of commerce,—our national respectability,—together with industry and frugality, would probably be the happy consequences of a Commercial Confederation. 4.9.37

These States, by the blessing of Heaven, are now in a very tranquil state.—This government in particular, has produced an instance of ENERGY, in suppressing late Rebellion, &c. which no absolute Monarchy can boast: And, notwithstanding the insinuations of a "small party," who are ever branding the PEOPLE, with the most approbious Epithets; representing them as aiming to level all distinctions; emit paper money; encourage the Rebellion. Yet the present General Court, the voice of that Body, whom they have endeavoured to stigmatize, have steadily pursued measures foreign from the suggestions of such revilers. And the public credit has been constantly appreciating since the present Administration. 4.9.38

Let us then be cautious how we disturb this general harmony. Every exertion is now making, by the people, to discharge their taxes. Industry and frugality prevail. Our commerce is every day encreasing by the enterprize of our Merchants.—And above all, the PEOPLE of the several States are convinced of the necessity of adopting some Federal Commercial Plan. 4.9.39

*Supposing a merchant at the southward, should order his correspondent in Boston, to build him a vessel: The merchant after forwarding his accounts, in case of any dispute, might be carried to the Supreme Judicial Court: the ship-carpenter would be obliged to attend the trial, and probably call'd on, to carry a number of his workmen as witnesses; the expences attending their journey; the delay of the cause; neglect of business—together with numberless intervening charges, would absorb the earnings of a whole year's labour.

May that kind Providence, which has ever conducted America through every changing scene, guide and direct the ensuing Convention, to adopt such measures, as will promote the lasting happiness of these States.

Mess'rs Printers,

4.9.40 It has long been the boast of the Americans, that they are privileged above all other nations, by having it in their power, to adopt a Constitution on the free deliberations of the people.—The attempts therefore, which have been made to destroy this freedom, must be peculiarly disgusting to every man, who sincerely wishes the happiness and welfare of his country.

As a citizen of this Commonwealth, I ventured to offer my sentiments on a subject, which is now before the people, for their consideration. The infamous publications, which have appeared in consequence of my remarks, serve only to expose the insolence of party writers, who are anxious to curb every candid enquiry, lest[17] they should be disappointed in their fancied expectations.[18]

4.9.41 No person within these States, more sincerely wishes the adoption of a federal system; being sensible of the necessity of an efficient Government, to establish our national respectability, and promote our agriculture, manufactures and commerce; but through the violence of party zeal, every man who dares exercise his own judgment, is branded as an antifederalist, tho' his sentiments should wholly correspond with the repeated requisitions of Congress.

4.9.42 This ungenerous method of condemning characters, is contrary to that candour, which actuates the citizens of these states. Freedom of debate in all national questions, has ever been held sacred among a free people; the great subject now submitted to the public, most certainly claims this indulgence, as on its impartial discussion, every thing that is valuable depends.

The adoption of the proposed Constitution, being a concern of such magnitude, we are in duty bound to hear with patience, the observations of our fellow citizens, provided their remarks are delivered with calmness and propriety; this candid disposition towards each other, cannot at this time injure us, but would be the means to unite every man, in embracing a system of Government, which might forever secure the liberties of this Country.

Essay by Cornelius

HAMPSHIRE CHRONICLE
11 and 18 December 1787

The essay by Cornelius was one of the few Massachusetts Anti-Federalist essays of substance originating outside Boston. Samuel Bannister Harding reprints the essay in his study of ratification in Massachusetts; and his evaluation—with perhaps the substitution of an "and" for his "but"—is perfectly just: "it is an able, fair-minded production, showing a considerable degree of political knowledge and independence of thought; but it is tinctured with a democratic jealousy and a distrust of commercial interests which was the characteristic of most of the rural districts of this State."[1] Cornelius begins by pointing out that the Constitution is an entirely new system, inconsistent with the provisions for amending the Articles of Confederation. He provides an excellent statement of the dangers of such a precedent to the stability of law and public and private engagements (4.10.4–5), a persistent Anti-Federalist theme. Proceeding systematically through the main departments of government, he argues that the legislature is given unnecessarily broad powers and is substantially independent of the control and even the knowledge of the people. In the relatively narrow context of the power of the legislators to determine their own pay, he engages in broad reflections on the character of the national representatives, particularly their tendency to yield to the luxurious example of the affluent citizens and foreign representatives, with whom they will come chiefly into contact, and in turn to set such an example themselves and thus to promote luxury and extravagance (4.10.8–9). Discussing the provision for the election of the representatives, Cornelius describes the conflict of interests between the landed and mercantile interests, the greater natural compactness and maneuverability of the latter, and the likelihood of the power of the new government falling into its hands (4.10.11). In the executive, Cornelius finds an elected monarchy which will be the source of dissension among the states (4.10.12); and in the judiciary, numerous and expensive courts to burden the citizens (4.10.13).

Cornelius grants, indeed strongly emphasizes, the need for giving Congress further powers—but insists that in a surfeit of liberty Americans should not swing to the other extreme. He suggests that it will be enough to give Congress the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises (not the impost alone, as many Anti-Federalists suggested) and to regulate commerce. If a presidency like that in the Constitution is indeed necessary, it should be made hereditary and for life to avoid the rivalship and corruption of an elective monarchy. If a federal judiciary is necessary, it should be one with fewer courts and a smaller jurisdiction (4.10.17–18).

Cornelius concludes in a somewhat miscellaneous fashion, pointing to the inequity to Massachusetts of the method of apportioning direct taxes, the tendency of the Constitution to a rule of men rather than of law, and (again) the danger of presidential elections (4.10.19–21).

1. Harding, Contest over Ratification 33.

11 December 1787

Great, and perhaps, just encomiums, are, in the publick prints, and in private circles, daily bestowed on the constitution reported by the late Federal Convention. Not the least objection, that I recollect, has publickly appeared against it. Among those in particular, who are reputed wise and discerning, almost every one seems eager to embrace it. This being the case, it will undoubtedly be considered by many, as discovering a want of modesty in any one, who may presume to express a doubt of the expediency and happy consequences of adopting the constitution. 4.10.1

As truth will bear the light; and by how much the more close examination it undergoes, by so much the more ravishing beauty it will shine; there can be no danger in hinting at some of the objections that arise against this form of government, in the mind of one, who feels for his own safety—who has never learned to see with eyes, other than his own, and who, at the same time, wishes the happiness of his fellow men, so far at least, as that of his own is included. 4.10.2

Power has not commonly been suffered to lie down dormant, and to rust in the hands of its possessors, for want of use. It may well be presumed that men, whether individuals, or publick bodies, will generally exercise as much power as they are legally vested with, and as much to their own private advantage as they have a constitutional right to do.[1]—With this general idea in view, let us attend to the Constitution, and soberly consider some of the consequences that will probably follow, if it should be adopted by the United States. 4.10.3

It may be observed in the first place, that this constitution is not an amendment of the confederation, in the manner therein stipulated; but it is an intire subversion of that solemn compact.—By the 13th article of that compact, the faith of the United States is solemnly plighted to each and every State, that "the articles of this confederation shall be inviolably ob- 4.10.4

served by every State, and the union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them, unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States and be afterwards confirmed by the legislature of every state."

4.10.5 By the 7th article of the constitution, it is ordained, that "the ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same."

Will not the adoption of this constitution in the manner here prescribed, be justly considered as a perfidious violation of that fundamental and solemn compact, by which the United States hold an existence, and claim to be a people? If a nation may so easily discharge itself from obligations to abide by its most solemn[2] and fundamental compacts, may it not, with still greater ease, do the same in matters of less importance? And if nations may set the example, may not particular States, citizens, and subjects, follow? What then will become of publick and private faith? Where is the ground of allegiance that is due to government? Are not the bonds of civil society dissolved?[3] Or is allegiance founded only in power? Has moral obligation no place in civil government? In mutual compacts, can one party be bound while the other is free? Or, can one party disannul such compact, without the consent of the other? If so, constitutions and national compacts are, I conceive, of no avail; and oaths of allegiance must be preposterous things.

4.10.6 By this constitution, the legislative powers are vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives. The latter are to be chosen for two years, and the former for six. It has been a generally received maxim, that frequent and free elections are the greatest security against corruption in government, and the oppression of the people. Have the United States, hitherto, suffered any inconvenience from annual elections? Have their delegates been too often shifted, or too frequently recalled? This, I believe, will not be pretended.

4.10.7 When once the Senators and Representatives are elected, they are under no constitutional check or controul from their constituents, either by instructions, being liable to be recalled, or otherwise. It is not in the power of the citizens or the legislature of any particular State, nor of all the citizens and legislatures of all the States, either to give any legal instructions to a single member of Congress, or to call him to account for any part of his conduct relative to the trust reposed in him. He may be impeached by the House of Representatives, provided he conducts [himself] in a manner that is offensive to them; but he cannot be convicted in any case, without the concurrence of two thirds of the Senators present.

4.10.8 The Congress are to have power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, at their discretion; and out of this revenue, to make themselves such compensation for their services as they may think proper.

Is it altogether certain, that a body of men elected for so long a term,—rendered thus independent, and most of them placed at the distance of some hundreds of miles from their constituents, will pay a more faithful regard to their interest, and set an example of economy, more becoming the circumstances of this country, than they would do, if they were annually elected, subject to some kind of instructions, and liable to be recalled, in case of male administration? Have the several states, in the estimation of the compilers of this Constitution, been hitherto, so parsimonious and unjust in paying their delegates, that they have rendered themselves unfit to contract with their Senators and Representatives, respecting a compensation for their service? If so, what may we suppose will be considered as a just compensation, when this honourable Body shall set their own pay, and be accountable to none but themselves?

(The remainder in our next.)

18 December 1787

(Concluded from our last.)

It will probably be urged, "Our State Legislature set their own pay; and why should not Congress do the same." 4.10.9

If the cases are similar, the reasoning may be good; but there is a wide difference between them. The members of our State legislature are annually elected—they are subject to instructions—they are chosen within small circles—they are sent but a small distance from their respective homes: Their conduct is constantly known to their constituents. They frequently see, and are seen, by the men whose servants they are. While attending the duties of their office, their connexions in general, are with men who have been bred to economy, and whose circumstances require them to live in a frugal style. They are absent from their respective homes but a few days, or weeks, at most. They return, and mix with their neighbours of the lowest rank, see their poverty, and feel their wants.—On the contrary: The members of Congress are to be chosen for a term of years. They are to be subject to no instructions. They are to be chosen within large circles: They will be unknown to a very considerable part of their constituents, and their constituents will be not less unknown to them. They will be far removed, and long detained, from the view of their constituents. Their general conduct will be unknown. Their chief connections will be with men of the first rank in the United States, who have been bred in affluence at least, if not in the excess of luxury. They will have constantly before them the enchanting example of Ambassadors, other publick Ministers, and Consuls from foreign courts, who, both from principles of policy, and private ambition, will live in the most splendid and costly style. Men are naturally enough inclined to vie with each other. Let any body of men whatever be placed, from year to year, in circumstances like these; let them have the unlimitted controul of the property of the United States; and let them feel themselves vested, at the same time, with a constitutional right, out of this property to make themselves such compensation as they may think fit: And then, let any one judge, whether they will long retain the same ideas, and feel themselves under equal restraints as to fixing their own pay, with the members of our state legislature. This part of the Constitution, I conceive to be calculated, not only to enhance the expense of the federal government to a degree that will be truely burdensome; but also, to increase that luxury and extravagance, in general, which threatens the ruin of the United States; and that, to which the Eastern States in particular, are wholly unequal.

4.10.10 By this Federal Constitution, each House is to be the judge, not only of the elections, and returns, but also of the qualifications of its members; and that, without any other rule than such as they themselves may prescribe. This power in Congress, I take to be equal to that of a negative on elections in general. And the freedom of elections being taken away, where is the security or liberty that is reserved to the citizens under this federal government? But as if this were a light thing, and the liberties of the people not sufficiently cramped by their election being thus exposed to a negative, at the pleasure of each House; the Congress are also vested with the power of prescribing, not only the times and manner of holding elections for Senators; but, the times, manner and places of holding elections for Representatives. There is undoubtedly, some interesting and important design in the Congress being, by the Constitution, thus particularly vested with this discretionary power of controuling elections. Will it be urged that, as to such particular times and places for holding elections as may be most convenient for the several States, the Congress will be more competent judges than the citizens themselves, or their respective legislatures? This, surely, will not be pretended. The end then of placing this power in the hands of the Congress, cannot have been, the greater convenience of the citizens who are interested and concerned in those elections. But whatever may have been the design, it is easy to see that a very interesting and important use may be made of this power; and I can conceive of but one reason why it should be vested in the Congress; particularly as it relates to the places of holding elections for Representatives. This power being vested in the Congress, may enable them, from time to time, to throw the elections into such particular parts of the several States where the dispositions of the people shall appear to be the most subservient to the wishes and views of that honourable body; or, where the interests of the major part of the members may be found to lie. Should it so happen (as it probably may) that the major part of the Members of Congress should be elected in, and near the seaport towns; there would, in that case, naturally arise strong inducements for fixing the places for holding elections in such towns, or within their vicinity. This would effectually exclude the distant parts of the several States, and the bulk of the landed interest, from an equal share in that government, in which they are deeply interested.

There is nothing in the Constitution that determines what shall be considered as an election of a Representative. The Representatives are to be chosen by the people; and where there are a number to be chosen, it is, perhaps, not very likely that any one gentleman will have a majority of all the votes. Those who may appear to have the greatest number of votes must, therefore be considered as being elected.—I wish there never might be any competition between the landed and mercantile interests, nor between any different classes of men whatever. Such competitors will, however, exist, so long as occasion and opportunity for it is given, and while human nature remains the same that it ever has been. The citizens in the seaport towns are numerous; they live compact; their interests are one; there is a constant connection and intercourse between them; they can, on any occasion, centre their votes where they please. This is not the case with those who are in the landed interest; they are scattered far and wide; they have but little intercourse and connection with each other. To concert uniform plans for carrying elections of this kind is intirely out of their way. Hence, their votes if given at all, will be no less scattered than are the local situations of the voters themselves. Wherever the seaport towns agree to centre their votes, there will, of course, be the greatest number. A gentleman in the country therefore, who may aspire after a seat in Congress, or who may wish for a post of profit under the federal government, must form his connections, and unite his interest with those towns. Thus, I conceive, a foundation is laid for throwing the whole power of the federal government into the hands of those who are in the mercantile interest; and for the landed, which is the great interest of this country to lie unrepresented, forlorn, and without hope. It grieves me to suggest an idea of this kind: But I believe it to be important, and not the mere phantom of imagination, or the result of an uneasy and restless disposition.[4] I am convinced of the candour and liberal disposition of gentlemen who are now in the seaport towns, and the mercantile interest; and I am fully persuaded, they desire no such undue advantages over their brethren in the country, who are in the landed interest. But, let a man be king over Syria; and he may do things for which he had, before, no disposition. The Constitution is designed for time to come. 4.10.11

The executive power is to be vested in a President of the United States, who is to hold his office during the term of four years, and who is to be commander in chief of the army and navy, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States. He is to receive for his services, at stated times, a compensation which shall not be increased nor diminished during the term for which he is elected. This compensation must, and ought, to be suited to the dignified station in which that officer is placed, which cannot be considered as far below that of an European Monarch. Elective Monarchies, wherever they have obtained, 4.10.12 have generally been attended with the most dreadful consequences. And I am not without fear that venality and corruption may shortly be found among some of the least calamities that will attend those elections. At no very distant period, we may expect the most violent competitions between individual aspiring men, between particular States, and between the Eastern and Southern States.[5] When this shall take place, it will be natural to seek, and easy to find, sufficient pretences for recourse to arms.

4.10.13 The judicial power of the United States is to be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such other Inferior Courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges of both are to hold their offices during good behaviour, and at stated times, to receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.— From the great variety of cases to which this judicial power is to extend, it is apparent these courts must be numerous. And as the judges are, at stated times, to receive from the publick, a compensation for their services, this must add a very considerable sum to the expence of government. Every trifling controversy of twenty shillings, or less, between citizens of different States, must be brought, it seems, before one of these Federal Courts. The great number of publick men that must be supported on the plan of this Constitution, in addition to the governments of the particular States, must lay a burden on the citizens which there is reason to fear, will prove insupportable.

4.10.14 The publick mind, I fear, is at this critical juncture, prepared to do the same that almost every people, who have enjoyed an excessive degree of liberty have done before;—to plunge headlong into the dreadful abyss of Despotick Government.—At the time of forming the Confederation, the publick rage was on the side of liberty. The reigning disposition then was, to secure the highest degrees of liberty to the people, and to guard against every possible instance of oppression in their rulers. The consequence is, want of sufficient energy in government. We have had a surfeit of liberty; and, to many, the very name has now become nauseous.

4.10.15 That the Congress ought to have further powers than those with which they are vested by the Confederation, no reasonable man will deny. That this is absolutely necessary, in order that the United States should continue much longer to exist, with any tolerable degree of reputation, I am fully convinced. But that the Congress, or any other body of men, should be vested with all those independent and unlimitted powers prescribed in the Constitution, appears to me, by no means necessary. Considering the principles by which publick bodies are generally influenced, I am very apprehensive, that if this Constitution is adopted, the remedy proposed will, in no very distant period of time, prove, at least equally distressing with the disease itself. The strength and energy of government does not, I conceive, so much consist in particular men, being vested with unlimitted powers, as it does in a due regulation of the necessary powers with which they are vested, and in effectual provision for the exercise of those powers. It is possible, I believe, for government to be weak in the hands of a Despot, and strong, where considerable degrees of liberty are enjoyed.

We have practiced but a few years on the Confederation; long enough however, to discover its principle defects. The great embarrassments under which we have laboured, are found, I imagine, to have risen from the want of a revenue, and a general regulation of trade. If Congress (continuing in all other respects, to possess the same powers which they do at present) were vested with the further power of laying and collecting taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, and with the exclusive right of regulating Commerce, I believe our federal government would be as firm and happy as might reasonably be expected to fall to the lot of humanity, in this state of imperfection. 4.10.16

If it is indeed necessary that we should have a President, vested with the powers prescribed in the Constitution, I am fully persuaded that rather than that he should be elected in the manner therein described, and for the term limitted, it would be attended with consequences less pernicious, at once, to make the office hereditary, and during life. This would, at least, prevent that rivalship, venality, corruption, and tumult, which may be expected, sooner or later, to attend those elections. 4.10.17

If it is further necessary, that a Judicial Court should be constituted, whose powers shall extend to certain cases of national importance; this, I apprehend, may be done with equal advantage, and less inconvenience, without multiplying those courts in the manner which the Constitution prescribes. 4.10.18

In the case of direct taxation, the rule of apportionment among the several States, I take to be very unequal, and in its operation, will prove exceedingly injurious to the Eastern States. These States, compared with the Southern, have always abounded in people more than in wealth; and from the nature of their climate and soil, will forever continue to do the same. Yet, by this rule of apportionment, a great allowance is made in favour of the Southern States: Three persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, being reckoned equal to five slaves. In the Eastern States there are but few slaves. In Massachusetts, there are none. There are in that State, a large number of negroes; and in apportioning the taxes, three of these negroes are to be reckoned equal to five in the Southern States. 4.10.19

When I consider the independent situation in which the members of Congress are placed,—the sovereign right of controuling elections, which that honourable body are to possess,—the discretionary, and unlimited power, vested in each House, to judge of the qualifications of its members; and that by such rules only as they themselves may prescribe, and alter as they please,—the unbridled temptations that will be constantly before them to aggrandize themselves, their connexions, and friends, at the expense of their constituents, and the unbounded opportunity they will have to do this: I am constrained to believe, that the principles on which the Constitution is 4.10.20 predicated, are such as tend to a government of Men, and not of Laws. And notwithstanding the high encomiums that are bestowed on this form of government, I shall be most disagreeably [agreeably?] disappointed, if it does not prove, in its operation, to be one of the most unequal, arbitrary, oppressive, venal, and corrupt governments that is extant.

4.10.21 I am sensible that the office of President of the United States is, in some respects, different from that of King of Great-Britain; and also, that the powers of the Senate are, in some measure, different from those of the House of Lords: Yet, either the one, or the other, existing in America, might be pernicious to the people. And it may be yet uncertain, whether, in every instance wherein they differ, the difference is in favour of the Federal Government.—In offices that are elective, where the elections are liable to embarrassments, or exposed to venal and corrupt influence, it may admit of some doubt, whether the man of the greatest integrity, or the man of the greatest intrigue, stands the fairest chance for preferment!

4.10.22 Thus I have ventured, with freedom, and I hope, with candour, to express my own ideas on this interesting and important subject. I have no disposition to kindle a flame, nor to excite any groundless fears, in the minds of my fellow citizens. I most ardently wish for an efficient, firm, and permanent system of government; and at the same time, that the people at large may enjoy as much liberty and ease, as may be consistent with such a government.

Essay by Poplicola

BOSTON GAZETTE AND THE COUNTRY JOURNAL
24 December 1787

Replying to a comment made by Thomas McKean in the Pennsylvania ratifying convention that a well-administered despotism is the best form of government, Poplicola elaborates on the Anti-Federalist themes of the danger of relying for good government on the virtue of the rulers and the evils of monarchic and aristocratic governments. The essay appeared on the same day, 24 December 1787, in both the Boston Gazette and the Country Journal and the Boston American Herald; it is taken here from the former.[1]

1. This essay is dated incorrectly by Charles Warren in his article "Elbridge Gerry, James Warren, Mercy Warren and the Ratification of the Federal Constitution in Massachusetts," Massachusetts Historical Society, Proceedings LXIV (1932): 147 n. 6.

Messieurs Edes,

Mr. McKean, says a Philadelphia paper, closed a long speech on the legislative article of the new Constitution with this striking observation: "Though a good system of government is certainly a blessing, yet it is on the administration of the best system, that the freedom, wealth and happiness of the people depend."[1] There is nothing, I confess, so striking to my mind in this observation—A good system of government may be, and too often is, administered by weak and corrupt men; and while this is the case, the people will suffer injury. The fault then will be not in the system, but in the administration; though many persons, when they see public affairs badly managed, are apt to ascribe it to the wrong cause; and hence they wish to change the very nature of a good Constitution; and very frequently change for the worse. The Federalists, as they call themselves (improperly in my humble opinion) seem to be aware that the plan offered by the late Convention will not endure a strict scrutiny; they wish, however, that the people would adopt it in its present form, and depend on a wise administration. But do they think the people of America, after so magnanimous and arduous a conflict for the rights of mankind, will be so improvident as to adopt a form which they may not think safe for themselves, and their posterity, because Mr. McKean thinks, as we find in another part of his speech, that even the 4.11.1

worst government may be so administered as to ensure the dignity and happiness of a nation?[2] I presume they will not—Let us aim at a Federal Constitution, calculated to establish the Federal Union of these sovereign States, and secure the liberties of the people; and having fixed upon such a Constitution, we shall even then have enough to do, if we turn our utmost attention to the means of having it administered well. This would be acting up to the character of citizens of a free sovereign and independent State.

4.11.2 But there is one observation made by that honorable gentleman, in the same speech, which, to me, appears striking indeed, "DESPOTISM, (says he) if wisely administered, is the best form of government ever invented by the ingenuity of man!["] I cannot but wonder that such a sentiment should fall from the lips of Mr. McKean, who is undoubtedly a man of sense and knowledge—In the course of his studies in the law, and from his other reading, I should have thought he would have been led to a different conclusion.—Is Despotism then the offspring of human ingenuity? No. In societies of men, it springs from an intolerably haughty, and imperious temper—an insatiable lust of domination; and from servility and ignorance in multitudes of the human race, who have been flattered and coaxed to give up their unalienable rights of nature, by degrees, till the tyrant has become strong enough to invade the whole, and immerge the deluded multitude in slavery and wretchedness. For my part, I do not believe there is a man on earth, to whom it would be safe for the people to intrust the powers of a despot, whose will must be their law—I would not trust him however mild and gracious his natural temper might be. Nero, was said to be blest with a kind and affectionate heart; but the powers of a despot intoxicated his mind—He soon became wild and unruly, as the most untameable beasts of the forest—Every tender feeling was eradicated from his soul, and he was the butcher of the subjects (not citizens) of Rome in a very few years.—Fatal experience has taught the world, that despotism has proved ruinous to the dignity and happiness of men—Despots have very rarely, if ever, had wisdom, integrity and other essential qualities, to "administer" their governments "wisely;" and they have as seldom had inclination to spend a thought about it. The Supreme Being, indeed, governs the Universe by the council of his own understanding; and if all his creatures are not happy under his government, it is owing to their imperfection, or their fault. He alone is perfectly wise, powerful, and good—He leaves it to the wisdom of men to institute governments for themselves, and it must be owned that the wisest human institutions are imperfect—But it is exceedingly clear, from the government which He prescribed for his favourite people, that despotism was not His choice—They foolishly changed their free government for a monarchy, though they were faithfully warned of the intolerable burdens it would bring them under, which they afterwards felt to their cost without remedy—The pride and madness, not the ingenuity of man, invented DESPOTISM.

I wish Mr. McKean would again recur to the histories of Despotic Governments, and see how many of the tyrants have treated their people with savage and brutal barbarity, to one who govern'd with a tolerable degree of mildness and wisdom: Even under the best of them, their forlorn subjects hold their property, their liberties, and lives, on no better a tenure than their sovereign pleasure—I have seen and experienced so much of the depravity and weakness of the human mind, that I hope these States will never be prevailed upon to relinquish a greater share of their powers, to the Federal Union, than is sufficient to give the government a degree of energy, adequate to the emergencies of the Union; and that while they chearfully do this, they will wisely guard those rights and powers which shall remain, and watch with republican jealousy against the least encroachment on them. 4.11.3

Mr. McKean, after speaking of the Supreme excellency of DESPOTISM, IF wisely administered, mentions absolute and limited monarchies, aristocracies, and mixed governments, and says the people under each of them "are as contented and prosperous as we are, owing, undoubtedly to the wisdom and virtue of their rulers." Absolute monarchies and hereditary aristocracies are much the same, so far as the people whom they govern, are affected. By gazing at the splendor of a monarch, or a nobility, and being well accustomed to military tyranny, they bow to the yoke and bear it as patiently as their brother-oxen—They drag their heavy loads without repining, and will be contented, though they are cruelly whipped for their pains. Whence is this abject submission? From their ignorance.—Slavery renders them incapable, even of thinking—The means of information are kept from them, and they have not the idea that men were designed to be free, and that some communities, alas! how few! actually are free. England is a limited monarchy, and a mixed government—The people of that nation must be allowed, to be very contented; for they have seen their nation governed by a junto—They have seen that junto purchasing parliaments to give a sanction to all their profligate measures—They have seen the junto raising and keeping a standing army in a time of profound peace: That army murdering peaceable and quiet subjects, and the murderers pardoned—And they have seen that junto employing an army and navy for the most dishonorable purpose of slave-making in America, and finally squandering away thirteen of their richest jewels! and after all they have scarcely breath'd a murmer.—God Almighty grant, that these United States may never be ruled by a junto, or if they should be so unfortunate, may they not long rest contented under it! 4.11.4

Poplicola.

1. Poplicola refers to a report in the Pennsylvania Packet, 3 December 1787, of a speech by Thomas McKean in the Pennsylvania ratifying convention on 28 November 1787. The report reads as follows: "On Wednesday [28 November] Mr. M'Kean closed a long speech on the legislative article of the new constitution with this striking observation: 'Though a good system of government is certainly a blessing, yet it is on the administration of the best system that the freedom, wealth and happiness of the people depend. DESPOTISM, if wisely administered, is the best form of government invented by the ingenuity of man, and we find that the people under absolute and limited monarchies, under aristocracies and mixed governments are as contented and as prosperous as we are, owing, undoubtedly, to the wisdom and virtue of their rulers. In short, the best government may be so conducted as to produce misery and disgrace, and the worst so administered as to insure dignity and happiness to a nation.' "

Another version was reported in the Pennsylvania Herald, 26 December 1787: "And after all Mr. President, though a good system is certainly a blessing, yet the wealth, the prosperity, and the freedom of the people, must ultimately depend upon the administration of the best government. The wisdom, probity and patriotism of the rulers, will ever be the criterion of public prosperity; and hence it is, that despotism, if well administered, is the best form of government invented by human ingenuity. We have seen nations prosperous and happy under monarchies, aristocracies, and governments compounded of these, and to what can we ascribe their felicity, but the wise and prudent conduct of those who exercise the powers of government? For experience will demonstrate that the most perfect system may be so perverted as to produce poverty and misery, and the most despotic so executed as to disseminate affluence and happiness among the people." Both of these may be found in McMaster and Stone 280, 282. Essays by Helvidius Priscus

and MASSACHUSETTS GAZETTE
December 1787–February 1788

In a letter to Rufus King on 30 December 1787, Christopher Gore wrote that "S. Adams is out full against it. There is ev'ry reason to conclude him the author of Helvidius Priscus in Adams and Nourse of last Thursday."[1] Charles Warren, on the other hand, contends that the author was General James Warren.[2] It must be admitted that the reader's interest in Helvidius Priscus, stimulated by his having been one of these notable Old Patriots, finds little sustenance in the essays themselves. The author opens with an attack on James Wilson and on the propriety of the conduct of the federal convention. Warning against the loss of liberty threatened by the so-called federal republic, he urges the Old Patriots to come forward and resist this departure from the principles of "the late glorious revolution." The remaining essays are taken up mainly with discussions of personalities, the machinations of the aristocratic faction, and the "gilded trap" they have set. There are two pairs of essays, the first published in the Boston Independent Chronicle, the second in the Massachusetts Gazette.[3]

1. King, Life and Correspondence I, 266–67.
2. Warren, Massachusetts Historical Society, Proceedings 64 (1932): 155–56. Warren's argument is in this instance not especially persuasive. It rests on the fact that a correspondent to the Massachusetts Gazette later said that the same man wrote the Helvidius Priscus and the Republican Federalist series (see 4.13); since James Warren quite clearly wrote the latter, he must have also written the former. The difficulty is that no reason is given for giving greater weight to the testimony of this Massachusetts correspondent than to that of Gore. On James Warren, see 4.13 intro.
3. Warren quotes some of the invective that these essays stimulated in reply. Massachusetts Historical Society, Proceedings 64 (1932): 156.

INDEPENDENT CHRONICLE
27 December 1787

To the Public.

Mr. WILSON observes, in his late celebrated speech, "that after a lapse of 4.12.1

six thousand years, America has now presented the first instance of a people asembled to weigh deliberately, and calmly, and to decide leisurely, and peaceably, on a form of government, by which they shall bind themselves and their posterity."[1] Has he not here suggested the strongest reason that can be urged, for postponing the adoption of the new system? If the assertion is true, is it prudent for this extensive Continent implicitely to accept, and rapidly and irrevocably adopt, the propositions of thirty or forty men, some of whom were infants, when the principles of the late revolution animated the patriots of this country to a noble resistance, and led them to bear the bold arm to shake the sceptre of foreign dominion: And as Mr. WILSON himself observes, "Government is a science as yet in infancy; and with all its various modifications, has been the result of force, fraud or accident."[2] May not these gentlemen be considered as yet in their pupilage, with regard to the origin, the end, and the most perfect mode of civil government? It is also well known, that some of the late Convention were the professed advocates of the British system; that others stood suspended in equilibrio, uncertain on which side to declare, until the scale of fortune balanced in favour of America; that the political manoeuvres of some of them have always sunk in the vortex of private interest, and that the immense wealth of others has set them above all principle. These several classes selected, a correspondent would inquire; how many of the disinterested worthies who ventured every thing for the support of the rights of their country, and the liberties of mankind, will be left to adorn that assembly, who have ambitiously and daringly presumed (without any commission for that purpose) to annihilate the sovereignties of the thirteen United States; to establish a DRACONIAN CODE; and to bind posterity by their secret councils? It may perhaps be replied that one third part of the body were of this generous description. Let us candidly grant it and examine their conduct; several of them left the assembly in disgust before the decision of the question. Others expressly reprobated the proceedings of a conclave, where it has been ridiculously asserted all the wisdom of America was concentered; and a RANDOLPH, MASON, and GERRY, had the firmness to avow their dissent; to support their opinions in the Legislatives of their several States; and submit them to the observation of the world.[3] It is true indeed that the ancient Doctor, who has been always republican in principle and conduct, doubted, trembled, hesitated, wept, and signed: While the illustrious President, not called upon to decide or necessitated to give his opinion, kept the chair, but undoubtedly painfully agitated for the fate of a country he had heroically lent his arm to defend.[4] All the powers of eloquence are exerted to catch the ear; and the utmost pathos of expression employed to warm the imagination, in Mr. WILSON's insidious speech; but as it will doubtless be the subject of critical discussion by those who have leisure to examine both its principles, and its tendency, I will but cursorily observe that he discovers no less dexterity and address, in his oratorical explanation of the system, then he acknowledges was necessary to reconcile the jarring interests that opposed it[5]—and finally to prevail with several whose objections were insurmountable, to lend their signature to an instrument for which he is obliged to ransack the annals of ancient and modern story to find a name. But he acknowledges that neither Rome, nor Britain, nor Switzerland, or Holland, bear much resemblance to the newly fabricated federal republic.—And that he cannot find a precedent any where for the Heterogeneous Monster, unless it may be admitted in the Lycian league of the Amphictionic Council.[6] It is here natural for every one acquainted with ancient history to turn their thoughts to the miserable fate of the Lycians. They were a sober, and virtuous people, who maintained their independence, and their freedom, for several centuries; and supported their own simple institutions, under twenty-three distinct sovereignties; until the reign of Leomitian, when they fell under the Roman yoke, with other cities of Greece, while the tyrant alledged the same excuse for his encroachment, that we hear hacknied in the streets of our capitals, for subjugating the Americans to the arms of power because they were no longer capable of enjoying their liberties. Nor is Mr. Wilson more fortunate in calling our attention to the ruin of the Amphictionic union. Every one will recollect that the Locrians, (a people bearing a strong resemblance to a party in America) had crept in among them, and that an ambitious Phillip had his emisaries in that body, who by political intrigue, and well-timed plausible speeches, enabled him by the aid of a standing army, to set himself at the head of the Grecian States; to annihilate their constitutions, and to degrade them to the most abject submission to the will of a despotic tyrant. The application and the semblance is left for the consideration of every lover of his country.

America has fought for her liberties; she has purchased them by the most 4.12.2
costly sacrifices; she embarked in the enterprize with a spirit that gained her the applauses of mankind; and procured her emancipation from tyranny by the blood of her heroes, and her friends. And shall her honour, her character, her freedom, be sported away by the duplicity, and the intrigues of those, who never participated in her sufferings? Or by the machinations of such as have no pole star for their guide, but the mad ambition of a mind ready to sacrifice the finest feelings of humanity for its gratification? FORBID IT HEAVEN! and may the people awake from a kind of apathy which seems to pervade them, before they are aroused by the thunder of arms, or the insolence of dragooning parties, to arrest from the peasant, and the mechanic, the last farthing of their hard earnings, to support the splendid fabrick of Mr. Wilson's FEDERAL REPUBLIC. What an insiduous term! But this people are too wise to be long deceived by the extortion, or misapplication of words. Let the youth of America, who are yet ignorant of the characters, and the causes that occasioned the dismemberment of the United States from the crown of Britain, read for themselves the many excellent publications, on the origin of government, and the rights of human nature, that appeared between the year 1763 and 1775.—And instead of indulging a raptuous admiration for the modern superficial speechifyers in favour of an American monarchy; let them examine the principles of the late glorious revolution, and see how far they comport with the opinions in vogue.[7] And before they embrace the chains of survitude, let them scrutinize their own hearts, and inquire, if their pride and their independency of spirit, will suffer them to lick the hand of a despotic master. And may the delegates for the ensuing convention consider well the importance of their decision. They will be applauded by the admiring world for making a stand at this critical conjuncture; or they will be execrated by all posterity for co-operating with the ambitious and intriguing spirits, who wish for the sake of their own advancement, to manacle a free and independent people, who have made the most astonishing and successful exertions to support their own rights, and to establish their rank among the nations. And when they shall have time to look around and be convinced, even Mr. Wilson acknowledges, "they will then spurn at every attempt to shackle them with despotic power."[8]

4.12.3 Let them call for the name of the audacious man, who dared to say to his associates, in the late convention, "that unless they hurried the constitution through before the people had time for consideration, there was no probability that it would ever be adopted."[9] And let him be stigmatized with the odium that is due to the base betrayer of the rights of his country, and not absurdly trusted, though he may artfully have obtained an election, to decide a second time on a question in which he is so manifestly interested.

4.12.4 It is obvious that there is not the smallest propriety that any of the members of that body, who have held out a system for the people to judge of, should themselves set in any of the State conventions, and have a voice to enforce their own alarming proceedings.

Let the old Patriots come forward, and instead of secretly wraping up their opinions within their own breasts, let them lift up the voice like a trumpet, and shew this people their folly, and the trembling Columbia, her impending danger. Let none of them fear the arbitrary frown of either Otbo, Galba, or Vitellius, nor the fate of

4.12.5 The three pillars lately erected at the southward, are like the hanging towers of Pisa, to be proped up and cemented by the blood of posterity, if ever they stand at all; for the present generation have too strong a sense of the rights of nature, of the sufferings experienced for their re-establishment, to set down passively under a tottering pile, erected on pillars of porcelain—and if half a dozen others should yet be added to the guilded dome, it will still be astonishingly defective; as the artificers have hurried it through for their own present accommodation, without one solid heart of oak to support an edifice, whose wings extend to embrace the territory from the Mississippi, to the chain of lakes, and from the inland seas to the eastern shore.—An ancient historian has left it on record, that the first monarch after the Achoean league, who gained an entire influence over their councils, was possessed of all the virtues that endear a king.—"A lively genius, an uncommon understanding, an happy memory, an agreeable utterance, an unaffected grace in all his actions—He possessed a beautiful aspect, heightened by a majestic air, which bespoke the greatness of his mind, but his brightest virtues were the sweetness of his temper, his affability and great desire to please and content all who were under his government."—But alas! he was a man—he was a king—and let America be admonished, that in the plenitude of uncontrouled power, the same historian adds, that he so forfeited this great character, and from a glorious king became an inhuman tyrant.[10] Mankind have always been lulled by sounds into a fatal security, without giving themselves the trouble of investigation. Yet it is not probable the metaphisical disquisitions of a southern doctor, will persuade the world that the majority of the late CONVENTION were so much the peculiar favourites of heaven as to receive an immediate inspiration for the model of a government,[11] that should subjugate a country which appears to those who are really religious, and who believe in a providential direction, to have been remarkably under divine protection in the various steps that led to its independence. But why was the small minority (who could not in conscience accede) denied their share in this heavenly illumination?—and why was the aged Dr. Franklin, so darkened in his councils, as to make a motion, that the President should have no sallary? and to oppose almost every article in the system till the last, when he lent his signature in tears? or were those tears the result of a late revelation, that the system was fairly deduced from heaven; though it might involve America, first in anarchy, and then in despotism.[12] But the men who have denied the authenticity of the decalogue, and perhaps the divine origin of the gospel, may sport with the credulity of mankind—and droll on the miraculous interpositions of heaven, under an appearance of an enthusiasm for truth, if it will operate to the completion of a favourite system, while yet the honour of the gentleman is secure from falshood, when he asserts that he believes "the finger of God was as much employed in fabricating the foederal republic as in dictating the ten commandments; and that the divine origin of the new system is as much the object of his faith, as the division of the red sea, or the fulmination of the law from Mount Sina."[13] But as the gentlemen of the medical faculty have not all of them been the most remarkable advocates for divine inspiration; or the most distinguished in vindicating the sacred oracles of religion, we are glad if the learned Dr. Rush is an exception.

4.12.6 If he has really a sober sense of divine dispensation, it is to be regreted that a man of understanding should suffer his language to wear the guize of enthusiastic rant; But if he is one of the fashionable sceptical race, it is not strange when a darling point was to be urged, that he should indulge such epithets of impious affectation to fall from his lip, as shocks the feelings of those who revere the code of the supreme lawgiver. While the Roman usurper was ravaging Gaul, whenever it was convenient for their purposes, his commissioners consulted the Pagan oracles, and when the people were prepared by their love of pleasure, and prostration of principle, to bow to the yoke of servitude, he was pronounced from the lip of the Cybles, the destined master of the world; yet we do not find that Caesar, though Pontifex Maximus or Curio, who was purchased by his gold, had either of them much religion, and when it became necessary for the purposes of the tyrant, a Claudius was found to get a law enacted that no regard should be paid to the denunciations of the augurs. But the augurs who profess a more perfect religion, without pretending to immediate inspiration, will venture to predict, that the characters of the respected minority in the grand convention, and the names of FINDLEY, SMILIE, and others in Pennsylvania, and a much longer list in the Massachusetts, instead of sinking into contempt, will stand distinguished in the annals of fame, for opposing with the magnanimity of genuine patriotism, a combination of ambitious spirits, exorbitant wealth or squandered fortune, of men of licentious principles, and heated imaginations, and of a few of more conscientious opinion, who from the early rudiments of education and manners, have always had a predilection in favour of arbitrary government. But in the exultation of party, let them not again in the convivial hour, toast the memory of the heroes who sacrificed their lives in defence of the liberties of America—least the pale spectres should appear as the evil genius of Brutus, and summon them to the shades, though not to die like the Phillippian Hero, in the last glorious struggle for freedom, but in the ignoble effort to consign posterity to the manacles of slavery.

To the Publick.

4.12.7 The convention of Massachusetts has now met, and on their decision, in a great measure, depends the fate of America. This state has, from the beginning of the contest with Britain, been distinguished for her wisdom in counsel, her zeal in opposition, and her energy in baffling the arts of power, and counteracting the intrigues of foreign and domestick foes, who wished not long ago to deprive her of her rights and to annihilate her as a state. On every trying occasion this state has stood foremost in the union, and done itself honour by its perseverance and independency of spirit—She has once more an opportunity of asserting her own dignity, by rejecting or essentially amending a system, calculated to involve in a servitude, too complicated to be described, till its dreadful effects are experienced, when they may BE FORBIDDEN TO COMPLAIN. But if they have chosen a set of delegates, of sufficient integrity and ability, they may yet be instrumental in saving all America from a THRALDOM, which may be foreseen without the aid of inspiration. But if there should be a temporising, an ignorant, or a designing majority, ready to accede, from fear, from folly, or interest, and bow the neck to the MISHAPEN IDOL, held out for the adoration of the United States, it requires no uncommon sagacity to discover, that their doings will involve this country in blood, render themselves the contempt of the best of their fellow-citizens, and the execration of posterity.

We are told, that only 25 out of 130 members, convened in the three states 4.12.8 of Pennsylvania, New-Jersey, and Delaware, had the wisdom, the firmness, and the patriotism, to reject the adoption of the proffered system of arbitrary government—an humiliating proof this of the local prejudices, the narrow views, and the selfish motives, by which mankind are too generally actuated—If all the wealth of America was to center in Boston, in consequence of its adoption; if Cambridge was to be made the federal city, and the fountain of all honour was circumscribed within the limits of ten miles—If the avaricious citizen, the ambitious courtier, and the ardent youth, from all parts of the continent, who are in quest of honour and emolument, were to repair and do homage for the idol in this favoured city, and to disseminate their wealth in its neighbourhood, no doubt the mechanicks, the macaronies, and the miserly part of Boston, and perhaps a majority in Convention, might think it good policy to adopt a system that would enrich and ennoble their own state—though even then gentlemen in the distant counties would have little reason to precipitate the plan. But view the reverse—Philadelphia is the central city; and a thousand circumstances will combine to sink the population, the wealth, and the consequence of Boston;[14] so that, both in a general and in a local view, we cannot but hope, that in a convention of three or four hundred men, of Massachusetts, a large majority will be found too wise to relinquish their own sovereignty and independence, and too just to violate the present excellent constitution of this state, and break the bands of the sacred compact, which the new arrangement would annihilate, and bring them down to the degraded dependents on a splended monarchy, that will wring from them and their children their last farthing for its support. We have seen much scurrility and abuse indiscriminately cast on all who are not mad enough, with their eyes open, to put a yoke on their necks, which neither themselves nor posterity will be able to break. But we see neither reason, argument, or necessity for this country to renounce their best privileges, because officiously advised thereto by a set of men acting entirely out of the line of their commission. But the Landholder,[15] without veracity—the New-England Damper,[16] without any thing—and a long etcetera of signatures, without principle or perspicuity, will never damp the ardour of liberty, nor check the energy of the able supporters of those genuine principles that mark, with dignity, those who have again stepped forth to defend, in its last struggle, that freedom and independence of spirit, which has made this country the admiration of the philosopher, the hero, and the statesman.

4.12.9 It is not material whether the federal farmer belongs to Virginia or Kamtschatka—whether he owns five hundred negroes, or is a man of no property at all—if his arguments are cogent—his reasonings conclusive—if the consequences of adopting the new system are fairly drawn, and the most certain despotism deduced from the principles of its fabrication, the intricacy and extent of its designs, and the fatal consequences of its operation. Nor is it of consequence to the publick, or to the general cause, whether mr. Lee is an enemy, or a devotee to the fame and to the merit, of general Washington, or whether mr. Gerry refused his signature to the new constitution, in consistance with his former character, from enlarged and distinguished views to the general welfare, or from the pitiful consideration of a few publick securities in his pocket: nor will it alter the deformed visage of this deceptive system to inquire, whether mr. Gorham and mr. King embraced it with ardour from the sublimest feelings of patriotism and publick utility, or with an eye to the rich harvests that may be reaped on the Delaware. We are not contending for the characters of men, nor entering into the private disputes and local prejudices of individuals or of states—We wish to view every thing on the broad scale of independence to America—the sovereignty of the United States, and the freedom of the people, who have a just claim thereto, by the birth-right of nature, and the grant of heaven—sealed with the rich blood of martyrs in her cause.—Every member of the community ought diligently to read and to study the constitution of his country, and teach the rising generation to be free. By knowing their rights, they will soon perceive when they are violated, and be the better prepared to resist and defend them.

To the Inhabitants of Massachusetts.

4.12.10 It has been one of the leading arts of the aristocratick faction, to depreciate the abilities of that part of the convention of the Massachusetts who are opposed to the arbitrary system, which the other supports with the avidity of interest, and the acrimony of contempt for those of less fortune, education, or other factitious advantages than themselves. An impartial observer, who has little personal acquaintance with, nor any undue prejudice against, the one side, or predilection in favour of the other, has read with great attention the speeches of both, on a subject the most important that has yet been discussed in America. He has been willing to discover truth, and ready to pay the tribute of applause wherever it is due, either to the peasant, just called from the field, or to the accomplished citizen, who has spent his life in court; and has faithfully compared the arguments of both, and must acknowledge, that, where he had been led to expect genius, improved by education, oratorical abilities, and profound reasoning, brightened by study and experience, he has been mortified, for the sake of human nature, to find evasion and sophistry; the prostration of the genuine principles of liberty, and the weak subterfuges of party, endeavouring to cast a veil over the design, the meaning and the consequences of a system that does not require the deepest sagacity to penetrate. On the other hand, there seems to be the modesty of benevolence and the boldness of truth, in the short, unadmired speeches which, in the garb of simplicity, utter the native dictates of good sense, uncorrupted by the splendour of wealth, and animated by the feelings of the man who revolts at the idea of relinquishing the privileges of the free-born citizen; and in the more lengthy investigation, a mr. K[ing]sl[e]y appears to have as thorough a knowledge of the subject in debate, and to express his ideas of the police of the old and new system, as well as of the rights we possess, and the privileges we are about to relinquish, as some of the gentlemen of the bar, who claim more attention in the assembly, from their different modes of education. Nor will few deny that Dr. W[i]l[lar]d has discovered as much knowledge of ancient history, that he speaks as clearly on the subject of intrigue, which has been the ruin of republicks, and that he elucidates the consequence of different governments and combinations, at least with as much precision as mr. G[orha]m, without introducing the localities, that occasion a temporary animosity between Connecticut and New-York. The comprehensive view of the subject of taxation, the inconsistency of opinion in those who were lately perhaps over delicate with regard to a general impost, yet are now ready to make the most unequivocal surrender of all their property at the call of a Congress without check or controul—the fatal tendency and the aggregate evils that must be the certain consequence of such an imprudent resignation of the purse and the sword—the anticipated view of the miseries introduced in the venerable garb of ancestorial sanction, and the short survey of the complicated mischiefs with which the whole system is replete, are delineated with a patriotick zeal and energy of expression, and in an unaffected style and manner, that does honour to the abilities, as well as to the heart, of mr. Symms.[17] But a comparative view of abilities or address, of the justice and rationality of one cause, or of the absurdities and consequential confusions of the other, are of little avail—The temporizing expedient may probably be adopted: then may your friends in both countries pity the total debilitation of that energetick spirit that has made you the admiration of the speculative man of science in his closet, and has gained you the alliance of some of the first nations in Europe; while your enemies will justly ridicule your wanton waste of blood for the bubble of liberty, which you have suffered to be blown away by the breath of those who never inhaled the smallest breezes from the temple of freedom; and your oppressors will laugh that the gilded trap has caught the gudgeons in its net. And when the thin vizard that has been cast before your injured opticks shall fall from your lids, you may find the men, who have lured you to the snare, are the least disposed to meliorate your sufferings. But it is said. YOU MUST ACCEPT AND RATIFY THE PROPOSED CONSTITUTION—Then, with your hands tied behind you, and sackcloth on your backs, you may perhaps be permitted to approach the FEDERAL CITY with supplicatory addresses, to mollify the hard conditions of your subjugation; and among other evils you deplore, you may pray that no direct taxes may be assessed, but when the exigences of your masters require it. But you will remember the Caudine Forks cannot be repassed, without bending the neck beneath the yoke of the Samnites; you may then, as the humiliated Romans, in the deepest consternation, look with silent agony on each other, but without discovering a ray of hope in the countenance of the brave, reduced by their own rashness to inextricable wretchedness: Nor will you forget that you have been repeatedly warned of your danger by the friendly pen of

Letters of A Republican Federalist

MASSACHUSETTS CENTINEL
December 1787–February 1788

The essays of A Republican Federalist were probably written by James Warren, Speaker of the Massachusetts House of Representatives and husband of Mercy Warren.[1] James Warren was the son of the royal sheriff of Plymouth County. He was graduated from Harvard in 1745 and, at the death of his father, inherited his public office as well as his profitable mercantile business. Entering the revolutionary movement early, he served several years in the Provincial Congress of Massachusetts. One historian describes him as representing "the stern and uncompromising republicanism of that day."[2] He and Gerry and (until their reconciliation) Samuel Adams disliked and distrusted Hancock as dangerously ambitious, while also opposing the conservative faction headed by James Bowdoin and representing the commercial and professional classes. After ratification Warren became a staunch Jeffersonian democrat.

A Republican Federalist stays mainly on the surface of the debate over the Constitution, concerning himself with the irregularity and the illegality (from several points of view) of the proceedings of the Philadelphia convention, the tendency towards consolidation, and the inadequacy of the representation. His argument is saved from petty legalism by his understanding of the connection between legality and political faith and stability. The first four papers deal mainly with the question of the proceedings of the Convention, the last three with the question of representation, with the theme of consolidation running throughout.

In the first letter (4.13.1–7) the writer urges the need for fundamental discussion, suggests a postponement of the Massachusetts Convention until the sense of Virginia can be known, and argues that the Massachusetts legislature never intended to authorize essential alterations in the Articles of Confederation. Continuing this discussion in his second letter (4.13.8–11), he argues that in proposing the Constitution the Convention usurped power. Moreover, the Constitution has as its object a consolidation of the states, which (the author again emphasizes) the Convention had no power to propose and which should not be accepted merely on the reputation of some of its framers. In the third and fourth essays (4.13.12–19) A Republican Federalist contends that the case would have been less serious if the Convention had not gone on to provide a mode of ratification contrary to that laid down in the Articles of Confederation and in fundamental violation of the Constitution of Massachusetts. He elaborates on the dangers of violating political compacts, concluding that a ratification by Massachusetts would be both illegal and fundamentally destructive of political stability. The new system is both usurpation and tyranny; the Constitution gives up too much power; and the provision for amendment will be nugatory. Given these circumstances, A Republican Federalist suggests in his fifth essay (4.13.20) that the only safe courses are either to adjourn until the sense of Virginia can be known or to return the proceedings to the state legislature to be transmitted to Congress for amendments consistent with the Articles of Confederation.

In the remainder of the fifth and the last two essays, the writer turns to a more particular examination of the Constitution. The extensive powers given to the federal government amount to a giving up of everything to our rulers (V, 4.13.21). The representation of slaves is unfair (V, 4.13.22); and to defend it on the ground that slaves are property only confirms the tendency of the new scheme to produce a property-based aristocracy (V, 4.13.23). The representation is too small, and the danger that it might be further reduced is not sufficiently guarded against (VI, 4.13.25). Precautions regarding elections are provided against the states, where they are not needed, rather than against the federal government, where they are needed (VI, 4.13.26). The provisions for representation are further objected to for the easy access they offer to foreigners and thus to foreign influence in the federal councils (VI, 4.13.26). These remarks are interspersed with reflections on the Federalists and descriptions of the rage of party spirit caused by the Constitution (V, 4.13.21; VI, 4.13.24).

29 December 1787

To the Members of the Convention of Massachusetts.

Honourable Friends, and Fellow Citizens,

You are called on, and will soon convene to conduct a matter of the last importance to your country—the confidence of your constituents in your 4.13.1

abilities and integrity can never be more fully expressed, than by their suffrages on the present occasion—and on your wisdom and firmness is in a great measure suspended, the fate of the United States.

4.13.2 In a free State like this, and under such circumstances, every individual must be anxious at the approach of an event, which will entail happiness or misery, not only on himself, his family, and the community, but also on his and their posterity:—He has therefore a right to address you, and your patriotism will prompt you to consider seriously, whatever shall be offered on the subject with reason and candour, and be worthy of your attention.

4.13.3 Seneca I think has established this maxim, that in all concerns of life, we should enquire, first, what we want, and secondly, how we are to attain it?[1]—Apply these to the present case, and the answers are plain: We want a free, efficient federal government—and can only attain it, by a candid, dispassionate, discussion of the subject. A system of government has been proposed by the federal Convention: Some are for adopting, some for amending, and others for rejecting it: And when it is considered, that a federal government must necessarily be more complicated in its nature, than a simple one, and that to form the latter, the ingenuity of man has never yet been able to establish fixed principles which will apply in all cases, is it a matter of surprize, that in forming a Federal Constitution, even sensible, disinterested men should differ in opinion, and require an investigation of their principles, in order to convince each other, and to correct their mutual errours? Surely not, and the more calm and temperate their discussions are, the greater will be their prospect of success. Some able writers on both sides, have favoured us with their sentiments on the three great questions respecting the adoption, amendment, and rejection of the proposed plan of government, and we are much obliged to them for their diligent researches and ingenious remarks:—Others with little ability and less decency, have continually wounded the feelings of the publick, by railing against every one who has not subscribed their political creed; which if good in itself, would be rendered odious by the persecuting spirit of such ignorant zealots: But let them be informed, that their humour and petulance are not criterions for regulating the judgment of the publick; and that every individual has an equal right with themselves, to attend to the greatest of all earthly concerns, the establishment of good government.—Even the news-papers of Boston, have been thus disgraced. Boston has been famed for the liberality of its citizens, and for their attachment to liberty: And the reputation of so respectable a community should not be tarnished by illiberal productions.

4.13.4 In investigating the subject of the proposed constitution, let us first inquire, upon what ground it stands: Because if it has no foundation, the superstructure must fall.

The Federal Convention was first proposed by the legislature of Virginia, to whom America is much indebted for having taken the lead on the most important occasions.—She first sounded the alarm respecting the intended usurpation and tyranny of Great-Britain, and has now proclaimed the necessity of more power and energy in our federal government: But anxious as that wise State is for the attainment of these great objects, we find her not precipitate in adopting the new constitution. She has allowed herself time to consider the subject, and has deferred the meeting of her convention until May next—Several other States are of the same opinion, amongst which are the respectable States of New-York and Maryland.—Is it not then a matter worthy of your consideration, whether any disadvantage can result, nay, whether the greatest advantages may not accrue from an adjournment of the Convention of Massachusetts, until the sense of Virginia can be known? Too much light cannot be thrown on the subject, neither can a short delay possibly injure us; but an hasty decision may irretrievably ruin us.

In consequence of the measures of Virginia respecting the calling a federal Convention, the legislature of this State on the 21st of February last, Resolved, "That five Commissioners be appointed by the General Court, who, or any three of whom, are hereby impowered to meet such commissioners as are or may be appointed by the legislatures of the other States in the union, at Philadelphia, on the 2d day of May next; and with them to consider the trade and commerce of the United States, and how far an uniform system in their commercial intercourse and regulations may be necessary for their common interest and permanent harmony; and also to consider, how far it may be necessary to alter any of the articles of the present Confederation, so as to render the Constitution of the Federal Government more adequate to the exigencies of the union: And what further powers may be necessary to be vested in Congress for the common welfare and security, and with them to form a report for the purpose—such alterations and additions as may be made, to be however consistent, with the true republican spirit, and genius of the present articles of Confederation. Provided that the said Commissioners on the part of this Commonwealth, are hereby particularly instructed, by no means to interfere with the fifth of the articles of the Confederation, which provides for the annual election of delegates in Congress, with a power reserved to each State, to recal its delegates, or any of them, within the year, and to send others in their stead for the remainder of the year–and which also provides that no person shall be capable of being a delegate for more than three years in any term of six years, or being a delegate, shall be capable of holding any office under the United States, for which he or any other, for his benefit, receives any salary, fees, or emolument of any kind." "The report of the said Commissioners from the several legislatures to be laid before the United States in Congress assembled, to the intent, that if they shall judge it proper, they may recommend the said report or any part of it to the legislatures of the several States for their consideration: And if agreed to by them, that the same may become a part of the Confederation of the United States."[2] 4.13.5

tion of Virginia, but Congress having on the 21st of February, the same day on which this resolution passed, recommended a Federal Convention, our Legislature on the 7th of March last, repealed that, and passed the following resolve—"Whereas Congress did on the 21st day of February 1787, resolve, ['']That in the opinion of Congress, it is expedient that on the second Monday in May next, a Convention of Delegates, who shall have been appointed by the several States, be held at Philadelphia, for the sole and express purpose of revising the articles of Confederation, and reporting to Congress and the several legislatures such alterations and provisions therein, as shall when agreed to in Congress and confirmed by the States; render the Federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of government and the preservation of the union['']—And whereas, the legislature of this Commonwealth did on the 3d day of the present month, elect the Hon. Francis Dana, Elbridge Gerry, Nathaniel Gorham, Rufus King, and Caleb Strong, Esquires, delegates, or any three of them, to attend and represent this Commonwealth at the aforesaid Convention for the sole and express purpose mentioned in the afore recited resolve of Congress, RESOLVED, That his Excellency the Governour be and he hereby is requested to grant to the said Francis Dana," &c. "a commission agreeably to the said resolution of Congress."[3]

4.13.7 The first of these resolves will shew that when the Legislature in February last, agreed to a Convention, the delegates of the State were to report measures not for abolishing but for preserving the articles of Confederation; for amending them; and for increasing their powers consistently with the true republican spirit and genius thereof—that the report was to have been made to Congress and that so much of it only as should be approved by them, and agreed to by the legislatures of the several States, was to become a part of the Confederation—the last of the resolves will shew, that in March last the legislature altered the powers of their delegates and conformed them to the resolve of Congress—that the utmost extent of this resolve, which united the views of Congress and our legislature, was to call a Convention for the sole and express purpose of revising the articles of Confederation, and reporting to Congress and the legislatures, such alterations and provisions therein as shall render the Federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of government, and the preservation of the union—that neither Congress nor the Legislature had the most distant idea of conducting the matter in a mode different from that presented by the Confederation, which provides "that the articles of Confederation shall be inviolably observed by every State, and the union shall be perpetual, nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them, unless such alterations be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislature of every state." That on the other hand, Congress in their resolve, and the legislature in both their resolves before recited, expressly provided, and they would have acted unconstitutionally to have done otherwise, that the alterations and provisions in the articles of Confederation, to have been reported by the Federal Convention, should be agreed to in Congress, and be confirmed by the legislative of the several States before they become part of the Federal Constitution.

A Republican Federalist

II

2 January 1788

To the Members of the Convention of Massachusetts.

Honourable Friends, and Fellow Citizens.

4.13.8 It clearly appeared by the resolutions quoted in my last address, that the utmost extent of the views of Congress, and of the Legislature of this State in calling a Federal Convention, was, that it should revise the articles of Confederation, and report such alterations and provisions therein, as shall render the Federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of government and preservation of the union—that neither Congress or the Legislature had the most distant idea of conducting the matter in a mode different from that prescribed by the Confederation—but that on the other hand, they expressly provided, and would have acted unconstitutionally to have done otherwise, that the proceedings of the Convention, before they become a part of the Federal Constitution, should be agreed to by Congress and confirmed by the Legislatures of the several states.

4.13.9 No one I presume will deny that the powers of the delegates of this state, were as full and extensive as either Congress or any of the Legislatures had authority to give—that the powers of the other delegate[s] were in general, more limited—and that had any of them been more ample than those of Massachusetts, they must have been founded in usurpation and therefore have been null and void. And have the Federal Convention, in pursuance of their powers, reported the alterations and provisions mentioned in the recited resolve of Congress? If they have, let us call on Congress, to inform us, whether they have agreed to the report, and to transmit it when approved, to the Legislature for their consideration: This would be conducting upon constitutional principles, but the call would be vain, there is no such report, and the original design of forming the Convention has not been carried into effect.

4.13.10 The Convention nevertheless have reported a new system, and the object of it is, a consolidation of the union. Mr. Wilson denies this fact, and says "if this was a just objection, it would be strongly against the system:"[4] But unfortunately for that gentleman, his memory appears to be very defective, for he forgot that he has said, in the letter to Congress, signed "George Washington, president, by unanimous order of the Convention"—"In all our deliberations on this subject, we kept steadily in our view, that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American, the consolidation of the union."[5] There the Convention have candidly avowed their intentions, and how Mr. Wilson can reconcile his jarring and contradictory assertions, I am at a loss to determine. The Convention then having kept "steadily in view" "a consolidation of the union," it is incumbent on every one who is zealous for the infallibility of the Convention, and liberal in abusing those who dare to think for themselves, to admit that the proposed plan compleatly embraces the object of consolidation, for otherwise he will call in question the ability of the Convention to execute their design—indeed it must be evident to every one who will attentively read the new system, that it secures to all intents and purposes the consolidation intended. And here permit me to remark on an argument, in favour of the new plan, often urged and drawn from the respectable characters of General Washington and Doctor Franklin: Let those gentlemen have every honour that can be paid them, they are justly entitled to it—but of what consequence is it to the publick, whether the members who assented or dissented to the new plan, were influenced by virtuous and disinterested, or by vicious and selfish motives? If the plan is properly before the States, is good, and will secure to them "peace, liberty and safety" should it not be adopted, were they even sure that every member who subscribed it was in principle a Caligula or a Nero? And if the plan is bad and will entail slavery on the land, ought it not to be rejected should every subscriber excel in wisdom and integrity Lycurgus or Solon. Surely the good or bad effects of the system, depend not on the characters of the original framers, but on the system itself, and on those who may administer it; and no man of candour and discernment will urge characters, as an argument for or against this system, however respectable the characters of any particular members, or of the members in general of the federal convention, may be: They had no other authority to act in this matter, than what was derived from their commissions—when they ceased to act in conformity thereto, they ceased to be a federal convention, and had no more right to propose to the United States the new form of government, than an equal number of other gentlemen, who might voluntarily have assembled for this purpose.[6]—The members of the convention therefore, admitting they have the merit of a work of supererogation, have thereby inferred no kind of obligation on the States to consider, much less to adopt this plan of consolidation. The consolidation of the union! What a question is this, to be taken up and decided by thirty nine gentlemen, who had no publick authority whatever for discussing it!—To be submitted to the people at large, before it has been considered or even agitated by Congress, or any of the Legislatures, and to be transmitted with such precipitation to the States merely "for their assent and ratification?" True it is, that neither Congress or the Legislatures could decide this great question; the first are restrained by the confederation, and the last by the federal and state constitutions—but Congress and the Legislatures, if they thought it necessary, might at any time have considered the subject, expressed their sentiments on it, and recommended to the people an election of State conventions to have taken up the matter. Had this been done the important question would have been previously canvassed; and understood by Congress and the Legislatures; and explained to the people; and the publick opinion would have been thus united in some salutary measure—but as the matter has been conducted, a system of consolidation has been formed with the most profound secrecy, and without the least authority: And has been suddenly and without any previous notice transmitted by the federal convention for ratification—Congress not disposed to give any opinion on the plan, have transmitted it to the legislatures—The legislatures have followed the example, and sent it to the people. The people of this State, unassisted by Congress or their legislature, have not had time to investigate the subject, have referred to the news-papers for information, have been divided by contending writers, and under such circumstances have elected members for the State Convention—and these members are to consider whether they will accept the plan of the federal convention, with ALL its imperfections, and bind the people by a system of government, of the nature and principles of which they have not at present a clearer idea, than they have of the Copernican system.

What are we to expect, from such a mode of proceeding? Are not the 4.13.11 people already thrown into great confusion? Are not heats, animosities, and a party spirit very prevalent and daily increasing? Are the citizens of this State in a proper temper to receive information, either of the ratification, or rejection, of the new Constitution? Is there a probability of its being supported, if so precipitately adopted? Surely it must appear that the plan, although improperly before the State, cannot with safety be rejected—that it cannot as it stands, be safely accepted—that the people will not be satisfied with a ratification, and the delusive prospect of future alterations—and that the only hope that remains of preserving the peace and happiness of this Commonwealth, is from amending the plan in order to its adoption.

The Republican Federalist

III

9 January 1788

To the Members of the Convention of Massachusetts.

Honourable Friends, and Fellow Citizens,

In the preceding numbers it has been shewn, that the original design of 4.13.12 calling the federal convention has not been carried into effect—That they nevertheless reported a system of government with a professed intention of consolidating the union—That they had not the least publick authority to discuss, much less to decide this great question—That neither Congress or the Legislatures have been disposed to express any opinion on the new system—That although they were constitutionally restrained from deciding, yet they had a right at any time, to have agitated and considered the question, to have explained it to the people, and to have recommended their electing State Conventions to have taken up the matter—That had this been done, the people would have had every necessary information, and probably have united in some salutary measure—That they are now without that information, and by the mode of conducting this matter, are thrown into great confusion—That a party spirit prevails, and is daily increasing—That in the present temper of the people, it will not restore peace or tranquility to reject the system, or to ratify it with or without the delusive prospect of future alterations—That if accepted in its present form, there is not a probability of supporting it—and that amendments are indispensibly necessary, in order to its adoption.—These are facts which if any one doubts, will I think, clearly appear when we consider the system itself.

4.13.13 The revolution which separated the United States from Great-Britain, was not more important to the liberties of America, than that which will result from the adoption of the new system. The former freed us from a foreign subjugation, and there is too much reason to apprehend, that the latter will reduce us to a federal domination. Had the Convention thought proper, merely to have formed the plan, and to have sent it to Congress, and the legislatures, the consequences would not have been so serious, as from their accompanying it with the following resolutions.[7]—"Resolved, That the preceeding Constitution be laid before the United States in Congress assembled, and that it is the opinion of this Convention, that it should afterwards be submitted to a Convention of Delegates chosen in each state by the PEOPLE thereof, under the recommendation of its legislature, for their assent and ratification, and that each Convention, assenting to and ratifying the same, should give notice thereof to the United States in Congress assembled." "Resolved, That it is the opinion of the Convention, that as soon as the Conventions of nine States shall have ratified the Constitution, the United States in Congress assembled shall fix a day on which electors should be appointed by the States which shall have ratified the same, and a day on which the electors should assemble to vote for the President, and the time and place for commencing proceedings under this Constitution: That after such publication, the electors should be appointed, and the Senators and Representatives elected: That the electors should meet on the day fixed for the election of the President; and should transmit their votes, certified, signed, sealed and directed, as the Constitution requires, to the secretary of the United States in Congress assembled, that the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned—That the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate, for the sole purpose of receiving, opening and counting the votes for President, and that after he shall be chosen, the Congress together with the President, should without delay, proceed to execute this Constitution." In consequence of these resolutions of the federal convention, Congress "Resolved, That the Constitution so reported be transmitted to the several legislatures, in order to be submitted to a Convention of Delegates, chosen in each State by the people thereof, in conformity to the resolves of the said Convention in that case made and provided"[8]—and in pursuance thereof, the legislature of this State resolved, "That it be, and it is hereby recommended to the people of this Commonwealth, that a Convention of Delegates be chosen agreeably to and for the purposes mentioned in the resolution of Congress aforesaid.["]—It is evident, therefore, that the proposed Constitution is, agreeably to the recommendation of the federal Convention, submitted to the State Convention, that is, to a majority of its members, for their assent and ratification. Should the plan be adopted by this and eight other States, every part of the Constitution of this Commonwealth which is contrary to the new Constitution, to the laws that may be made in pursuance thereof, or to treaties of the United States, will be null and void: for the plan expressly provides, that "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding"—And will not such a subjection of the Constitution of this Commonwealth, not only to the Constitution, but to the laws of the union, and to treaties, that are or may be made under the authority of Congress, be in effect, a DISSOLUTION OF THE GOVERNMENT OF MASSACHUSETTS? Surely it will. Mr. Locke, in his treatise of civil government,[9] chap. 19, in sect. 212, says, "Governments are dissolved from within, when the legislative is altered," and in sect. 215, "for it is not a certain number of men, no, nor their meeting, unless they have also freedom of debating, and leisure of perfecting, what is for the good of the society, wherein the legislative consists: when these are taken away, or altered, so as to deprive the society of the due exercise of this power, the legislative is truly altered; for it is not names that constitute governments, but the use and exercise of those powers that were intended to accompany them." What were the powers originally intended by the people of this State, to be used and exercised by their legislature; they are contained in the Constitution of the Commonwealth, part 2, chap. 1, sect. 1, under the head of "the legislative power," qualified nevertheless by certain reservations in the Bill of Rights. Some of the most important of those powers will, by the new plan, be transferred to the federal government, and others be exercised by their permission. This, I presume, is too evident to be denied, and will hereafter more fully appear. Our government will then have the name that it now has, but not "the use and exercise of those powers that were intended to accompany it." Indeed, it is inconceivable, that a plan of consolidation can be established, without destroying the sovereignty of the respective States, and thus dissolving their present governments.

4.13.14 But supposing the adoption of the new plan would only alter the Constitution of this State, by what mode should that alteration be made? Should it be effected pursuant to the recommendation of a federal Convention, and in direct violation of the Constitution of this State? or should the alteration be made consistently with the Constitution itself? This expressly provides, "That, in order the more effectually to adhere to the principles of the Constitution, and to correct those violations which by any means may be made therein, as well as to form such alterations as from experience shall be found necessary, the General Court, which shall be in the year of our Lord 1795, shall issue precepts to the selectmen of the several towns, and to the assessors of the unincorporated plantations, directing them to convene the qualified voters of their respective towns and plantations for the purpose of collecting their sentiments on the necessity or expediency of revising the Constitution, in order to amendments: And if it shall appear by the returns made, that two thirds of the qualified voters throughout the State, who shall assemble and vote in consequence of the said precepts, are in favour of such revision or amendment, the General Court shall issue precepts, or direct them to be issued, from the secretary's office to the several towns to elect delegates to meet in Convention, for the purpose aforesaid: The said delegates to be chosen in the same manner and proportion as their representatives," &c.[10]—Here we see, that by the Constitution of this State in the year 1795, the sentiments of the qualified voters on the necessity or expediency of revising the Constitution, are to be collected, and if it shall then appear that two thirds of them are in favour of a revision and amendment, in that case only, is a Convention to be called for these purposes. Should it be a question, whether an alteration in the Constitution can be made before the year 1795, there is nothing in the clause recited, that I can conceive to prevent it: because although in the year 1795, precepts must issue for the purposes mentioned, there is no provision to prevent their issuing, if necessary, before that period. But surely, if any alteration should be made in the Constitution, it must be in a mode provided by the Constitution itself, for otherwise the clause recited must become a nullity, which is inadmissible, or, which is the same thing, the Constitution itself must be violated.

4.13.15 Of all compacts, a Constitution or frame of Government, is the most solemn and important, and should be strictly adhered to. The object of it is the preservation of that property, which every individual of the community has, in his life, liberty and estate: Every measure therefore, that only approaches to an infraction of such a covenant, ought to be avoided, because it will injure that sacred regard to the Constitution which should be deeply impressed on the minds of the whole community—How much more careful then should we be to avoid an open violation of such a compact? Such a violation must take place, if a majority, or every member of the Convention, should vote for an acceptance of the new Constitution, because a Convention cannot be called for altering, much less dissolving the government of Massachusetts, before the sentiments of the qualified voters are collected on the necessity or expediency of revising the Constitution in order to amendment, and two thirds of them shall be in favour of the measure. A ratification, therefore, of the new Constitution by the State Convention, cannot be binding on the citizens of this State, being directly repugnant to an existing covenant. But suppose such a ratification should be supported by a majority of the Convention and of the citizens of this State: What must be the consequence of thus destroying all publick faith and confidence? Are not these the principles that bind and cement the community, and that establish them as a body politick? Are they not the foundation of a free Government? If every individual by such a measure, should have his faith and confidence in the honour and integrity of the community effectually destroyed, (and this must inevitably be the consequence) will he not decline entering into such a nugatory compact in future, or entering into it, will he not disregard it as a mere matter of form, and rather than be at any pains or expense to support it, suffer it to share the fate of the other? Certainly he will, and instead of a government founded in compact, we must hereafter be content with one founded in fraud or force.[11]

Republican Federalist

IV

12 January 1788

To the Members of the Convention of Massachusetts.

Honourable Friends, and Fellow Citizens,

Every candid mind will by this time I think be clearly convinced, that if 4.13.16 the constitution of this Commonwealth has any validity, the ratification of a plan that would alter, much less of one that would dissolve the government, cannot be valid, unless by a mode provided by the Constitution itself. There are but two modes, to my knowledge, wherein any alterations can be made: One has been mentioned, and it has been fully shewn that the ratification of the new Constitution by the state Convention would be in direct violation of that mode, and therefore not binding on the citizens of this State.—Let us now consider the other mode. In addition to the political compact contained in the Constitution of this State, it is bound by another as solemn and more extensive, the articles of Confederation. By the first, the "whole people covenants with each citizen, and each citizen with the whole people:" and by the last ["]the whole of the States covenants with each State, and each State with the whole of the States," and the powers in the articles of Confederation, expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled, are paramount to and annul every power of the State Constitution, that is inconsistent with and opposed to them. A mode is provided in the Confederation for amending it, in the words following, "and the articles of this Confederation shall be inviolably observed by every State of the union, shall be perpetual, nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them unless such alterations be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every State."[12] A correspondent provision is made in the fourth article of the Bill of Rights of our State Constitution—(vide Constitution of Massachusetts)[13] the exercise then of every power, jurisdiction and right, which is or may hereafter be by the people thus expressly delegated, is clearly relinquished on their part and will be binding on them. Had the federal Convention reported and Congress agreed to alterations in the articles of Confederation, there could I think have been no doubt, that the ratification of such alterations by the legislatures would have been as binding on the people as if made by themselves, because in the article mentioned of the bill of rights the people have recognized the articles of Confederation, which on the part of the State were ratified, pursuant to their authority: And have expressly provided by those articles, that alterations therein which shall be agreed to by Congress, and confirmed by the legislatures, shall become part thereof: The legislature nevertheless of this State, would probably have applied to the people for their sense on such alterations, before a confirmation thereof, but no one will pretend to say that the federal Convention have reported alterations, or if they had, that Congress have agreed to, or the legislature confirmed them. The federal Convention, have, as has been shewn, reported a system, which destroys the articles of Confederation, and completely embraces the consolidation of the union: They have also recommended, that this new system should be administered, when ratified by nine States, and it must clearly appear, that the ratification of it by the Convention of this State, would not only be a violation of the State Constitution, but also of the articles of Confederation—would thus be a double act of political perfidy—and would not be binding on any State, not even on those which may thus ratify it. Such a measure, therefore, would not only tear up by the roots, and annihilate all confidence in the most sacred and solemn covenants between the whole people and each citizen of this State, but also between the whole of the States and each State, and the new Constitution would not stand on the ground of right, good faith, or publick confidence. Notwithstanding then the good intentions of the federal Convention, it is an unfortunate circumstance that they did not strictly adhere to their powers, because the mode proposed for ratification, as well as the system itself, must produce great convulsions.

Sir William Temple, in treating "of popular discontents," says, "The first safety of Princes and States lies in avoiding all councils or designs of innovation in ancient and established forms, and laws, especially those concerning liberty, property and religion (which are the possessions men will ever have most at heart) and thereby leaving the channel of honour and common justice clear and undisturbed."[14] The new system was not only unauthorized, but altogether unexpected by Congress, the legislature, and the people, is not merely an innovation, but an interchange [entire change?] of the "established form" of government; and will produce as great a change in the laws concerning liberty and property—does not only disturb, and some instances alter but in others destroys the channels of honour and common justice—and so far is the mode of adoption from being constitutional, as that it violates the Constitutions of the States and of the union, and establishes a precedent, not only for annihilating the new Constitution itself, but for building on its ruins a compleat system of despotism—for what will the people have to secure them against an introduction of the most arbitrary government after the banishment of good faith from the United States of America? Is it not incumbent then on the State Convention, to consider seriously and thoroughly, in what a situation they will place this Commonwealth and the union, by the proposed ratification? This State, before it shall have declared in favour of the new system as it stands, may have great influence in promoting an accommodation of this matter, between contending States, and the contending citizens of each State, and having the confidence of all parties, may as a wise mediatrix, promote their common interest: But when the State shall have manifested such a total disregard to the obligations of the most solemn political compacts, as to ratify in the mode proposed, the new Constitution, then will end the confidence of the union, and of our own citizens in the decision of Massachusetts, and she will embark in a precarious bottom, with the gloomy prospect of an approaching tempest, and unnecessarily expose herself to a political shipwreck.—If then, the new Constitution, ratified in its present form and in the mode proposed, will not stand on the ground of right, good faith, or publick confidence, on what ground will it stand? Mr. Lock[e], in his treatise mentioned,[15] chap. 17, sect. 197, says, "as conquest may be called a foreign usurpation, so usurpation is a kind of domestick conquest, with this difference, that an usurper can never have a right on his side, it being no usurpation but when one has got into the possession of what another has a right to." The right of originating a system for consolidating the union, belonged only to the people, but the federal Convention have taken possession of it, when called for a different purpose, and can any one say their proceedings are not founded in usurpation? The same author goes on, "this, so far as it is usurpation, is a change only of persons, but not of the forms and rules of the government: For if the usurper extend his power beyond what of right belonged to the lawful prince, or governour of the Commonwealth, it is tyranny added to usurpation." Had the federal Convention then only exercised the powers of the people in originating a system of consolidation, it would have been nothing more than usurpation; but having changed the forms and rules of delegating powers to the federal government, the Convention have done what the governours or rulers of the Commonwealth had no right to do, and by promoting State Conventions to violate the most solemn compacts, have also done what the people themselves had no right to do, and as the principles and reasonings of the above celebrated writer apply more forcibly to the alteration or formation, than to the administration of government, are not the proceedings of the Convention, founded not only in usurpation, but also in tyranny?

4.13.17 To what purpose then is it, to raise this mighty superstructure, which having no foundation, must soon fall and involve those in it in inevitable ruin—the federal Convention were undoubtedly urged to these measures by conceiving, that their system, if well adapted to the welfare of the people, would nevertheless meet with opposition from some of the States, and be thus defeated: But did not an honest zeal lead the Convention, as it has often led others to a remedy[16] worse than the disease? Should not a proper system have been sent in a constitutional mode to the States, with a presumption that every State would do what was for the good of the whole; and if any of them had withheld their assent from a measure requisite for the general welfare, and thus rendered a separation necessary; should it not have been preceeded by a declaration, stating the reasons and necessity of such a separation? Surely such a dismemberment will require as much solemnity as that which separated us from Great-Britain, and may produce as important consequences.

4.13.18 Many great objections to the new system have been unanswered, and I conceive, if we mean to support our liberties, are unanswerable: Notwithstanding which the State Convention will in all probability be warmly urged to accept the system, and at the same time to propose amendments—this indeed may take in the weak and unwary, but not persons of discernment: For a wise people will never place over themselves an arbitrary government, in expectation that it will be so remarkably virtuous as to divest itself of unreasonable and unlimitted powers. Is not this contrary to human nature, which is generally grasping at more power, not knowing often times that it would be abused as soon as obtained?

4.13.19 The new Constitution provides "that the Congress whenever two thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or on the application of the legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which in either case shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress:"—To call a Convention then, two thirds of both houses of the new Congress must deem it necessary, or the legislatures of two thirds of the several States must make an application to Congress; and can it be doubted that there will not be found such a majority of the new Congress, or of the State legislatures disposed to call a Convention for making amendments? When the Constitution is adopted, will not the friends of it strenuously contend to give it a trial? Are there not numbers who at this time openly reprobate republican governments? And will not such persons raise numberless objections to the appointment of such a Convention, and endeavour to prevent it? But supposing a Convention, should be called, what are we to expect from it, after having ratified the proceedings of the late federal Convention? They will be called to make "amendments," an indefinite term, that may be made to signify any thing. Should judge M'Kean, be of the new Convention, perhaps he will think a system of despotism, an amendment to the present plan,[17] and should the next change be only to a monarchial government, the people may think themselves very happy, for bad as the new system is, it is the best they will ever have should they now adopt it. If therefore, it is the intention of the Convention of this State to preserve republican principles in the federal government, they must accomplish it before, for they never can expect to effect it after a ratification of the new system.

19 January 1788

To the Members of the Convention of Massachusetts.

Honourable Friends, and Fellow Citizens,

The proceedings of the federal Convention, having, as has been shewn, originated in usurpation, and being founded in tyranny, cannot be ratified by the State Convention, without breaking down the barriers of liberty; trampling on the authority of federal and State Constitutions, and annihilating in America, governments founded in compact. In this predicament, there appears but two measures which can with safety be adopted by the Convention of this State. One has been hinted at, an adjournment, until the sense of Virginia can be known. The great danger in this business is, from precipitation, not from delay: The latter cannot injure whilst the former may irretrievably ruin us; an adjournment would not only ripen the judgment of our own citizens, but give them an opportunity of benefiting by the opinions of those States, which are attentive to, but not extravagantly zealous in this matter. The other measure is, to return the proceedings of the federal Convention to the legislature of this State, to be by them transmitted to Con- 4.13.20

gress, and amended agreeably to the articles of Confederation: For the system being improperly before the State Convention, and they being incompetent to a ratification of it, cannot thereby bind the citizens of Massachusetts. Had the system been in itself unobjectionable, it is evident from what has been said, that the sentiments of the qualified voters on the necessity of revision, must have been taken, and two thirds of them must have been in favour of it, before a State Convention could be called for amending the Constitution much more for dissolving the government.

4.13.21 Let us once more particularly attend to the system itself. It begins, "We the People of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union," &c. "do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America"—In other words, We the people, do hereby publickly declare the violation of the faith which we have solemnly pledged to each other—do give the most unequivocal evidence, that we cannot ourselves, neither can any others, place the least confidence in our most solemn covenants, do effectually put an end in America, to governments founded in compact—do relinquish that security for life, liberty and property, which we had in the Constitutions of these States, and of the Union—do give up governments which we well understood, for a new system which we have no idea of—and we do, by this act of ratification and political suicide, destroy the new system itself, and prepare the way for a despotism, if agreeable to our rulers. All this we do, for the honour of having a system of consolidation formed by us the people. This is not magnifying, for such are the facts, and such will be the consequences. Indeed we find despotism not only in contemplation of the Pennsylvanians, but openly avowed in their State Convention, in the words following—"DESPOTISM, if wisely administered, is the best system invented by the ingenuity of man." This was declared by chief justice M'Kean;[18] and in such an high office, we must suppose him a man of too much precaution to have made the declaration, had he not known, that a majority of the Convention, and of the citizens, who so highly applauded his speeches, were of his opinion. M. Montesquieu, in his "Spirit of Laws," 1st vol. book 3, chap. 9, says, "As virtue is necessary in a republick, and honour in a monarchy, so fear is necessary in a despotick government: With regard to virtue, there is no occasion for it, and honour would be extremely dangerous." Thus has a declaration been made in Pennsylvania, in favour of a government which substitutes fear for virtue, and reduces men from rational beings to the level of brutes; and if the citizens of Massachusetts are disposed to follow the example, and submit their necks to the yoke, they must expect to be governed by the whip and goad. But it is remarkable, that the resolution of the federal Convention, for transmitting the system to the people, provided, "that the Constitution should be laid before the United States in Congress assembled, and afterwards submitted to a Convention of Delegates, chosen in each State by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its legislature; thus making Congress and the legislatures, vehicles of conveyance, but precluding them from passing their judgments on the system. Had it been submitted to their consideration, their members were men of such discernment, that the defects as well as excellencies of the plan, would have been clearly explained to the people; but immediately on the publication of it, we find measures were taken to prejudice the people against all persons in the legislative, executive and judicial departments of the States and Confederacy (if opposed to the plan) as being actuated by motives of private interest. Mr. Wilson, a member of the federal and Pennsylvanian Convention, in his town meeting speech, adopted this practice, which, to say the least of it, was very illiberal.[19] Indeed, it is but justice to observe, that many artful advocates of this plan, to cover their designs of creating a government which will afford abundance of legislative offices for placemen and pensioners, proclaimed suspicions of others, and diverted the attention of the people from themselves, on whom the odium should fall.

Let us now proceed to the provision in the system for a representation of 4.13.22
the people, which is the corner stone of a free government. The Constitution provides, art. 1st, sect. 2, "that representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States, which may be included within this union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons." Representatives then are to be "apportioned among the several States, according to their respective numbers," and five slaves, in computing those numbers, are to be classed with three freemen—By which rule, fifty thousand slaves, having neither liberty or property, will have a representative in that branch of the legislature—to which more especially will be committed, the protection of the liberties, and disposal of all the property of the freemen of the Union—for thus stands the new Constitution. Should it be said, that not the slaves but their masters are to send a representative, the answer is plain—If the slaves have a right to be represented, they are on a footing with freemen, three of whom can then have no more than an equal right of representation with three slaves, and these when qualified by property, may elect or be elected representatives, which is not the case: But if they have not a right to be represented, their masters can have no right derived from their slaves, for these cannot transfer to others what they have not themselves. Mr. Locke, in treating of political or civil societies,[20] chap. 7, sect. 85, says, that men "being in the state of slavery, not capable of any property, cannot, in that state, be considered as any part of civil society, the chief end whereof, is the preservation of property." If slaves, then, are no part of civil society, there can be no more reason in admitting them, than there would be in admitting the beasts of the field, or trees of the forest, to be classed with free electors. What covenant are the freemen of Massachusetts about to ratify? A covenant that will degrade them to the level of slaves, and give to the States who have as many blacks as whites, eight representatives, for the same number of freemen as will enable this State to elect five—Is this an equal, a safe, or a righteous plan of government? Indeed it is not. But if to encrease these objections, it should be urged, "that representation being regulated by the same rule as taxation, and taxation being regulated by a rule intended to ascertain the relative property of the States, representation will then be regulated by the principle of property."[21] This answer would be the only one that could be made, for representation, according to the new Constitution is to be regulated, either by numbers or property.

4.13.23 Let us now inquire of those who take this ground, what right they have to put a construction on the constitution, which is repugnant to the express terms of the Constitution itself? This provides, "that representatives shall be apportioned among the several States, according to their respective numbers." Not a word of property is mentioned, but the word "numbers" is repeatedly expressed—Admitting however that property was intended by the Constitution as the rule of representation, does this mend the matter? it will be but a short time, after the adoption of the new Constitution, before the State legislatures, and establishments in general will be so burthensome and useless as to make the people desirous of being rid of them, for they will not be able to support them. The State appointment of Representatives will then cease, but the principle of representation according to property, will undoubtedly be retained, and before it is established it is necessary to consider whether it is a just one, for if once it is adopted it will not be easily altered.—According to this principle, a man worth £50.000, is to have as many votes for representatives in the new Congress, as one thousand men, worth £50 each: And sixty such nabobs may send two representatives, while sixty thousand freemen having £50 each can only send the same number. Does not this establish in the representative branch of the new Congress, a principle of aristocracy, with a vengeance? The Constitution[s] of the several States, admit of no such principle, neither can any freeman with safety thus surrender, not only the intire disposition of their property, but also, the controul of their liberties and lives to a few opulent citizens. Should it be said that the rule of federal taxation, being advantageous to the State, it should be content with the same rule for representation. The answer is plain, the rule gives no advantage, but is supposed to be advantageous to Massachusetts, and to be an accommodation very beneficial to the southern States: But admiting this State will be benefited by the rule, is it disposed to sell its birthright, the right of an equal representation in the federal councils for so small a consideration? Would this State give up that right to any State that would pay our whole proportion of direct and indirect taxes? Shall we relinquish some of the most essential rights of government, which are our only security for every thing dear to us, to avoid our proportion of the publick expense? shall we give up all we have, for a small part of it? This if agreed to, would be no great evidence of our wisdom or foresight. But it is not probable, in the opinion of some of the ablest advocates for the new system, that direct taxes will ever be levied on the States, and if not, the provision for levying such taxes will be nugatory: We shall receive no kind of benefit from it, and shall have committed ourselves to the mercy of the states having slaves, without any consideration whatever. Indeed, should direct taxes be necessary, shall we not by increasing the representation of those States, put it in their power to prevent the levying such taxes, and thus defeat our own purposes? Certainly we shall, and having given up a substantial and essential right, shall in lieu of it, have a mere visionary advantage. Upon the whole then, it must be evident, that we might as well have committed ourselves to the parliament of Great-Britain, under the idea of a virtual representation as in this manner resign ourselves to the federal government.

30 January 1788

To the Members of the Convention of Massachusetts.

Honourable Friends, and Fellow Citizens,

Whoever has attended the debates of the Convention, must already be convinced, that the magnitude of the object, and the anxiety of the members, whether for or against the system as it stands, has produced a party spirit which augurs no good:[22] It has now become a struggle for conquest; rather than for conviction: And great as the characters are which compose the Convention, their talents are more employed to make proselytes in favour or against than to investigate precisely and explain clearly the merits and demerits of the proposed Constitution. It must likewise appear, that so many able and eloquent speakers as there are in favour of it, from the supreme executive, judicial and legislative departments, as well as from the bar, desk, medical and military professions, that there is not a prospect of doing justice to the objections against the plan. Should it, therefore, in this state of affairs, be carried by a small majority, what must be the consequences? They are too apparent, and too ruinous to contemplate, and every one is left to form his idea of them. The same would probably be the effect of a negative, and the farther we proceed in this business, the more evident is it, that an adjournment until the sense of Virginia and other States can be known, is not only proper, but indispensibly necessary for the peace and welfare of this State.—To persuade the people that this system will produce advantages which will never flow from it, or to conceal from them the burthen and coercion that will result from it, will be impolitick in the extreme, for the deception must appear as soon as the plan is administered, 4.13.24 and the new administration itself will be overwhelmed, and all federal government be prostrated by an enraged and disappointed people. I am sensible that many worthy men are for adopting this plan, not because they approve of it, but from an idea that we shall never obtain another; but what reason is there for this apprehension? The whole Continent are desirous of an efficient federal government—The first constitution proposed to the people of Massachusetts was rejected by them; it originated improperly as this did, and if it had not, it was not a good one. The people therefore made a second attempt, and succeeded in it; and is there not the same reason to hope for success in the present case? Or if we fail, that the attempt will probably make us unanimous in adopting this system? But is it not extraordinary, that a Constitution should be proposed by gentlemen, who had no authority whatever to form it—that they should dissolve themselves without knowing the objections of the people, and that the latter should now be told, they must take this or have none?—This may be language adapted to slaves, but not to freemen.

4.13.25 By my last, I think it must fully appear, that the apportionment of representatives by the new system, is to be either according to numbers or property—If according to numbers, that we are to commit ourselves by an unequal representation to the States who are peopled in a great measure with slaves, and if according to property that we are to adopt in our representative branch the most extraordinary principle for establishing an aristocracy, that ever was imposed on a free people. The Constitution further provides, that "the actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct." The whole number of freemen and slaves at this time, according to the best information, is about two millions seven hundred thousand, of which six hundred thousand at least are slaves—two millions one hundred thousand freemen then, and three hundred and sixty thousand, being three fifths of the slaves, will make the present enumeration two millions four hundred and sixty thousand. If we suppose (what considering the continual emigrations from the old to the new States cannot be admitted) that in every twenty years we shall double our numbers, at the end of three years the enumeration will be two millions eight hundred and twenty-nine thousand, and what is to be done with this enumeration? The Constitution in the next paragraph provides, that "the number of representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one representative, and until such enumeration shall be made, New-Hampshire shall be intitled to choose three, Massachusetts eight," &c. &c. The people then are called upon to ratify a Constitution, which provides that they shall never have above one representative for thirty thousand inhabitants, without providing that they shall have one for that number: This clause, whilst it restrains the new government from allowing more than one representative to the number mentioned, authorizes it by making the rule of apportionment one or two hundred thousand inhabitants for each representative, to reduce their number to twenty-eight or even to fourteen. This is so clear, that the warmest advocate for the new system will risque his reputation for candour by denying it. If there was no discretionary power intended to be lodged in the new Congress, to reduce the number of representatives lower than one for every thirty thousand inhabitants, it would have been provided, that "the number of representatives" shall be at least one for every thirty thousand; and not as it now stands, "that it shall not exceed one" for that number. It may be said, perhaps, that the increase of the inhabitants will be such hereafter as that it will be necessary for Congress to have the power to make the rule of apportionment higher than thirty thousand; but why then was it not provided, that the people should be allowed one representative for every thirty thousand, until the representatives amounted to a certain number? Even two hundred representatives for a legislature, invested as this is to be, with almost unlimited powers, over the lives, liberties and property of the citizens of these States, is not too much at this early period:—Why should we then, having but sixty-five representatives, intrust Congress with a power to reduce this to a much less number? Perhaps it will be said, there is only a possibility of this evil; but in the progress of these papers I think it will appear there is a probability if not a certainty, that when Congress shall have established their revenue-acts and standing army, which will be accomplished in a few years, they will reduce the number of representatives so low, and regulate their elections in such a manner, as effectually to destroy the representation of the people.[23] Some indeed may say, that if it was greater than at present, it would be expensive and burthensome; but this is too trifling an objection to deserve refutation; for the people of the country know well, that their greatest security against a tyrannical government consists in a full and free representation—full as to number of representatives—free as to the right of election, and they are not thus to be bubbled out of their liberties. Should it be admitted, that at the end of three years there will be a representative for every thirty thousand inhabitants, the whole number in the federal legislature will then be ninety-four, and this State's proportion thirteen, and after that time no alteration will be made until the year eighteen hundred and one: And are the citizens of this State disposed to commit every thing dear to them, for the space of thirteen years, to a government, constituted as the new one is to be, with only eight representatives for part of the time, and thirteen for the remainder of it?—Are the States having slaves, to have according to the number of freemen a much greater representation than this State? And if there had been no objection of this kind, are the State governments to be subject to annihilation, and, when this is accomplished, is the principle of property, which is now contended for as the rule of apportionment, to be then the rule for electing representatives, whereby sixty or a less number of wealthy men, may elect as many representatives as sixty thousand yeomen? What is the number of freemen in Great-Britain, and how many representatives have they? The number, I think, is computed to be about eight millions, and "the number of English representatives, is five hundred and thirteen, and of Scots forty-five, in all five hundred and eighty-eight." In this proportion we should have a representative for every thirteen thousand six hundred inhabitants, and this State would have thirty representatives in the new Congress. Will the people of this State intrust themselves to a government which will have the power, and every motive to reduce the number of representatives to one half or to one quarter of what they are now to be, and thus to deprive the citizens of their best security for liberty? I think they will not, and that it ought not to be expected of them.

2 February 1788

(Concluded from our last.)

To the Members of the Convention of Massachusetts.

Honourable Friends, and Fellow Citizens,

4.13.26 I am sensible it will be said the Constitution provides "that the electors in each State shall have the qualification requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures." But the new Constitution was evidently intended to, and must in its operation inevitably produce an abolition of the State governments, and when this is accomplished, the rule of apportionment of representatives according to property, must and will apply to electors, and have the effect mentioned. There would nevertheless be some consolation, if these were the only objections relative to representation in the new system, but in the second sect. of the first art. there is a provision that "no person shall be a representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States," &c. had this provision extended to the foreigners who under the government of the United States, had contended for the establishment of our independence, it would have met with no objection; but as it now stands, any foreigner having attained the age of twenty five years, having been seven years a citizen of the United States, and being an inhabitant of any State, may be elected a representative—and the right of being elected senators, is confirmed to foreigners who shall have attained "the age of thirty years," and "who shall have been nine years a citizen of the United States, &c." Thus are we to have a supreme legislature over us, to consist as well of foreigners, as of freemen of the United States.—CITIZENS OF AMERICA! What have you for a number of years been contending for? To what purpose have you expended so freely the blood and treasures of this country? To have a government with unlimited powers administered by foreigners? Will there not be immediately planted in the several States, men of abilities, who, having the appearance of privates, will nevertheless be in the pay of foreign powers? Will not such men ingratiate themselves into your favour, or, which will be much better for them, into the favour of the new government? And after seven years residence, will they not be in your federal house of representatives, or after nine years residence in your senate? Will not the most important secrets of your executive, respecting treaties and other matters, be by these means always open to European powers? Will you not be engaged in their trials? Will not your interest be sacrificed to their politicks? And will you not be the puppets of foreign Courts? Perhaps you will be told that this provision will encourage emigrants, who will bring their money to America; but will you for such precarious and futile prospects consent to part with the right of governing yourselves? How carefully is this point guarded by Great-Britain. Judge Blackstone, book first, chap. tenth, says, "naturalization cannot be performed but by act of parliament, for by this an alien is put in exactly the same state as if he had been born in the king's legiance, except only that he is incapable as well as a denizen of being a member of the privy council, or of parliament, no bill for naturalization can be received in either house of parliament without such disqualifying clause in it."[24] Other European powers are equally careful to exclude foreigners from their councils, whilst we, too wise to be benefited by the experience of governments which have existed for ages, and have attained the zenith of power, are adopting new principles, and exposing ourselves to evils which must inevitably lead us to destruction.

What I before hinted respecting the danger of ratifying the new Constitution, as it stands, is now too evident to admit of a doubt: The opposition in Pennsylvania have been so imprudent as to burn in effigy, Judge M'Kean and Mr. Wilson, two of the leading members of their State Convention. The offenders are of obscure, and perhaps contemptible characters, and there is danger, that they will be arrested, without considering the probability of their having been excited to this outrage by men of influence—that the government will be opposed—and that a civil war will commence, which will flame through this continent, the consequences of which are to be dreaded: Thus will the fairest prospects that ever a people had of establishing for themselves good government, be at once blasted by imprudent zeal and cursed ambition. 4.13.27

The virulent supporters of the new system, say, as those did in the parliament of Great-Britain, who pushed the American revenue-acts, that the opposition consists principally of men of low and vulgar minds, but the 4.13.28

event will be much the same in the one case as in the other: The yeomenry supported by men of abilities and integrity in the several States, and standing on the ground of right, will maintain it: and in case of a war, will derive [drive?] from this continent, many valuable men amongst us, who although now deceived by an aristocratick party, will be considered as usurpers and tyrants. These are not the apprehensions of a timid mind, they are predictions founded on our own experience, and God grant, that the wisdom of this Convention, on which is suspended the fate of America, may avert the impending evil. You have now the confidence of your countrymen, and it is hoped will not be deprived of it, by the arts of any individuals with interested views: You are now in possession of an inestimable jewel, which if lost by a hasty ratification, will never be regained. It is not my wish to make any objections to the new system that are not well founded, and such I conceive to be those against biennial elections: For, considering the extent of the continent—the complicated business of the legislature—the experience requisite for its members—the necessity of their punctual attendance—and their arrangements for quitting their States, and familiar biennial elections, are not lengthy or dangerous; but can there be any reason, that in the first Congress, when the most important institutions and provisions will be made for carrying into effect the new system, Massachusetts, who according to her numbers of freemen, is entitled to nearly eleven out of sixty-five, should have but eight representatives? It must clearly appear, by my former numbers, that by the clause for regulating representation, we are to be reduced to the level of slaves, and that we shall soon be such, if the planters of the south are to send to the new Congress, representatives for three fifths of their negroes. But if this rule was even admissible, we are entitled to above nine representatives according to the present enumeration, and are told, as a consolation for having but eight members, that New-Hampshire has the deficient member, which to us is the same thing. This to me is unintelligible, for the members of both houses are to be paid out of the continental treasury, to which we shall contribute a full proportion according to our property: Why then should we give up to any State whatever, the important privilege of sending a representative? New-Hampshire is a good neighbour, but like other States, has her separate interests, and in pursuit of it, our's may and will be sacrificed, by such an unreasonable concession. It is remarkable, that in the new system there is no qualification of property, for members of either branch of the federal legislature. It is surprizing to some gentlemen in Convention, that others should wish "to exclude from the federal government a good man, because he was not a rich one"[25]—No such thing is in contemplation, but on the other hand, they wish to send him there, and want to know what security there is, that a good man, not being wealthy, shall long continue to be eligible to such an office? If there was provision in the Constitution, that any citizen having three, six, or even nine hundred pounds estate, should be eligible, and that one of those sums should be requisite to qualify him, the publick would be equally guarded against a representation of persons having no property at all, and an exclusion of good men, because not wealthy: But the objection to the Constitution is, that it has no provision for securing the eligibility of good men. If good members without much property, should oppose the wealthy but unprincipled ones in Congress, and prevent their passing oppressive acts, such as revenue-acts, calculated to promote peculation—to protect defaulters—and to plunder the people, (as this system undoubtedly will of all their property) will not those unprincipled members exert themselves to pass an act, requiring for senators and representatives so high a qualification of property, as to exclude for ever from Congress, the good men who have not great estates? Surely they will, being fully authorized thereto by the omnipotent clause, enabling Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers, vested by this Constitution, in the government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof." This I call an omnipotent clause, for I must believe the man who says, that he can see in its aphelion, a comet which requires a century for its revolution, as soon as him that says, he can see the extent to which an artful and arbitrary legislature, can by this clause stretch their powers. We shall next consider the most important clause respecting representation, in art. 1st. sect. 4th. which provides, "that the times, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof: But the Congress may at any time by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing senators."—Great ingenuity has been manifested in attempts to explain away the meaning and tendency of this fatal clause—a clause destructive of the small but best security which the people by the new system will have for preserving their liberties: Let us candidly attend to the arguments urged on this occasion. One is, that the legislatures, or as they are called the sovereignities of the States, are to be the constituents of the federal senate, and the people, the constituents of the house of representatives; that in the frequent struggles and contentions between these two branches to depress and controul each other, each will be supported by its constituents, and therefore that the State legislatures, if uncontrouled by the federal legislature, would endeavour so to regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections, as to deprive the people of their right of representation—Here, besure, is the appearance of great tenderness for the rights of the people, and nothing but the appearance; for an imaginary danger of losing[26] their rights is held up to them to introduce a remedy which must inevitably deprive them of those rights. That there will be such struggles and contentions between the two branches, is admitted—but is it natural to suppose, that the State legislatures, in aid of the federal senate, will wish to destroy the federal representation? Are not the members of one branch of the State legislatures in all the States and of the other branch, in most of them, elected annually, or for a less time? Are not those members dependent on the people for re-elections, and equally with them affected by all federal and state laws? Can those members have any separate interest from the people for destroying the balance in the federal legislature? And if they could have such a separate interest, and should attempt to impair or destroy the right of choosing federal representatives, would not the people instantly feel the injury, and leave out of the legislature men so inimical to their rights? Was there no controuling power in the federal legislature for altering or regulating the times, places, and manner of holding elections, would not the people, by annually electing those who are to make the regulations, have every check requisite for securing the right of elections? If, indeed, the members of the State legislatures held their offices independent of the people, and had separate interests, there would be some ground for the argument—but, dependent as they are, and having the same interests with the people, they cannot.

VII

6 February 1788

To the Members of the Convention of Massachusetts.

Honourable Friends, and Fellow Citizens,

4.13.29 Let us, however, suppose the federal senate, in such a mighty squabble calling on their constituents, the State legislatures, for aid to impair or destroy the democratical federal branch.Is it possible that the members of any State senate or house, would "introduce such regulations, as would render the right of the people, insecure," or "make an unequal and partial division of the State into districts," or "disqualify one third of the electors," as has been urged?[27] Would the members from Worcester, or Hampshire, in either branch consent to regulations which would deprive their constituents of their suffrages and increase the privileges of the electors of Suffolk, or any other county? Could the members in either branch of the State legislature, ever have a motive to adopt such measures, as would deprive themselves as well as their constituents from influencing the elections of federal representatives? Will not the members of the State legislatures, as part of the collective body, be the constituents of the federal representatives? Will not the State legislatures, being thus the constituents of both branches, be the only safe and proper umpire for preserving the harmony and ballance of the federal legislature? Will not the State legislatures knowing there can be no security for property under a rapacious aristocracy, leave out of the federal senate every member that shall aim at an undue controul of the house, and endeavour to produce by the people the same change of such federal representatives, as shall encroach on the rights of the senate? Surely they would; and it is unnatural to suppose that the State legislatures can have any interest in aiding the federal senate to destroy the ballance of the federal legislature, or if they had, that the measure would be attempted; or if it was, that the people would need any other assistance, than their rights, under the State Constitutions to defeat the attempt. But let us suppose there is some danger of this evil, is it to be avoided by incuring one much greater? The federal senators, except two thirds of the first senate, will be always elected for six and the house for two years. The members of both the federal branches from the duration and respectability of their appointments, and from their lucrative establishments, to be made by themselves, will have a great interest in their offices, and every motive to perpetuate them. This will be a common interest, and may, (as I think will evidently appear) be attained without even altering the form of the new Constitution, so excellently well adapted is it, to the establishment of a baleful aristocracy. The federal legislature may, as has been shewn, and undoubtedly will, make the qualification of property so high, as that few in each State can be elected to either the senate or house: Whilst the revenue laws and other civil establishments in the executive and judicial departments of the union, will necessarily produce through the Continent, swarms of officers, who being nominated by the President, and appointed by and with the advice and consent of the senate, will be in their interest, and in the interest of the house likewise, as grants will be made by their joint concurrence. All the federal military officers will be appointed in the same manner, and be in the same interest—all the militia officers, through the continent, where appointments are by the new system, reserved to the States, will nevertheless, as the military officers under the present Confederation, be commissioned by the President of the United States, and attached to the congressional interest. All the late officers of the army who are a very reputable and influential body of men, and who are united by an institution, which gives them ten times the influence, they would otherwise have, will have the same attachment to federal government. How easy then, will it be with such support, for a body of such able men as will compose Congress, to establish the elections of federal representatives at the metropolis as at any other place, in each state, and when this is effected, to collect the congressional or crown officers (as they soon will be called) at that place, and carry the elections for these senators and representatives who shall be in the aristocratical interest of the federal government, leaving out all honest republicans, who shall have been so vulgar as to have paid any regard to the interest of their constituents?

Essay by Samuel

(BOSTON) INDEPENDENT CHRONICLE AND UNIVERSAL ADVERTISER
10 January 1788

While this short essay contains many of the standard Anti-Federalist objections—the extensive powers of Congress, the absence of a declaration of rights, the destruction of the states, the violation of the provisions for amendment of the Articles of Confederation—it is notable chiefly for its discussion of representation and taxes. Samuel examines the relation between the initial representation laid out in the Constitution for each state, the population, and the most recent distribution of the continental taxes, and contends that the eastern states are under-represented (4.14.1–2). The essay contains, in addition, a strong objection to the Constitution's "rejection" of religion, on the ground that no state can exist without adopting some system of religion (4.14.7–8). Samuel argues that the oath to support the Constitution will preclude the possibility of any amendments and, more pertinently, observes the significance of the fact that the oath requires support, not of the United States or the people thereof, but of the Constitution: "it may from this no doubt be expected that Proclamations will conclude GOD SAVE THE CONSTITUTION!" (4.14.6).

Mess'rs. Adams & Nourse,

By inserting the following in your paper, you will gratify some of your Readers, and I hope not disserve the Public.

I was at first in favour of the proposed national Constitution's taking place: 4.14.1
But when I noticed the following thing in it, I cannot wish to have it adopted, unless I could be convinced that I am herein altogether mistaken. For by looking in said Constitution, Art. I, Sect. 2.—I find that the number of Representatives from each State, and direct taxes, are ostensively both fixed on the same basis, viz.—The numbers.—But when it comes to apportion the Representatives, to the several States, it diverges extremely wide from that basis; as appears by the Continental tax, which issued from the Congress nearly the same time.[1] According to which, Georgia (as in said Constitution apportioned) is represented six fold Rhode-Island; more than five Massachusetts; nearly five Connecticut.—Connecticut pays more tax than York; yet York sends most Representatives. The mean number in said tax, for sending a Representative, in the New-England States, is in comparison with the mean number in all the rest, nearly as 5 to 4. For the mean number of said tax, in the New-England States, to send a Representative, is 29,447 dollars. In all the rest of the States, it is but 24,996 dollars. Or if we take the numbers, according to the last enumeration I find extant, it will stand about as 7 to 6. For the mean number of persons in the New-England States, to send a Representative, is 42,941,—In all the rest of the States, it is but 36,666. But some perhaps will say, Georgia is a growing State, and has increased, since said enumeration. 'Tis likely they are increased, since that enumeration: But the tax was about the same time of the Constitution; and the disproportion by the tax, as to Georgia, is nearly the same, as by that old enumeration. But suppose Georgia is increased, since said old enumeration; perhaps no one will pretend the other States have grown less; if they have in numbers, they have not in taxes, in proportion to Georgia. But the other States have not their proportion of Representatives, according to said old enumeration.

These Representatives are to set their own wages, to be paid out of the Continental Treasury; therefore the New-England States will have to pay nearly every fifth dollar, to support Representatives in the other States, according to the apportionment in said Constitution.

4.14.2 I at first flattered myself, that this inequality would be remedied, when the actual enumeration is made.[2] But on further notice found my mistake that there is no prospect of its being better, but worse. For tho' the Constitution says, that the Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States, according to their respective numbers; yet it says, they shall not exceed one for every 30,000: But does not say, we may have one for every 30,000; and it cannot rationably be supposed, that it is designed it ever should be so. For they have not set out so, by a very great proportion: For allowing every State its one Representative for every 30,000, according to said old enumeration, and throwing away the fractional parts of 30,000, in each State, would make thirteen more Representatives in the whole; and six of those thirteen, would be in the New-England States, almost half of what is left out; yet those four States, send but about a quarter, as now apportioned. Yet Georgia is allowed to send three times as many as the proportion which the Constitution says it shall not exceed. And if such strides are made now, while we are invited to accept of it, we may fully conclude that if once we should adopt it, these four States, which are now so far reduced below par, would be reduced to no more than one Representative to each State; and therein would not stride the letter of the Constitution, as they have now, in the case of Georgia: For it would not transgress the letter of the Constitution at all, to reduce any State or States they please, to one Representative each. And they may, as well as what is done now in the case of Georgia, exaggerate the number of Representatives, in any other State to what number they please; and we should have to maintain them, at any price they shall please to lay upon us. And this would serve, not only to secure an over-bearing ballance in the House of Representatives, when the Congress please, against any State or States; but also the choice of the President and Vice-President, to any favourite party of States, that the Congress shall think proper. For the number of electors, and the number of Senators and Representatives, are always to be equal in each State. For the satisfaction of all who would be curious to know, the following Table shows the number of dollars, each State pays in said tax, and the number of persons, according to said enumeration, to one Representative.

New-Hampshire,	pays	19,894	and has	33,333
Massachusetts,		31,779		43,750
Rhode-Island,		36,558		60,000
Connecticut,		29,995		44,000
New-York,		24,299		33,333
New-Jersey,		23,593		30,000
Pennsylvania,		29,077		43,750
Delaware,		25,506		45,000
Maryland,		26,724		36,666
Virginia,		29,077		40,000
North-Carolina,		24,690		40,000
South-Carolina,		21,799		40,000
Georgia,		6,064		8,333

And the whole of the purse, and of the sword, is put into the hands of the President, and a Congress so unequal, and which also may consist, of men of no principle or property. For no religion or property is required, as any qualification, to fill any and every seat in the Legislative, Judicial and Executive departments, in the whole nation. That a Pagan, a Mahometan, a Bankrupt, may fill the highest seat, and any and every seat; nothing but age and residence, are required, as qualifications, for the most important trusts. And there is nothing to hinder their keeping a standing army, at all times, peace or war. Nor is there any provision made for the people or States, to petition or remonstrate, let their grievances be what they will. Should Massachusetts, for instance, be reduced to one Representative, it cannot complain, but is liable to be construed into sedition and rebellion; and the standing army employed to suppress it; as the British standing army were to subdue America. And there is nothing to hinder, but ample provision made, for Congress to make themselves perpetual. For by Art. I, Sect. 4. the 4.14.3

Congress may at any time, make and alter the time, place and manner of choosing Representatives; and the time and manner of choosing Senators. They may also make the President, and Vice-President perpetual; or he, the President, may make himself so, by the help of a little more than a sixth part of the Congress. For the Congress are to appoint the time, and place of choosing the electors, and the day of their giving their votes. Art. II, Sect. 1st. paragraph 4. And if the Congress don't see cause to appoint a time and day for those purposes, there can be none chosen, the old ones continue; or if the majority of the Quorum, appoint the time and day for choosing the electors, and of their giving their votes, the President may so far negative it, as that there must be two thirds of both Houses to make it valid; and the standing army they may keep in time of peace, they may canton where they please, to suppress any complaints that may arise by oppression, or loss of rights or privileges.

4.14.4 And thus also, they may exempt themselves, and all their dependants from all taxation; not only Continental, but State taxation, laying heavy burdens on others, and not move them with one of their fingers. How then will they represent the people? For it is essential to a Representative that he feels all the burdens he lays on the community he is to represent. This is not a mere chimera, for the Constitution appears evidently calculated, to swallow up all State government and authority. For tho' there is frequent mention made of State Legislatures; yet they have no power or authority, as plainly hinted in several places, but very expressly declared, article VI, paragraph 2d, "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made, in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby; any thing in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." This is a bold and decisive stroke, whereby all State authority is at once absorbed, or annihilated; and especially when considered in connection with article III, Sec. 2d. "The Judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made" &c. But there is no provision made for any tryal by Jury, except in criminal cases, and how they are to be packed we don't know. And the President with two thirds of the Senators present, is to make those omnipotant treaties. Art. III. Sect. 2d, which are to supercede all State laws, and which may be, to cede any part of the territory, to a foreign Prince, to hire him to guarantee to him the President to be the sole absolute despot of the rest; or any other purposes he pleases. And this two thirds of the members present, may consist of no more than two persons; for there is no quorum affixed to them, only in their Legislative capacity. But make the best we can of it, and apply the Legislative quorum here, it will require no more than the Senators of five States, viz. ten Senators, to make any treaties the President pleases; which may affect the territory, laws or commerce, of some States to advantage; at the expence, or to the prejudice of other States; or even to the giving up some States, to a foreign Prince, as before suggested.

The most complaints, that I have heard made about the proposed Con- 4.14.5
stitution, are that there is no declaration of rights. In the confederation, there is a declaration of rights, of the contracting parties, viz. The several States. But here is none, either of States or of people. And we by this time see the reason of that omission, viz. because there are no rights left, either to the States or people; and it would have been inconsistent to have attempted any thing of that kind; or declared any rights remaining, after all was given up claimed by this Constitution.

But some have supposed, they have a salvo for all difficulties, that may 4.14.6
arise in said Constitution, by the 5th Art. entitled amendments provided. But all amendments, are effectually guarded against in the next Art. paragraph 3. For there we find, all the members of Congress, and all the members of the several State Legislatures, and all the Executive and Judicial officers, both of the United States, and of the several States, are to be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution. How then can we have any amendments, as speciously pretended in said 5th Article? When all those from whom only it can originate, are to be bound by oath, to support this as it is. Besides, it is not likely, that the President, or Congress, would be so impolitic, as to oppress so large a proportion of the States at once, as two thirds; therefore, there is no probability, and scarcely possibility, that ever a motion of two thirds should arise. Moreover, could we obtain a Convention, and by them amendments proposed; they might lie dormant forever, if the Congress did not see cause to appoint how the amendments should be ratified; which is not to be expected, if the amendments should be to diminish their power; so that all the parade about amendments, comes to nothing. But to return to the oath; there is something very singular in the manner of the oath; that all Continental and State officers, should be bound by oath, to preserve, protect, defend and support this Constitution. And not rather be under oath, to preserve, protect, defend and support the United States, or the people thereof, in their rights and privileges; it may from this no doubt be expected that Proclamations will conclude GOD SAVE THE CONSTITUTION![3]

In the same paragraph, in which the above oath is instituted, all religion is 4.14.7
expressly rejected, from the Constitution. Was there ever any State or kingdom, that could subsist, without adopting some system of religion?[4] Not so much as to own the being, and government of a Deity; or any acknowledgment of him! or having any revelation from him! Should we adopt such a rejection of religion as this, the words of Samuel to Saul, will literally apply to us,—Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, he hath also rejected thee from being king.[5] We may justly expect, that God will reject us, from that self government, we have obtained thro' his divine interposition: Or being able to keep up government and order among us; for he has commanded the rulers of the earth, to kiss the son, lest he be angry, and they perish from the way.

4.14.8 If civil rulers won't acknowledge God, he won't acknowledge them; and they must perish from the way. And there can be no rational doubt, that the prevailing neglect of acknowledging God in the time of the revolution, and since, is the cause of our having such convulsions as have been among us; we are perishing from the way.[6]

4.14.9 Again, I find in the last acts of the Constitution, that it is an open professed resolution, to break a solemn covenant, made by the several States, in the confederation of the United States of America. Which having named the States, in the 3d, article, says "the said States hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship, with each other, for their common defence, &c."—Then going on to describe this firm league, till it comes to the last Art. it concludes, "And the articles of this Confederation, shall be inviolably observed by every State; and the Union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them; unless such alteration be agreed to, in Congress of the United States, and be after-wards confirmed by the Legislatures of every State." But this new Constitution, does not appear to be agreed to by Congress, neither is it a Confederation of the States; but professedly of the people, as in the very first words of it; and concludes, that the ratification of the conventions of nine States, shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution, between the States so ratifying the same." This is expressly repugnant to the Confederation, the sacred national covenant we are under; and to set up a schism in the nation.[7] This is not proposed to be done by the same contracting parties. For that was a covenant of union between the States. This is to be by the people of the States, to throw off all their allegiance to the federal Constitution of the nation, and the covenant Constitutions of the several States: And if the conventions in nine States will adopt it, then to seperate, and set up this in violation of all covenant obligations, of the most solemn important kind and consequence.

4.14.10 But almost every one is possessed with a persuasion, that some farther powers are necessary to be vested in the National Head, the Congress; perhaps I am as strongly possessed of that apprehension as any one; therefore, at first, I felt passive, or rather inclined that this Constitution should be adopted, not considering the nature of it. But why should we break such solemn covenant, as this Constitution resolves to do? And plunge ourselves into such a labyrinth of innovation, which it is impossible for any one to for-see, or perhaps to guess where it will land us, or what we shall meet by the way? This Constitution does not wear the complexion of uniting the nation—but of dividing it. Had we not much better keep on our old ground? The national covenant we are under, solemnly ratified to be perpetual, and amend that: It is, no doubt, as easy to amend that, as it will be to amend the new one. And this I understand, was the sole purpose the federal Convention was appointed for, viz. To revise the articles of confederation, not to destroy the covenant. Why should we be fond of another revolution so soon? Why should we be fond of such an innovation? Let us hear what a sage old politician, once said on a similar occasion, after having described to the people, the nature and consequence of the innovation, they were urging for, says, Ye shall cry out in that day, because of your King, which ye have chosen you: and the LORD will not hear you.[8]

Essays by Hampden

MASSACHUSETTS CENTINEL
January–February 1788

Hampden favors adopting the proposed Constitution conditional upon adopting at the same time certain amendments. He would deprive the Congress of the power to lay taxes other than impost and excises, but otherwise his proposed amendments deal with individual rights and the jurisdiction of the federal courts. In his second essay Hampden agrees that amendment of a constitution should normally be difficult but contends that amendments prior to approval are both desirable and likely to meet general agreement. Harding speculates that the author may have been James Sullivan, but the grounds are extremely treacherous.[1]

1. Harding relies mainly upon some similarities between objections of Hampden and objections made by Sullivan elsewhere; but Sullivan appears to have written a series of Federalist essays as Cassius, and Hampden says that he had written nothing else. Harding concedes these facts but does not try to explain them. See Harding, Contest over Ratification 31–32. Warren is dubious of the identification; Massachusetts Historical Society, Proceedings 64 (1932): 147, n 6.

Mr. Russell,

4.15.1 I have had no hand in the productions respecting the proposed plan of government—but I feel interested as a citizen. I have waited to see if any motion might be made, or any disposition appear in the Convention, to prevent one of two evils taking place; the first is, that of rejecting the Constitution; the second is, that of adopting it by a bare majority.

4.15.2 I am not contented with it as it now stands, my reasons are assigned:—

I am not satisfied with the provision for amendments, as it stands in that system, because the amendments I propose, are such as two thirds of the Senate will perhaps never agree to—the indictment by grand jury, and trial of fact by jury, is not so much set by in the southern States, as in the northern—the great men there, are too rich and important to serve on the juries, and the smaller are considered as not having consequence enough to try the others; in short, there can be no trial by peers there:—The middle States gain advantages by having the legal business done in one of them, which may prevent their leading men, from engaging seriously in amendments:—I therefore propose the adopting the Constitution, in the following manner, in which I conceive there will be great unanimity.

THAT this Convention do adopt and ratify the Constitution, or frame of government for the United States of America, proposed by the Federal Convention, lately holden at Philadelphia; upon the following conditions, viz. 4.15.3

That the first Congress which shall be holden under the same, shall before they proceed to exercise any powers possessed under the Constitution, excepting those of organising themselves, and of establishing rules of procedure, take into consideration all amendments proposed by the Convention of this or any other State, and to make such amendments therein proposed as aforesaid, as any seven of the States shall agree to; and which amendments shall be considered as a part of the Constitution.

And that the Senators and Representatives of the several States, shall set together in one body, and vote by States, in considering such amendments;—but the President or Vice-President elect, shall have no vote therein.

THE AMENDMENTS PROPOSED.

FIRST. In the fourth section of the article of the Senate strike out these words, "But Congress may, at any time, by law, make, or alter, such regulation, except as to the place for choosing Senators;" and insert these words, "But if any State shall refuse to prescribe time and place for such elections, Congress shall provide therefor by laws made for that purpose." 4.15.4

Remark—this amendment takes off the main objection made to this article, and gives Congress power to perpetuate its own existence.

2d. In the second clause of the ninth section insert the words—"And the Supreme Judicial Courts of the several States and either Judge thereof, shall have power to issue this writ."

This secures the right of Habeas Corpus, without going to Pennsylvania for it.

3d. In the eighth section of the powers of Congress, strike out the word, "Taxes."

This leaves the powers of impost and excise to Congress. And should war, or any other circumstance render internal taxes necessary to be in Congress, they may have the power granted hereafter.

4th. In the second section of the Judiciary Power, strike out the following words, "Between a State and a citizen of another state, between citizens of different States."

Laying a State liable to be sued, robs it of all its sovereignty, and in this case may lay the several States liable to be sued for their publick securities.[1]

5th. In the second clause of the same section, strike out the words, "Both as to law and fact," and add to that clause these words—Provided nevertheless, that all issues of fact shall be tried by a jury to be appointed according to standing laws made by Congress.

This will preserve the inestimable right of a trial by jury—This right is the democratical balance in the Judicary power; without it, in civil actions, no relief can be had against the High Officers of State, for abuse of private citizens; without this the English Constitution would be a tyranny—See Judge Blackstone's excellent Commentary on this privilege, in his third volume, page[2]

6th. In the last clause in the same section next after the word State, insert these words, In, or near the County.

This keeps up the idea of trial in the vicinity. See the Massachusetts declaration of rights on this point—Also, that of other States, &c.[3]

7th. At the end of the same clause, add these words—Provided that no person shall be held to answer to any charge of a criminal nature, unless it be upon indictment of a Grand Jury, appointed, sworn and charged according to known and standing laws.

This is the greatest security against arbitrary power; without this, every person who opposes the violation of the constitutional right of the people, may be dragged to the bar, and tried upon a bare information of an Attorney-General.—The loss of this privilege carries with it the loss of every friend to the people.—There is no instance yet, in England, or in America, excepting in the Stuart's reign, of a person's being tried for his life, otherwise than upon indictment. It was attempted before the Revolution, but successfully opposed.

Hampden

2 February 1788

Mr. Russell:

4.15.5 As I understand the fifth article in the proposed Constitution, it is provided by it, that when two thirds of the Senate, and two thirds of the House, (that is, as it appears to me, when two thirds of these bodies, separately) shall deem it necessary, they shall propose amendments, or when the legislatures of two-thirds of the States, shall apply for it, Congress is to call a Convention of all the States; this Convention when called, are not to be authorised to make amendments, but are only to propose them to the legislatures of the several States, and then if the legislatures of three fourth parts of the States shall agree to the amendments proposed, they are to be considered as a part of the Constitution.

I am exceedingly pleased with this mode, so far as it regards the purpose which it was intended to effect. When a government is in exercise, all innovations are dangerous; the forming, or amending a government, opens a wild field for speculation, and men of genius and ability will throng it: One amendment begets another, and that a third, until, perhaps, the parties are lost in the windings of their own arguments; and the people thrown into dreadful factions. Ideas like these have prevented, and do still prevent, the people in England, from attempting to regain an equal representation in Parliament. The exceeding slow, precarious, and expensive method for amendments, proposed in this Constitution, will prevent those frequent attempts which otherwise might create parties, to the great injury of the general government. 4.15.6

But this remedy is by no means calculated for those defects, which appear upon the plan, before it is adopted. It is only intended for those which may appear upon the exercise of it. The United States are under great obligations to the honorable gentlemen who formed this plan; but in a country, where learning, ability, and particularly the knowledge of politicks, are so universally disseminated, it would be very extraordinary, if those men, however great and learned, should produce a system in which no amendments, by others, should not be justly proposed. Yet if none could be proposed without introducing the confusion, which some people apprehend, we had, it may be said, better take it as it is. If there is no alternative but the ratifying this, or having no government, this position may be supported. But whether we had better adopt this as it is, or lay a foundation to obtain amendments before it is carried into exercise, is quite another question, and one which clearly exists. To ratify this, as it is, would be clearly deciding, that it is right, and a motion for immediate amendments would be preposterous: There are amendments, stated in my other paper, which are by no means local, and some of which, respecting the right of juries, I believe a majority of States will agree to. Mr. Wilson, has said that the Convention could agree upon no mode of expression to place this, as a constitutional right in the system.[4] I see no objection to the modes of expression, I have used in my other paper. If there is not, this secures the right. But should not seven states, assembled in Convention, as proposed, agree to any amendments, the Constitution remains as it is—but should they agree to any, those will be a part of it. 4.15.7

Letter from A Customer

(PORTLAND, MAINE) CUMBERLAND GAZETTE
March 1788

In his first paragraph A Customer gives economical expression to a very characteristic Anti-Federal persuasion: the Constitution is derived from a political theory that would deflect popular attention from politics and religion to the pursuit of wealth and from direct responsibility for government to a remote representative system. The author goes on to object that the Constitution does not explicitly provide that a new President shall be elected after four years and that the Congress might decide to have the Chief Justice act as President.

Friend Wait,

4.16.1 We are now in a hopeful way. The lower class fall in with the views of some of the better sort who reprebate the old-fashioned ideas of 1775, viz. that the common people were good judges in the affairs of government; and that their time was well spent when it was devoted to the study of politicks and religion—the latter of which was then supposed to be necessary to the well being of civil society.[1] We leave our share in the general government, to ten men; and our State matters may soon be reduced. As to religion, our great folks are not obliged to make a declaration on that score; and if the lower class, who are desirous to imitate those who move in a higher sphere, should once be made to believe it unfashionable, we may turn our clergy a grazing—and employ our time, that heretofore has been employed in politicks and religion, to the pursuit of wealth, to enable us to pay our debts, and support the dependants on government in the style of the great men of the east.

4.16.2 I have one difficulty in my mind respecting our admirable Constitution, which I hope somebody will attempt to remove. Art. 3, sect. I—"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America: he shall hold his office during the term of four years." Here is no declaration that a new one shall be chosen at the expiration of that time. "Congress may determine the time of chusing the electors; and the day on which they shall give their votes." But suppose they should think it for the publick good, after the first election, to appoint the first Tuesday of September, in the year two thousand, for the purpose of chusing the second President; and by law empower the Chief Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court to act as President until that time. However disagreeable it might be to the majority of the States, I do not see but that they are left without a remedy, provided four States should be satisfied with the measure. The President elected is not to receive any other emolument; yet the Chief Justice is not disqualified as a Judge. Why did our worthy Chief Justice, at Cambridge the year past, in his address to the Grand Jury, call upon them to support "that free and excellent Constitution, which it has lost the blood of thousands of our friends and fellow citizens to establish: that Constitution which has carefully separated and distinguished the principal departments of power—that they might never combine against the liberty of the subject:"[2] if it is not a necessary article in a constitution? If necessary in a State constitution, why not in one for the whole people? Was it not as easy to have said the President should be chosen every fourth year, as to have said the Representatives shall be chosen every second year? The celebrated Mr. King observes that this is not a confederation of States—for the style is in the name of the people:[3] therefore, it appears to me, the rights of the people should be as well guarded, on this point, here, as in the constitution of a State.

I send you a few pounds of flax—a most excellent article. It will employ 4.16.3 the idle, who may be out of business, to turn it into cloth; and when reduced to rags, it will be useful to make paper for your business. And if in some future day your press should be stopped, it will make small cords to tickle the idle and restless, and to bind the turbulent to their good behaviour.

Your press is free: therefore you will oblige me by inserting the foregoing in your useful paper.

Essays by A Farmer

(NEW HAMPSHIRE) FREEMAN'S ORACLE AND NEW HAMPSHIRE ADVERTISER
January–June 1788

The essays of A [New Hampshire] Farmer were published in the Freeman's Oracle and New Hampshire Advertiser from 11 January 1788 through 13 September 1788. The first essay elicited a response from Alfredus, which was published in the Freeman's Oracle on 18 January; A Farmer replied to it on 1 February; Alfredus responded on 8 February; and A Farmer returned to the attack on 6 June.

In the interesting first essay, the writer contends that even if James Wilson is correct that all powers not granted are reserved, the powers granted under the new Constitution are so generous, especially when taken together with the supremacy clause, as to invite expansion and to require the specific restraints of a bill of rights. He proposes a national jury to sit with the "judicial court of the United States." He urges the importance of protecting the freedom of the press, understood as freedom from "prior restraints." His argument against a standing army is more significant than most, for he shows not only its tendency to tyranny, but also the dangers of war to the morals of the people and the conduct of public affairs. After a (much less strong) discussion of the excessive salaries the legislators are likely to pay themselves and the need somehow to provide constitutional limits, A Farmer analyzes the commercial interests favorable to the Constitution and contrasts them with the interest of the farmers—who cannot put their land on their backs and leave if things turn out badly. The essay concludes with a proposal that men be elected to the state ratifying convention pledged to secure a bill of rights and other amendments to the Constitution.

The second and third of A Farmer's essays contain some further discussion of the issues of a standing army and trial by jury in civil cases. Regarding the latter, A Farmer includes a long quotation from Blackstone that is important in the Anti-Federalist argument. The debate then degenerated into personal abuse, and the subsequent exchanges, which contribute nothing of substance to the debate over the Constitution are not reprinted here (see note 5 to text below). They do, however, identify A Farmer as Colonel Thomas Cogswell, Chief Justice of the New Hampshire Court of Common Pleas.[1]

1. The identity is revealed on 13 June by Alfredus' reference to the military office held by his antagonist. Cogswell defended himself by name in the essay of 4 July. Alfredus also identified Cogswell as the author of The Anti-foederalist, No. 2, which appeared in the Freeman's Oracle on 8 February 1788 and is reprinted below, 4.23.4. In the American Antiquarian Society copies of the pertinent numbers of the Freeman's Oracle, the same hand that correctly labels A Farmer as Thos. Cogswell identifies Alfredus as Samuel Tenny (or Tenney), a New Hampshire surgeon and public figure. This is consistent with identification of Alfredus as a doctor by both A Farmer (4.17.13, 16) and the Anti-Federalist, Philo (Freeman's Oracle 16 August 1788). See Dictionary of American Biography (ed. Francis S. Drake, 1872) 204, 899.

11 January 1788

My Friends, and Fellow-Farmers,

Much has been said respecting the new Constitution offered you, by the Convention, under the direction of Congress; and much ought to be said, in favour of it, not only from the characters of those gentlemen who composed the Convention (whose characters I revere) but from the many excellencies it contains—Yet, neither the characters of the gentlemen, the excellencies it contains, nor the deranged state of our public affairs, ought to have so much influence upon your minds, as to adopt this Constitution, if it is incompleat. Examine it, my friends, with discernment and candor, and judge for yourselves—I think you will find the foundation is laid, and materials are wanting to render it compleat. 4.17.1

In order to adopt it, as it now stands, with any degree of safety, in my humble opinion, a Bill of Rights is absolutely necessary, to secure the liberties of the people. Although the celebrated Mr. Wilson, in his address to the citizens of Philadelphia, respecting a Bill of Rights, urged, that in a state constitution, every thing that was not reserved, was given; but, in a Federal Constitution, the reverse of the proposition prevailed, and what was not given was reserved.[1] I must confess it was ingeniously got over, but not to my satisfaction, (in many instances people may be silenced, but not convinced) for upon the very principle that Mr. Wilson urged, that there is no need of a bill of rights, for what is not given is reserved, would be the foundation I should go upon to urge the great necessity of one,—for if we look into the Constitution, we shall find the different articles therein contained, are expressed in very general and extensive terms; ONE, in particular, which is sufficient to show the necessity of a Bill of Rights, viz.—"This Constitution and the laws of the United States, which shall be hereafter made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges, in every state, shall be bound thereby, any thing in the Constitution or law of any state to the contrary not withstanding;"—Therefore, I say, take this clause, together with the extensive latitude given in several other 4.17.2

articles, is too much power to lodge in the hands of any set of men, however virtuous they may be without being properly guarded; nor can I think it in the least derogatory to the honour of the supreme authority of the United States, to have a Bill of Rights stated in the Constitution, wherein it shall be declared, thus far you may go and no further. We have found by experience, the great advantage of a Bill of Rights in our State constitution; when the legislature passed sundry laws infringing on the Bill of Rights, we had it in black and white to show them they were wrong; and to their honour be it spoken, they have repealed one; and so far as the necessities of the people would admit the other.[2]

4.17.3 Much has been said respecting Congress exercising exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over a jurisdiction, not exceeding ten miles square, in such a place as Congress agree to reside in. If that is a Hobby Horse that Congress wishes to mount, and the state they conclude to reside in will give them the jurisdiction, and the individuals consent to it;—Let them mount, for if we prevent them they may get worse mounted. But on our part,—Let us secure the liberties of individuals of the United States, and guard and fetter the hobby horse, in such a manner, as not to let him kick our heads off, if we should have occasion to pass thro' or remain in that district a certain time—The judicial court of the United States is an object worthy of our serious attention, and to have a jury always to attend the same when sitting, composed of members from each state, is necessary to secure the liberties of the people. In order to this, let the President of each state cause a box to be made, and with the advice of council, enroll thirty of the most respectable characters in the state, and on the first Monday in January, every year, or any other convenient time; let the President order his Secretary to draught out two of the names of those persons so enrolled and put in the box, to attend the grand court of the United States as jurymen, whenever they shall sit. If any accident should prevent one or both said jurymens' attendance, and the obstructions appear sufficient to the President, then he shall proceed to a new choice; if otherwise, let them be fined for non attendance. And those two persons so draughted, having served one year, let their names be taken out of the box, and two others put in, and so in rotation. And once in three years let the box be examined by the President and council and corrected as circumstances require. The pay and travel, and mode of payment to be fixed by Congress.—Perhaps some will object against this, as being too expensive; but when we consider that here will be the result of causes of great magnitude; and the respectable appearance such a court will make; and the honour that will redound to the United States; I think, as a Farmer, I should be willing to contribute largely toward it; there will be two jurors, and one may be empannel'd no ways interested in the cause, but to do justice—The liberty of the Press is essential to a free people, it ought therefore to be inviolably preserved and secured in the Bill of Rights, and no duty or tax to be imposed thereon, of what name or nature soever. But if individuals will publish indecent pieces, leave them to the law of the land to abide the consequence.[3]

Something has been said respecting the state of Vermont. I heartily wish 4.17.4
Congress would admit them into the union. The legislature of this state, in my opinion, ought to give it in charge to their members in Congress, to urge their admittance. As it now stands, they are daily draining off a large number of inhabitants from these northern states, from the idea that they pay no taxes, and finally will not have to pay any part of the Continental debt. It is certainly high time, that matter was decided, it is now about ten years since they declared their independence and have governed themselves accordingly—Standing armies are dangerous in time of peace to the liberties of a free people, provided they are kept and voted their continuance yearly, they soon get ingrafted into and become a part of the Constitution, therefore they ought not to be kept up, on any pretext whatsoever, any longer than till the enemy are driven from our doors. War is justifiable on no other principle than self-defence, it is at best a curse to any people; it is comprehensive of most, if not all the mischiefs that do or can afflict mankind; it depopulates nations; lays waste the finest countries; destroys arts and sciences, it many times ruins the best men, and advances the worst, it effaces every trace of virtue, piety and compassion, and introduces all kind of corruption in public affairs; and in short, is pregnant with so many evils, that it ought ever to be avoided if possible; nothing but self-defence can justify it.[4] An army, either in peace or war, is like the locust and caterpillers of Egypt; they bear down all before them—and many times, by designing men, have been used as an engine to destroy the liberties of a people, and reduce them to the most abject slavery. I have both summered and wintered with an army: You, my friends, in general, know nothing of the evils that attend it; guard and secure it well in your Bill of Rights, that it may not be in the power of any set of men to trample your liberties under their feet with it. Organize your militia, arm them well, and under Providence they will be a sufficient security. I have once born arms in defence of my country;—I am now willing to risque myself and property, together with my liberties and privileges, (with a well regulated militia) and when they are invaded, I will gird on my sword and appear in their defence. And, if my children after me will not do it, let them loose theirs with their heads into the bargain.[5]

Great complaint has been made, that Congress has been too liberal in 4.17.5
their grants of salaries to individuals, and I think not without just cause; for if I am rightly informed, there has been men whose salaries have been fifteen hundred dollars per year, and some of them did not do business at any rate, that the sum they negociated would amount to their yearly salary. And some men now in office, at twenty-five hundred dollars per year, who I think, would have been glad to have set down at one hundred pounds a year before the war,[6] and would have done as much or more business. The truth is, when you carry a man's salary beyond what decency requires, he immediately becomes a man of consequence, and does little, or no business at all. Let us cast your eyes around us, in the other departments, the judges of the superior court have but about one hundred pounds salary a year. The judges of the courts of common pleas, on an average, not more than sixty dollars per year. The ministers of the gospel, a very valuable set of men, who have done honour to themselves, and rendered great service to their country, in compleating the revolution have salaries but from sixty to an hundred pounds a year in general. The contrast is striking. I heartily wish that all ranks of men among us, ministers of the gospel as well as others, would turn their attention toward the Constitution, they may be more concerned in the event than they at present think of.

4.17.6 Rouse up, my friends, a matter of infinite importance is before you on the carpet, soon to be decided in your convention, viz, The New Constitution—Seize the happy moment—Secure to yourselves and your posterity the jewel Liberty, which has cost you so much blood and treasure, by a well regulated Bill of Rights, from the encroachments of men in power. For if Congress will do these things in the dry tree[?] when their power is small, what wont they do when they have all the resources of the United States at their command?—They are the servants of the public;—You have an undoubted right to set their wages, or at least to say, thus far you and those under you may go and no further.—This would in the end ease Congress of a great deal of trouble, as it would put a stop to the impertinence of individuals in asking large salaries. I would say that the wages of a Representative in Congress do not exceed five dollars per day, a Senator not to exceed six, and the President seven per day, with an allowance for his table. And that the wages of no person employed in the United States exceed the daily pay of a Representative in Congress, but be paid according to their service, not exceeding that sum. Perhaps it may be said that money may depreciate, or appreciate—Let a price current be taken when this Constitution is compleated of the produce of each state, and let that be the general standard.

4.17.7 My friends and countrymen, let us pause for a moment and consider,—we are not drove to such great straits as to be obliged to swallow down every portion offered us by wholesale or else die immediately by our disease. We can form a Constitution at our leisure; and guard and secure it on all sides. We are paying off our state debt, and the interest on the domestic as fast as Congress call upon us for it. As to the foreign debt, they have the promise of more interest from us than they can get any where else, and we shall be able to pay them both interest and principal shortly. But it is said they will declare war against us, if we don't pay them immediately. Common sense will teach them better; we live at too great a distance, and are too hardy and robust a people, for them to make money out of us in that way.

4.17.8 But it is said, the trading towns are fond of this Constitution. Let us consider how they stand including their interest.

1st. The merchant wishes to have it adopted, that trade might be regulated. 2dly. Another set of men wishes to have it adopted, that the idea of paper money might be annihilated. 3dly. Another class of men wish to have it take place, that the public might be enabled to pay off the foreign debt, and appear respectable abroad among the nations. So do I, with all my heart; but in neither of these cases do I wish to see it adopted, without being guarded on all sides with a Magna Chartha, or a Bill of Rights, as a bulwark to our liberties. Again, another class of men wish to have it adopted, so that the public chest might be furnished with money to pay the interest on their securities, which they purchased of the poor solidiers at two shillings on the pound. I wish the soldiers were now the holders of those securities they fought so hard for: However, as the public finances were such that they could not be paid off as they became due, and they have carried them to market, and sold them as the boy did his top; we must pay them to the holders; but we need not be in a hurry about it, certificates will do for that.

Consider, my friends, you are the persons who must live and die by this Constitution—a merchant or mechanick may dispose of his goods, or pack them up in trunks, and remove to another clime in the course of a few months; but you cannot shoulder your lands, or dispose of them when you please, it therefore behoves you to rouse up, and turn your most serious and critical attention to this Constitution. You are called upon by the legislature to appoint men to meet in Convention, to consider and decide upon the proposed Constitution. Seek, and make choice of such men as served you faithfully through the war, and know the difficulties and dangers of a revolution. No man is debared by our state constitution from sitting in this convention. And let each town, or district, qualified by law to send a member, give him instructions to insist upon the additions of a Bill of Rights to the Constitution, and to have such amendments made in it, as shall effectually secure it on all sides; it had better be done now, in the first setting out, than to have to do it seven years hence—it may be at the purchase of blood. 4.17.9

I think the state of Virginia have ordered their convention to object, amend, or make a new one as they please. I wish every state would do the same, then a continental convention would have a fair chance to frame a constitution most agreeable to the general sense of the people, and then let it be returned for their approbation. I assert as a fact, that the gentlemen had not a fair chance in forming this. They were shut up as it were, from the world, and could hardly converse with their intimate friends on the important subject, and they formed it on those generous and liberal principles agreeable to their own sentiments, and were they always to rule, I should not have much to fear from them. But I have some where read, that men in power ought above all others to be narrowly watched and checked on all sides, with restraints stronger than their temptations to break them, and even crimes of theirs ought to be more penal as it is evident they are more pernicious. 4.17.10

4.17.11 To conclude—as the Fox in the Fable, wanting to rob a hen-roost, or do some such like prank, humbly besought admittance and house room only for his head,—his whole body presently followed—. So courts more crafty as well as more craving than that designing animal, have scarce ever gained an inch of power, but they have stretched it to an ell; and when they have got in but a finger their whole train has soon followed.

1 February 1788

Messieurs Printers,

4.17.12 When a man enters the list of your correspondents, and publishes his sentiments to the world, with a design for the public good, I read him with candor; and like a bee on the flower, extract the most useful parts; and if for want of information, or a slip of the pen, he should publish any thing not quite so agreeable, I had rather cast a vail over it than any thing else.—But when a man (like Alfredus)[7] enters for the sake of criticizing upon a few words, and snarling at every sentence, because they are not entirely agreeable to his wish, I generally treat him, as I do the Puppy, which barks with a great deal of impudence, at every traveller; and with the good humor of Uncle Tobey, I say to him, go, Poor Devil, Go, return to thy cell, there is room enough in this world for both of us.

4.17.13 I wish young gentlemen, would not be quite so anxious, to crowd down this Constitution. If they are not Quacks in Law, Physick, or Speculation, they may be in politicks: But, leave it to old and experienced hands to decide, who can look to the end of things.[8] It calls to my mind, an observation made in a grand council held at New-York, when our army was about evacuating the city; it was warmly urged to set fire to the city, as it might prove a temporary advantage to the British troops; after some altercation, an old sage arose and addressed himself as follows: I am surprised to hear the sentiments of so many wise and worthy gentlemen, to burn the city of New-York, that has cost so much time and treasure to erect. But however, war has not ripened your minds to that maturity which is necessary to look to the end of things. If we burn the city, how many hundreds of worthy inhabitants shall we distress and many wholly ruin, who have only left the city to escape the dangers of war, and perhaps may return again in a few months. If the British troops burn it let them take the curses of an innocent people: for my part I can see no more reason, for burning the city, than that a wealthy farmer should burn his Barns, because the rats have got into them. And on my part, I can see no more reason for adopting the Constitution as it now stands, upon the General conversation, that if we dont adopt this we shall never have any, than that a man should quit his house, and expose himself, and his family to the inclemency of the weather, because his house may take fire, in the night, and burn them up.

As to the lofty strains of a Wilson,[9] he has never entered into the spirit of the Constitution, so far as has come to my knowledge, he has in my opinion, kept aloof, on the surface, and with a great deal of falacy set forth the difficulties that attended forming the Constitution; those difficulties, will always arise where the views are not intended for the general good. 4.17.14

But let Mr. Wilson, and his lofty strains, go off, with a puff of wind, and soar above the clouds in an Air Balloon, he seems better calculated for that region than to make laws for a free people.

There is the nervous reasonings of a Brutus, and the ingenious sentiments of a Candidus;[10] they have opened the sore and probed it to the bottom; if any man, after reading their strictures upon the Constitution, can lay his hand upon his heart, and say it is best for us to adopt it, I shall in return pronounce, that he ought to be a slave forever, and will freely doom him to the cold and dreary regions of Nova-Scotia, there to wind up his days on clams and potatoes. 4.17.15

My friends and fellow farmers, I intended here to have made an end, and left Alfredus, with all his impudence to return peaceably to his cell, where I sent him in the first paragraph—But when I came to read over his piece a second time couched in such language, it made me shudder to see how abusively he has treated our juries, the grand palladium of liberty. I will for your observation copy his sentiment, it appears to be written with blood. These are his words—"What are the advantages of this boasted Trial by Jury, and on which side do they lie, not certainly on the side of justice, for one unprincipled juror, secured in the interest of the opposite party, will frequently divert her course, and in four cases out of five, when injustice is done, it is by the ignorance or knavery of the jury."[11]—This is a bold stroke, my friends, and shows you at once the disposition of Mr. Alfredus, that he is no friend to your liberties. I shall make no further observation on this particular, but when a leisure hour offers, I will give him a further combing for his insolence to the juries.[12] Then we may see who wants the medicine to cure the Hypocondriac. In the mean time I shall advise Mr. Alfredus to examine his Apothecaries shop and take a little Hypocacuana and a few pills for fear he should get past recovery. 4.17.16

As to armies, I shall conclude with a quotation from a celebrated author, viz. "In free states, the profession of a soldier taken merely, and singly as a profession, is justly an object of jealousy, and an army though they are voted yearly, soon get engrafted to, and become a part of the Constitution.["][13] 4.17.17

III
6 June 1788

Messirs. Lamson and Ranlet,

4.17.18 When I sent you the last piece to be published, under the signature of the FARMER, in which I gently advised Mr. Alfredus to take a little Ipecacuanha, and a few pills to cure him of the Hypochondriack—I had no idea of his taking so large a dose. It evidently appears, by his conduct, that the disorder had taken very deep hold of him, otherwise he never would have taken so large a portion at once; for, to appearance, if he had swallowed the whole of an apothecarie's shop, it would not have operated more violently, nor have discharged more filth than he did in his last publication. But so it is—We will consider it as a wonderful phenomenon perhaps, suited to attract the notice and observation of the Medical Society at their next meeting. However, it is the duty of an able Physician to watch carefully the ebbings and flowings of nature; and when a patient has received so violent a shock to throw in a few Lenitives, which, it may be hoped, will in a short time recover him to compos mentis et corporis to be of sound mind and body, and so make him an useful member of the community. I shall therefore, rather pity than complain of, Alfredus, while he is under the severe operation of medicine; for he appears to be conscious that he deserves the curses of Ernulphus, by expecting them; and as conscience has begun to do its office, I shall leave that monitor to compleat it, and proceed to make a few remarks on his performance.

4.17.19 He observed that "old heads are not always wise;" he should also have recollected that young heads are not always steady and judicious; if they had have been, he never would have complained of my using him ill with regard to language; for when I published my sentiments they were open to the strictures of any person. But Mr. Alfredus being conscious that my observations were founded upon reason and fact; and a Truth is a hard thing to get over, he begins by ridiculing the Author under the character of Don Quixot, and then abusing and vilifying our juries (which I shall say more of presently) and finally concludes by saying, "To follow this writer, Messieurs Printers, through every scandalous innuendo, foolish proposition, impertinent observation, and groundless assertion, would fatigue the patience of your readers." This gentleman ought to have pointed out here to the public the groundlessness and falsehood of my assertions, and shown by facts well attested, that Congress had never been lavish of public money or given in any instance exorbitant salaries to any of her servants, had he done this it would have been to the purpose, he might have drawn his conclusions, as he does, but instead of this, without the least shadow of proof, he lumped the whole together as false and groundless assertions, wherein it appears he is really himself chargeable with the same impertinence, folly and falsehood he unreasonably charged me with.

Information and instruction is the grand design in writing for the public, and where these are neglected by an Author, and he descends to low banter and scurrility, or to bold, impudent negations, or positive dogmatical assertions instead of reason and argument, as Alfredus did in his first publication, and more especially in his last, he deserves to be despised, or rather to use his own simile, "to have the musket he has overloaded burst upon him with horrible recoil." Mr. Alfredus should have considered this when he was charging so high, and if by accident, in going off she sent him back to his cell, with all his impudence, he ought to have born it patiently, and considered that he himself was the moving cause. 4.17.20

I shall now make some observations on the unjust and illiberal sarcasms, passed by Mr. Alfredus, on our jurors:—And, as he has such a peculiar nack of leaping over important things, by saying "they are nothing to the purpose," or by stigmatizing them, "as impertinent observations, groundless assertions," etc. I shall copy his own words, and then follow, with the sentiments of the Hon. Justice Blackstone, who is one of the most celebrated Authors now extant. 4.17.21

Sir, in your publication of Friday, January 18th, ult. you say, "What are the advantages of this boasted trial by jury, and on which side do they lie? Not certainly on the side of justice, for one unprincipled juror, secured in the interest of the opposite party, will frequently divert her course, and in four cases out of five where injustice is done, it is by the ignorance or knavery of the jury." This, I may venture to affirm, is an impudent and bold stroke; it attacks the whole community at once, and has a tendency to sap and undermine the best preservative of liberty, and therefore ought to be held in abhorrence by every freeman; it is totally repugnant to the sense of the best writers on the subject, and especially to the ideas of the renowned author above mentioned, whose sentiments I shall now quote, vol. 3, page 378.[14] "When the jury have delivered in their verdict, and it is recorded in court, that ends the trial by jury; a trial which besides the other vast advantages which we have occasionally observed in its progress, is also as expeditious and cheap as it is convenient, equitable and certain: upon these accounts—the trial by jury has been, and I trust ever will be looked upon as the glory of the English law; and if it has so great an advantage over individuals in regulating civil property, how much must that advantage be heightened, when it is applied to criminal cases; it is the most transendant privilege which any subject can enjoy or wish for; he cannot be affected either in his property, his liberty or his person, but by the unanimous consent of twelve of his neighbours and equals; a Constitution that I may venture to affirm has, under Providence, secured the just liberties of the English nation for a long succession of ages; and therefore a celebrated French writer (Montesque) who concludes, that because Rome, Sparta, and Carthage have lost their liberties, therefore those of England in time must perish, should have recollected that Rome, Sparta and Carthage, at the time when their liberties were lost, were strangers to the trial by jury. 4.17.22

4.17.23 Great as this eulogium may seem, it is no more than this admirable Constitution, when traced to its principles, will be found, in sober reason, to deserve. The impartial administration of justice, which secures both our persons and properties, is the great end of civil society; but if that be entirely entrusted to the magistracy of a select body of men, and those generally selected by the Prince, or those who enjoy the highest offices in the state, their decision, in spite of their own natural integrity, will have frequently an involuntary bias toward those of their own rank and dignity; here therefore, a competent number of sensible and upright jurymen, chosen by lot from among those of the middle rank, will be found the best investigators of truth, and the surest guardians of public justice; for the most powerful individual in the state, will be cautious of committing any flagrant invasion of another's right, when he knows that the fact of his oppression, must be examined, and decided by twelve indifferent men, not appointed till near the hour of trial: and that, when once the fact is ascertained, the law must of course redress it—This therefore preserves, in the hands of the people, that share which they ought to have, in the administration of public justice; and prevents the encroachments of the more powerful and wealthy citizens.

4.17.24 Every new tribunal erected for the decision of facts, without the intervention of a jury, whether composed of justices of the peace; commissioners of the revenue; judges of a court of conscience; or any other standing magistrate, is a step towards establishing aristocracy, the most oppressive of absolute government. It is, therefore, upon the whole, the duty which every man owes to his country, his friends, his posterity, and himself, to maintain to the utmost of his power, this valuable Constitution in all its rights, and above all to guard with the most jealous circumspection against the introduction of new, and arbitrary methods of trial, which, under a variety of plausible pretences, may in time, imperceptibly undermine this best preservative of LIBERTY,"—Added to this, there is a late law of this state, which puts the pay, and travel of our jurors upon a very respectable footing—And lest Mr. Alfredus should say, this is nothing to the purpose, because the trial, by jury, under the English Constitution, may be very different from what it is in ours,—I will just mention, wherein they differ, under the English Constitution,—The jurors are returned by the sheriff.—under ours they are draughted by lot, from each town, which, I think, is the most equitable method, and as to the modes of process through the trials, they are nearly the same, both endeavour to do justice to the parties.[15]

4.17.25 To conclude, Mr. Alfredus, I will give you a word of advice—Do you, in future, attend the business that God and nature has formed you for and placed you in, for you make a much more respectable appearance there than you do in writing for a free people,—and should the proposed Constitution take place, let us see who will make the best member of it.

8. In his next essay, Alfredus replied to the charge here by inquiring, "Is all knowledge confined in grey heads? Was not Hercules competent to manly deeds even in his cradle? And have not some gentlemen of twenty more sagacity and skill in the sciences of polity and government than others who have grown hoary in public business?" "Old heads are not always the repositories of wisdom, nor do 'Young Gentlemen' always deserve the contempt in which you affect to hold them." New Hampshire Freeman's Oracle 8 February 1788. As Charles Warren, among others, has pointed out, the controversy over the Constitution was in some respects a controversy between generations, the young nationalists against the old revolutionaries. See also Stanley Elkins and Eric McKitrick, "The Founding Fathers: Young Men of the Revolution," Political Science Quarterly 76 (June 1961): 181–216. Cf. [Maryland] Farmer II, 5.1.19 n. 13.

9. A substantial portion of Alfredus' original reply had consisted of a quotation from James Wilson on the Bill of Rights. He quoted, not from the 6 October "Address to the Citizens of Philadelphia," to which A Farmer referred in his first essay, but from a speech of Wilson in the Pennsylvania ratifying convention on 28 November 1787. In this speech Wilson gives an argument in defense of the absence of a Bill of Rights that is different from and not altogether consistent with the one in the 6 October speech. In the earlier speech he had argued that in the case of the state governments "everything which is not reserved is given; but in the [case of the federal government] the reverse of the proposition prevails, and everything which is not given is reserved" (McMaster and Stone 143). But in the convention speech he argued much more broadly that the necessary implication of any constitution of civil government is that anything not given is reserved, that there is no necessity of explicit reservation, that in fact many of the states have no bill of rights, and that a bill of rights is not only unnecessary but may be dangerous in implying that what was not expressly reserved was meant to be given. Alfredus apparently quotes from the version of Wilson's speech printed in the Pennsylvania Herald 12 December 1787, and reprinted in McMaster and Stone 252–54. (A different report of the same speech is given in Elliot II, 434–37). See Federal Farmer IV, 2.8.50 nn. 38–40.

10. See 2.9, 4.9.

11. Alfredus goes on: "The fact is that under the present regulation, which most unreasonably (at least in civil cases) requires an unanimity in the verdict, juries favor the guilty much more than the innocent party." 18 January. See Old Whig III, 3.3.16 n. 17.

12. See 4.17.22–24.

13. The source of this quotation has not been found. Alfredus had contended, among other things, that the Constitution does not provide for a standing army, which he defines as "that which the supreme executive magistrate can raise by his own authority and support by permanent revenues beyond the controul of his subjects."

Regarding A Farmer's quotation, Alfredus replies in his essay of 8 February 1788: "Observe, Sir, where the force of the expression lies—'The profession of a soldier, taken merely and singly as a profession is justly an object of jealousy,' When considered as a security against inimical powers situated in the vicinity, the case is entirely different. While the present State of hostility between neighboring nations continues, troops will ever be necessary for the defence of frontier settlements, dock-yards, sea-ports, etc. Whatever may possibly be the consequence of annually voting such an army as these compose, the public security requires and will warrant our investing Congress with authority to do it. There is but one circumstance that can ever necessitate any other standing groups in times of peace, and that is the opposition that factious and licentious subjects will make to the execution of a firm and energetic government, when inconsistent with their interests and views."

14. The reference is correct and the quotation is substantially accurate, although A Farmer omits some words and phrases (e.g. the passage in Blackstone ends, "of English liberty," rather than "of liberty," as A Farmer has it).

15. Alfredus continues his criticism of trial by jury in the Freeman's Journal of 13 June, contending that the original purpose of the trial by jury, to stand between the powerful barons and the defenseless vassals, no longer exists in our governments. Trial by jury is nevertheless an eligible mode of trial in criminal and some civil cases, but it should be judged by actual results, the tendency of which is to give an advantage to the defendant. "If the design of judiciary courts is to protect guilt, or in better terms, to give the transgressor every chance to escape punishment, then some modes of trial as facilitate this impunity are just and right.—But if the strict and impartial administration of justice is the only object of their establishment, then such modes must be extremely faulty."

Charles Turner
Speeches in the Massachusetts Ratifying Convention

17 January and 6 February 1788

Charles Turner is described by Samuel Bannister Harding as "unquestionably the ablest and most dignified, as well as one of the most sincere, opponents of the new government."[1] Although both of these speeches from the Massachusetts ratifying convention are short, and although the latter explains Turner's vote for the Constitution, they provide an unusually clear view into the heart of the Anti-Federalist argument.

In the first speech (4.18.1) Turner argues against granting to Congress powers that may be abused, particularly the power to alter the place of choosing federal representatives. He denies that Congress can be trusted with wide powers on the assumption that it will be composed of sober and upright men. He contends, in fact, that there has been a moral deterioration in the country, arising from the operation of paper money and privateering, and that, while this increases the need for efficient government, the governors must be taken from the corrupt mass and will be further corrupted by their elevation. Turner's solution, to give no power that can be abused, is clearly at best a mitigation.

Turner presses more deeply into the problem of genuine self-government and the kind of leadership it requires in his second speech (4.18.2). He voted in favor of the Constitution (with amendments to be recommended) because of the vital and immediate need of efficient government; but he argues that the Constitution will not save the country from slavery and ruin without the prevalence of Christian piety and morals. He hopes that the new government will promote religion and moral principles and thus render the people more capable of being a law unto themselves, a far nobler task than building more and more rigorous governments to control a more and more turbulent and unjust people.

4.18.1 Mr. President, I am pleased with the ingenuity of some gentlemen in defence of this section [Art. I, sec. 4]. I am so impressed with the love of our liberty so dearly bought, that I heartily acquiesce in compulsory laws, for the people ought to be obliged to attend to their interest. But I do not wish to give Congress a power which they can abuse; and, I wish to know whether such a power is not contained in this section? I think it is. I now proceed, sir, to the consideration of an idea, that Congress may alter the place for chusing representatives in the general Congress—they may order that it may be at the extremity of a state, and by their influence, may there prevail that persons may be chosen, who otherwise would not; by reason that a part of the qualified voters in part of the state would be so incommoded thereby, as to be debarred from their right as much as if they were bound at home. If so, such a circumstance would militate against the constitution, which allows every man to vote. Altering the place will put it so far in the power of Congress, as that the representatives chosen will not be the true and genuine representatives of the people, but creatures of the Congress; and so far as they are so, so far are the people deprived of their rights, and the choice will be made in an irregular and unconstitutional manner. When this alteration is made by Congress—may we not suppose whose re-election will be provided for? Would it not be for those who were chosen before? The great law of self preservation will prevail. It is true, they might, one time in an hundred, provide for a friend, but most commonly for themselves. But, however honourable the convention may be who proposed this article, I think it is a genuine power for Congress to perpetuate themselves—a power that cannot be unexceptionably exercised in any case whatever:—Knowing the numerous arts, that designing men are prone to, to secure their election, and perpetuate themselves, it is my hearty wish that a rotation may be provided for. I respect and revere the convention who proposed this constitution. In order that the power given to Congress may be more palatable, some gentlemen are pleased to hold up the idea, that we may be blessed with sober, solid, upright men in Congress. I wish that we may be favoured with such rulers; but I fear they will not all, if most be the best moral or political characters. It gives me pain, and I believe it gives pain to others, thus to characterize the country in which I was born. I will endeavour to guard against any injurious reflections against my fellow citizens. But they must have their true characters, and if I represent them wrong, I am willing to make concessions. I think that the operation of paper money, and the practice of privateering, have produced a gradual decay of morals—introduced pride—ambition—envy—lust of power—produced a decay of patriotism, and the love of commutative justice; and I am apprehensive these are the invariable concomitants of the luxury, in which we are unblessedly involved, almost to our total destruction. In the lower ranks of people, luxury and avarice operate to the want of publick duty and the payment of debts. These demonstrate the necessity of an energetick government: As people become more luxurious, they become more incapacitated of governing themselves. And are we not so? A like people, a like prince: But suppose it should so happen, that the administrators of this constitution should be preferable to the corrupt mass of the people, in point of manners, morals, and rectitude; power will give a keen edge to the principles I have mentioned. Ought we not, then, to put all checks and controuls on governours for the publick safety: therefore, instead of giving Congress powers they may not abuse; we ought to withhold our hands from granting such, as must be abused if exercised. This is a general observation.[1] But to the point: At the time of the restoration, the people of England were so vexed, harrassed and worn down, by the anarchical and confused state of the nation, owing to the commonwealth not being well digested, that they took an opposite career; they ran mad with loyalty, and would have given Charles any thing he could have asked—Pardon me, sir, if I say I feel the want of an energetick government, and the dangers to which this dear country is reduced, as much as any citizen of the United States; but I cannot prevail on myself to adopt a government, which wears the face of power, without examining it. Relinquishing an hair's breadth in a constitution is a great deal; for by small degrees has liberty in all nations, been wrested from the hands of the people. I know great powers are necessary to be given to Congress, but I wish they may be well guarded.

5 February 1788

Mr. President,—Being advanced in life, and having endeavoured, I hope, with a faithful attention according to my ability, to assist my country in their trying difficulties and dangers, for more than twenty years; and as for three weeks past my state of health has been such as to render me unable to speak in this assembly, I trust I shall be heard with some indulgence while I express a few sentiments at this SOLEMN CRISIS. I have been averse to the reception of this Constitution while it was considered merely in its original form: But since the Hon. Convention have been pleased to agree to the recommendation of certain amendments, I acknowledge my mind is rec- 4.18.2 onciled. But even thus amended, I still see, or think I see several imperfections in it, and some which give me pain. Indeed, I never expect to see a Constitution free from imperfections; and considering the great diversity of local interests, views and habits; considering the unparalleled variety of sentiments among the citizens of the United States, I despair of obtaining a more perfect Constitution than this at present. And a Constitution preferable to the confederation must be obtained, and obtained soon, or we shall be an undone people. In my judgment there is a rational probability, a moral certainty, that the proposed amendments will meet the approbation of the several States in the Union. If there is any respect due to the hoary head of Massachusetts, it will undoubtedly have its proper influence in this case. The minds of gentlemen throughout the nation, must be impressed with such a sense of the necessity of all important UNION, especially in our present circumstances, as must strongly operate in favour of a concurrence. The proposed amendments are of such a liberal, such a generous, such a catholic nature and complexion, they are so congenial to the soul of every man who is possessed of a patriotick regard to the preservation of the just rights and immunities of his country, as well as to the institution of a good and necessary government, that I think they must, they will be UNIVERSALLY accepted. When in connection with this confidence I consider the deplorable state of our NAVIGATION and COMMERCE, and various branches of business thereon dependent, the inglorious and provoking figure we make in the eyes of our European creditors, the degree in which the landed interest is burdened and depreciated, the tendency of depreciating paper and tender acts, to destroy mutual confidence, faith and credit, to prevent the circulation of specie, and to overspread the land with an inundation, a chaos of multiform injustice, oppression and knavery; when I consider that want of efficiency there is in our government, as to obliging people seasonably to pay their dues to the public, instead of spending their money in support of luxury and extravagance, of consequence the inability of government to satisfy the just demands of its creditors, and to do it in season, so as to prevent their suffering amazingly by depreciation; in connection with my anxious desires that my ears may be no longer perstringed, nor my heart pained with the cries of the injured, suffering WIDOW, and ORPHAN; when I also consider that state of our finances which daily exposes us to become a prey to the despotick humour even of an impotent invader, I find myself constrained to say, before this Assembly, and before GOD, that I think it my duty, to give my vote in favour of this Constitution, with the proposed amendments; and unless some further light shall be thrown in my way to influence my opinion, I shall conduct accordingly. I know not whether this Convention will vote a ratification of this Constitution, or not. If they should do it, and have the concurrence of the other States, may that GOD, who has always in a remarkable manner watched over us and our fathers for good, in all difficulties, dangers and distresses, be pleased to command his Almighty Blessing upon it, and make it instrumental of restoring justice, honour, safety, support and salvation to a sinking land. But I hope it will be considered by persons of all orders, ranks and ages, that without the prevalence of Christian piety, and morals, the best republican Constitution can never save us from slavery and ruin.[2] If vice is predominant, it is to be feared we shall have rulers whose grand object will be (slyly evading the spirit of the Constitution) to enrich and aggrandize themselves and their connections, to the injury and oppression of the laborious part of the community; while it follows from the moral constitution of the DEITY, that prevalent iniquity must be the ruin of any people. The world of mankind have always in general, been enslaved and miserable, and always will be until there is a greater prevalence of Christian moral principles; nor have I an expectation of this, in any great degree, unless some superiour mode of education shall be adopted. It is EDUCATION which almost entirely forms the character, the freedom or slavery, the happiness or misery of the world.[3] And if this Constitution shall be adopted, I hope the Continental Legislature will have the singular honour, the indelible glory, of making it one of their first acts, in their first session, most earnestly to recommend to the several States in the Union, the institution of such means of education, as shall be adequate to the divine, patriotick purpose of training up the children and youth at large, in that solid learning, and in those pious and moral principles, which are the support, the life and SOUL of the republican government and liberty, of which a free Constitution is the body; for as the body without the spirit is dead, so a free form of government without the animating principles of piety and virtue, is dead also, being alone. May religion, with sanctity of morals prevail and increase, that the patriotic civilian and ruler may have the sublime, parental satisfaction of eagerly embracing every opportunity of mitigating the rigours of government, in proportion to that increase of morality which may render the people more capable of being a law to themselves. How much more blessed THIS, than to be employed in fabricating Constitutions of an higher tone in obedience to necessity, arising from an increase of turbulent vice and injustice in society. I believe your Excellency's patience will not be further exercised, by hearing the sound of my voice on the occasion, when I have said; may the United States of America live before GOD! May they be enlightened, pious, virtuous, free and happy to all generations!

1. The notes kept by Chief Justice Parsons of this part of the speech are probably more accurate: . . . He thinks a rotation is necessary in the lower house to guard against the deep arts of popular men; has well grounded fears that some of the rulers would be bad men—we must therefore guard against them; that paper money and privateering has introduced corruption and immorality, and a disregard to private and public justice. In consequence of that corruption, it requires a more energetic Federal government; but the rulers will be taken out of this corrupt mass. Like prince like people, and promotion will increase the corruption. Every possible guard must be devised, therefore, against rulers; therefore, Congress must not have the power in the fourth section, because they cannot use it without abusing it." Letter from The Yeomanry of Massachusetts

MASSACHUSETTS GAZETTE
25 January 1788

This typical Massachusetts assault on the "aristocratic party" contains a defense of Elbridge Gerry and is notable for its attack on Washington as a slaveholder.

Mr. Allen,

Please to insert the following in your FREE PAPER, and you will oblige a number of free born people.

To the Publick.

Many are the arts made use of by our aristocratick gentlemen, to accommodate the federal constitution to the taste of the yeomanry of the country. But it is very unlucky for them, that they should be so far misled, as to attempt to trump up one thing which appears by no means to be founded in truth, viz. that none but placemen and pensioners are opposed to it.[1] This is so far from quadrating with truth, that we conceive it to be an absolute falshood. We would ask the disinterested part of the community just to look over the characters which are so fond of swallowing this creature, which exhibits all the pourtraits of an over-bearing aristocracy, and see if they are not chiefly composed of salary men and pensioners, and those who at least think themselves fair candidates for places of honour and emolument, whenever the aristocratick wheels of the federal chariot shall be set in motion. 4.19.1

When we see the adherents to this constitution chiefly made up of civil and ecclesiastical gown men, and their dependents, the expedient they have hit upon is not likely to have the intended effect. There are many men destitute of eloquence, yet they can see and hear—They can think and judge, and are therefore not likely to be wheedled out of their senses by the 4.19.2

sophistical reasonings of all the advocates for this new constitution in the country combined. We know this is not true; and as we well know the design of such representations, we would have those gentlemen know, that it will not take. They must pull upon some other string, or they must fail. Another thing they tell us, that the constitution must be good, from the characters which composed the Convention that framed it.[2] It is graced with the names of a Washington and a Franklin. Illustrious names, we allow—worthy characters in civil society. Yet we cannot suppose them, to be infallible guides, neither yet that a man must necessarily incur guilt to himself merely by dissenting from them in opinion.

4.19.3 We cannot think the noble general, has the same ideas with ourselves, with regard to the rules of right and wrong. We cannot think, he acts a very consistent part, or did through the whole of the contest with Great Britain: who, notwithstanding he wielded the sword in defence of American liberty, yet at the same time was, and is to this day, living upon the labours of several hundreds of miserable Africans, as free born as himself; and some of them very likely descended from parents who, in point of property and dignity in their own country, might cope with any man in America. We do not conceive we are to be overborne by the weight of any names, however revered. "ALL MEN ARE BORN FREE AND EQUAL;" if so, every man hath a natural and unalienable right to his own opinion, and, for asserting this right, ought not to be stigmatized with the epithets of tenacious and dogmatical. If we were to pin our faith on any sleeves but our own (without derogating in the least from the merit of any one of the Massachusetts delegates in the federal convention) we should be as likely to pin it on the sleve of the hon. mr. Gerry as any one of them.[3] But we mean to see with our own eyes, and thus seeing to act for ourselves. In this view, as a tribute due from us to that hon. gentleman, we must acknowledge his tenderness, his care for the preservation of the liberties of the people, and his desire on all occasions to preserve them from invasion. This hon. gentleman was one who assisted in rearing the pillars of a republican government, he has ever since aided in the support of them, and thus hath acted a much more consistent part than those his brethren, who, after all the expense and fatigue of rearing the building, are now for razing the foundations, destroying instead of repairing the frame, and erecting another, which by no means can answer the good purpose of sheltering the people from storms. But, to lay aside metaphor—

4.19.4 This gentleman is much more consistent, than those who are for turning our republican government into a hateful aristocracy. And we must think it very dishonourable in the aristocratical party, to treat the worthy gentleman, in the manner they have done in the publick papers: We can assure them it has been far from helping their cause. We do not wish to tire the publick, but would hint to those gentlemen, who would rob the people of their liberties, that their sophistry is not like to produce the effect. We are willing to have a federal constitution. We are willing another trial should be made; this may be done without derogating from the gentlemen, who composed the late convention. In framing a constitution for this commonwealth, two trials were made before one would stick. We are willing to relinquish so much, as to have a firm, energetick government, and this we are sensible may be done, without becoming slaves, to the capricious fancies of any sett of men whatever. It is argued, that there is no danger that the proposed rulers will be disposed to exercise any powers that this constitution puts into their hands, which may enable them to deprive the people of their liberties. But in case, say they, they should make such attempts, the people may, and will rise to arms and prevent it;[4] in answer to which, we have only to say, we have had enough of fighting in the late war, and think it more eligible, to keep our liberties in our own hands, whilst it is in our power thus to do, than to place them in the hands of fallible men, like ourselves, who may if they please, entirely deprive us of them, and so we be at last reduced to the sad alternative of losing them forever, or recovering them back by the point of the sword. The aristocratick party are sensible, that these are the sentiments of the majority of the community, and their conduct plainly evinces the truth, of a well known ancient adage—"Nothing cuts like the truth."

Essay by An American

(BOSTON) AMERICAN HERALD
28 January 1788

In another attack on Washington, An American interprets Washington's letter to Charles Carter to imply that the Constitution will be imposed by force.

4.20.1 We have been frequently advertised in the public papers, that General Washington, when he set his hand to the proposed Constitution, uttered these words—"THIS IS, PERHAPS, THE LAST TIME THE AMERICANS WILL HAVE AN OPPORTUNITY, COOLLY, TO SET DOWN, AND AGREE UPON A FORM OF GOVERNMENT."[1] The mode of expression from a Soldier,—from a Man, who, besides the CINCINNATI, could call out many followers—from a Man, who stands in the public eye, the sole candidate for Chief Ruler of all the States: From such a one, it was as void of prudence as it was of foundation.—This has alarmed many patriots, and given pain to many of his friends—but they all feel a respectful delicacy towards that Great Man, and have therefore been silent, while they might have observed, that, as the motion made by Virginia for a General Convention, was so readily agreed to by all the States; and that as the people were so very zealous for a good Federal Government, though this plan, which was aided in its birth by that Great Man, should fail, the people could again set themselves down coolly, to make another.—The mode of expression might have been animadverted upon. THE LAST TIME they would have an OPPORTUNITY!—From whom do they receive this OPPORTUNITY, but from Heaven?—And who shall withhold the boon?

4.20.2 Had not his letter appeared in the papers, fully explanatory of his ideas, still the regard all feel for him, might have constrained a decent silence.[2] In this letter he says, "MY DECIDED OPINION IS, THAT THERE IS NO ALTERNATIVE BETWEEN THE ADOPTION OF IT (that is the proposed Constitution) AND ANARCHY." One would suppose it very strange, that a Convention of fifty members, however respectable, should have such an opinion of their own sagacity, that when they had performed a task which they took upon themselves, they supposed that three millions of people could not amend it, or wish an alteration! and that unless this identical System, with every letter and figure thereof should be adopted, all Government would be at an end, "Old Chaos would come back again, and nothing but anarchy ensue!"—No new Convention, no new set of men can ever agree again, why?—Because miracles have ceased.

But he goes on,—"IF ONE STATE, however important it may conceive itself to be, or a minority of them, should suppose, that they can dictate a Constitution to the Union, unless they have the power of applying the ULTIMO RATIO, to good effect, they will find themselves deceived."—One expression more ought to be attended to, in order to find the General's meaning:—"GENERAL GOVERNMENT IS NOW SUSPENDED BY A THREAD—I MIGHT GO FURTHER, AND SAY, IT IS REALLY AT AN END."—The proposed Constitution, is by the recommendation of the Convention, to be in force when nine States shall ratify it; if seven or eight out of 13 agree to it, yet the old Confederation remains until the people agree upon another.—But General Washington tells us, that the General Government is at an end already, and that unless the New Plan is adopted, anarchy and confusion takes place, and that a minority, unless they can apply the Ultimo ratio with good effect, will find themselves deceived. I do by no means wish to put an uncandid construction upon this letter, but I cannot resist the conclusion, that the General has declared, that this Constitution shall be supported by the ULTIMO RATIO, that is by force. 4.20.3

What is a Tyranny, but a Government forced by the stronger upon the weaker?—How imprudent then must the General be to make these declarations?—Does our soil produce no more Washington's? Is there none left who would oppose the attempt to establish a Government by force?—Can we not call from the fields, the counters, the bar, and mechanics' shops, any more Generals?—Is our soil exhausted?—And does any one suppose that the Americans, like the Romans, will submit to an Army merely because they have conquered a foreign enemy? 4.20.4

The truth is that we cannot exist without a General Government, and that great thanks are due to the Convention for the plan they offer; but should the body of the people, or even a majority of the States, wish for alterations, before they ratify the work, surely they may be obtained without bloodshed, without the ULTIMO RATIO. And the majority with usual American candour, will yield to their brethren. 4.20.5

1. "Should the States reject this excellent Constitution, the probability is that an opportunity will never again offer to cancel another in peace—the next will be drawn in blood." Pennsylvania Journal 14 November 1787; Massachusetts Centinel 24 November 1787; Massachusetts Gazette 3 December 1787; Boston Gazette 3 December 1787, etc. Curtis, Constitutional History I, 672; Charles Warren, The Making of the Constitution (Cambridge, Mass., 1937) 717. Warren points out that, since the remark is not given by Madison in his notes on the Convention, there is some doubt of its authenticity. See Cato II, 2.6.7 n. 4.

2. In a letter to Charles Carter, Washington wrote: "My decided opinion of the matter is that there is no alternative between the adoption of it and anarchy. If one State however important it may conceive itself to be should suppose, or a minority of the States, that they can dictate a Constitution to the Majority unless they have the power of administering to good effect, administering the Ultema ratio they will find themselves deceived. . . . General Government is now suspended by a thread. I might go farther and say it is really at an end, and what will be the consequence of a fruitless attempt to amend the one which is offered, before it is tried, or of the delay from the attempt, does not in my judgment need the gift of Prophecy to predict." Documentary History of the Constitution IV, 406–7. The meaning of the "ultema ratio" comment is not entirely clear, but it was taken by the Anti-Federalists, in the context of this letter, as a threat to impose the Constitution by force if necessary. While Washington complained of the unauthorized publication of this private letter, containing some hastily written "exceptionable language," James Madison thought it may have been of service, "notwithstanding the scandalous misinterpretations of it which have been attempted." Letter from A Bostonian

(BOSTON) AMERICAN HERALD
4 February 1788

A Bostonian urges that judges should be excluded from the legislature. The constitution of a democracy requires simplicity and brevity, not the vagueness and ambiguity favored by the men of the law.

Mr. Powars,

While the hon. Convention are attending to amendments to the Constitution before them, it is presumable, they will not omit one, which, in my opinion, will tend to the greatest security of the liberty of the people—That an effectual barrier be made against the legislative and judicial departments being constituted in the same persons—I say effectual. In doing which, it will become evidently necessary, that the gentlemen of the law, who are expounders thereof in the judiciary department should be excluded from a seat in the legislative.—I need not explain the evil tendency which an union ever had, and ever will have: It has been acknowledged, I believe, the greatest defects in the Massachusetts Constitution, and while 99 out of 100 of its inhabitants acknowledge the reasonableness of this proposition, no wonder those gentlemen are so extremely anxious for the present adoption of this Constitution, knowing, that should it go out to the people, that this security would be the first object of their attention, and that an adjournment would have this effect. But, say the 'order,' "shall we be divested of our privileges as citizens?"—Pray, why do not the Judges of the Judical Court, the State Attorney, the Judges of Probate complain? Is it not evident, that if it is thought expedient to prohibit those characters from a seat in the legislature, gentlemen who have stated salaries, and therefore cannot be thought to have that local interest in view that may reasonably be supposed the other branch of the same court have, that they also should be debarred?—Is it not contradictory to every precept of human wisdom and inconsistent in its nature, that the expounders of law, men whose fortune and dependence depend principally on its inaccuracy, its vague and ambiguous terms, its incomprehensibleness, should be the framers thereof?—I say no wonder those gentlemen are for swallowing it down in its present form, while they naturally suppose they are conceived necessary agents in making laws to be the supreme law of the land, and at the same time harvesting in the Judicial department.—Business enough to be sure, stepping from one court to the other, within the circuit of a court-yard, while almost every civil action of considerable magnitude between citizens of different states, besides a multiplicity of other trials are to pass thro' their hands.—I say there are many alterations necessary to be made in the new Constitution before it will suit the people not only of Massachusetts but of New-England in general, but no one of so much consequence as the one proposed; for when the legislature of a nation are composed of men only, whose happiness depends on the simplicity and brevity as well as energy of the laws of their country, then may we expect to find a code suited to the genius of the people, and applicable to a republican government.—It is inconsistent to suppose, that the same laws substituted to a monarchial, or aristocratical government, should be adequate to the simple and comprehensive constitution of a democracy—I cannot but wish the Constitution to be adopted, with amendments; but, inasmuch as I conceive this Convention has no authority or power to make any, they will prove futile in Congress with respect to a ratification, as Congress has not power to take cognizance of them by the proposed Constitution.—If the Constitution is good, and cannot be amended for the better, then no injury can happen by delay, as its advocates will naturally increase, and its opponents diminish.

Address by A Watchman

WORCESTER MAGAZINE
February 1788

The essay of A Watchman is unusual in three respects. It is one of two significant Anti-Federalist essays from the western part of Massachusetts; it is explicitly democratic in its principles; and the author defends the government of Rhode Island. Written in the accents of the backcountry, the essay appeared in the Worcester Magazine for the first week of February 1788 (vol. 4, no. 19). A Watchman warns against the destruction of Massachusetts democracy by the aristocratic principles of the proposed Constitution. Of special interest among his list of objections (and not untypical) are the claims that liberty of conscience is not provided for and that the door is opened for Jews, Turks, and Heathen to enter public offices. Samuel Bannister Harding suggests that the essay "illustrates, probably, the effect of inflammatory articles, such as those by 'A Republican Federalist' and 'John deWitt,' upon the mind of the average farmer, and may be looked upon as representing the sentiments of the majority of the Antifederalists of that section."[1]

1. Contest over Ratification 35.

(The following was a few days since sent us for publication; as it is the first piece written in this county, against the Federal Constitution, that has been offered to us for publication, we think proper, in order to shew impartiality, to publish it, notwithstanding the author evidently appears to be much mistaken in some of his assertions.)

To the Citizens of the United States.

Men, Brethren, and Sisters,

Hearken! it is now a critical time with us, and a time in which we ought to be upon our watch, and upon our guard. Now is the time for us to look out; 4.22.1

now is the time for us to take care; now is the time for us to see that nothing is done to deprive us of our religious, or our civil liberties.

Our government at present is democratical, that is, the power is in the people; we are allowed to choose our rulers, make our own laws, and perform religious worship according to the dictates of our own consciences; and by our constitution a freedom of speech, and the liberty of the press, are allowed to every one of us. But although we are under such an excellent constitution, behold a new one is presented to us for our reception, which appears much like an aristocratical form; and will, if it is established, demolish a part of our democratical government, and deprive us of a part of our liberties.

4.22.2 Before we suffer this new constitution to be established, we ought to consider seriously what it contains, and whether it is calculated to promote our felicity? or whether, like a wolf in sheep's clothing, it is calculated to vest certain men with more power, deprive us of our liberties, and bring our land into lordships, and lead us into vassalage and slavery, like the poor people in Holland, who, after they had obtained their independency, lost their power, and were not suffered to have any voice in their government, no not so much as to choose their representatives.

4.22.3 How often has it been ringing in our ears from every quarter of the United States, that our present constitution is the best that ever was or ever could be established; if that be true, pray what need is there of an alteration—what need have we to alter a constitution that is every way perfect; if we should suffer our democratical government to be demolished, and an aristocratical one established, it is probable that in a few years some designing men will attempt to pull that down, and set up one that is monarchical, and so bring the country under a military government.

4.22.4 Permit me then, my beloved brethren and sisters, to point out wherein this new constitution is deficient.

1st. There is no bill of rights in it. 2d. Although different religions are allowed to set in Congress, yet there is no liberty given to the people to perform religious worship according to the dictates of their consciences. 3d. There is a door opened for the Jews, Turks, and Heathen to enter into publick office, and be seated at the head of the government of the United States. 4th. There is nothing said about the people being allowed the freedom of speech and the liberty of the press. 5th. It divides Congress into three branches, as President, Senate, and a house of Representatives, which will be a great clog to business, and a hindrance to the making of laws with expedition and dispatch. 6th. It deprives men that are endowed with the wisdom that is from above, from entering into Congress; unless they have arrived at a certain age, and have abode in the states a certain quantity of time. 7th. It augments the members of Congress, and makes the government more expensive. 8th. It deprives the people of the liberty of choosing their delegates to Congress annually, and of recalling them when they please. 9th.

It almost annihilates the state governments, and deprives their legislation of the power of making their own laws. 10th. It makes no provision against the keeping a standing army in a time of peace. 11th. It deprives the people of the power of levying and collecting their own taxes. 12th. It vests Congress with power to tax all the states, to send forth collectors, and enforce the payment of taxes by a standing army. 13th. It vests Congress with power to run the people into debt, by borrowing money of foreign nations, upon the credit of the United States; and it doth not oblige the members of that assembly to render any account of the expenditure of the same, if they shall see fit to secret it. 14th. No provision is made in it against having the civil power subject to the military, nor against having people that do not belong to an army or navy tried and punished by the military laws. 15th. It deprives the people in the several states of the liberty of making their own constitution, and vests it in the hands of Congress. 16th. It deprives the inhabitants of each state of the power of choosing their superiour and inferiour judges.

Thus have I exhibited some of the deficiencies in our new Constitution, 4.22.5
perhaps more might be mentioned; but although there are some deficiencies, yet there are many excellent things that are worthy of our reception and establishment, providing our constitution is deficient. Some people are averse to a democratical government, because they esteem it to be the most expensive and irregular; but the governments of Connecticut and Rhodeisland have been such from their first settlement; they have chose their own officers, and made and executed their own laws, and where can we find cheaper and more regular governments than they have been?

Thus, my beloved friends, have I given you the foregoing hints, that you may be upon your guard, and ward off the impending danger. Keep the power in your own hands, and let nothing be established that may deprive you of your liberties and make you unhappy.

A Watchman.

A Friend to the Rights of the People
Anti-Fœderalist, No. I

and

A Friend of the Republic
Anti-Fœderalist, No. II

(NEW HAMPSHIRE) FREEMAN'S ORACLE
8 February 1788

The first of these two essays is addressed to the inhabitants of New Hampshire and the other to the New Hampshire ratifying convention. At least one of them seems to have been written by Thomas Cogswell, author of the essays of A [New Hampshire] Farmer. The reason for the different pseudonyms is probably the different audiences addressed rather than different writers, but it is quite possible that the essays were written by different men and that it was the printer who labeled them (what the opponents of the Constitution seldom called themselves) "Anti-Fœderalist I and II."[1]

The essays exhibit a typical Anti-Federalist distrust of political authority and fear of the corrupting effects of luxury and the taste for foreign manners, which the new Constitution encourages. Two points in the first essay are of particular interest. In discussing the powers of Congress, A Friend to the Rights of the People declaims warmly on the need for frugality, on the growth of luxury and European fashions that will be stimulated by the Constitution, and on the effects of the federal city, with its probable palace for the president, amphitheater, circus and assembly (4.23.3[3–4]). He criticizes the discarding of all religious tests and makes an emphatic if not profound defense of the civil utility of religion (4.23.3[9]). He also criticizes the excessively lengthy terms of office, the provision for congressional alteration of the times, manner and place of elections, the sanctioning of the slave trade, the President's powers of appointment, the extensive judicial power, and the provision for new states, which amounts to a guarantee by the rest of the states of New York's claims to Vermont.

The essay by A Friend to the Republic is shorter but similar in tone. The "republic" of which the author is a friend appears to be New Hampshire, the essay beginning with a warning that ratification of the Constitution will amount to a surrender to Congress of all the liberties, privileges, and immunities of New Hampshire. The writer scorns James Wilson's explanation of the absence of a bill of rights, advises the delegates to read the writings of critics of the Constitution, and, in the most interesting passage in the essay (4.23.8), denies that such mighty talents are necessary for government as some claim. Plain honesty and common sense are sufficient; great abilities are more often than not employed to mislead the multitude and to deflect them from the "open and plain paths of public virtue and public good."

1. A Federalist writer, Alfredus, identifies Cogswell as the author of Anti-Federalist No. II (A Friend to the Republic), which is not denied. See the New Hampshire Freeman's Oracle 13 June 1788. However, the same hand that correctly identifies A [New Hampshire] Farmer as Thomas Cogswell on the pertinent American Antiquarian Society copies of the Freeman's Oracle also identifies Cogswell as the author of A Friend to the Rights of the People but not of A Friend to the Republic. See [New Hampshire] Farmer 4.17 intro. n. 1.

Anti-Federalist, No. I.

To the Inhabitants of New-Hampshire.

The grand topick of the day is the New-Constitution, much has been said 4.23.1
for, much has been said against it by able writers—On one side, it is warmly asserted, that the liberties of the people, are sufficiently secure, as it now stands—On the other it is urged with equal vehemence, they are not, amendments must be made—a Bill of Rights prefixed, or we are undone; so that it is very difficult, for common people to know what is right, any thing that may serve to throw light upon the subject, may be very useful at this juncture. Both sides, it appears to me, so far as I have had opportunity of reading, have kept the Constitution too much out of view. There seems to be a necessity of a more particular and impartial examination of the thing itself, which is the bone of so much contention.

If the plan of Federal Government, proposed for our consideration and 4.23.2
acceptance, is secure, and well expressed in all its branches, then it will appear so upon a candid explanation, and no man ought to oppose it; or say any thing privately or publickly to prejudice any person against it; no good citizen would, in so doing, he would manifest himself to be an enemy to this country and posterity; and would deservedly be dispised by all the virtuous part of the community.—But if there are a number of things insecure, and of dangerous tendency in the Constitution itself, they may be made to appear upon fair and faithful examination; and no wise man would wish to rest the vast weight of national government upon a sandy foundation, which may give way, and let the fair structure of liberty, erected at such an infinite expence of blood and treasure, fall into ruins.—Certainly no good citizen would approve of such an establishment, nor could be recommend it to the choice and adoption of others; if he did he must counteract his own, and the general interest and all the benevolent sentiments of reason and humanity. It is therefore of vast importance that the constitution should be well considered, and carefully examined, for upon that and nothing else, rationally explained, according to the common usage of words, must we found our judgment of its goodness or badness;—My design therefore is to quote, and make some remarks upon some of the most capital propositions.

4.23.3 Remark, I. Upon the time for which Congress is to be chosen on the new plan, Art. 1. Sect. 2.—The house of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States—Sect. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years—Art. 2. Sect. 1. The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States, he shall hold his office during the term of four years, and the Vice President shall be chosen for the same term. By this it plainly appears, that the Representatives of Congress are to hold their offices, for two, each of the Presidents for four, and the Senators for six years successively. This appears to me with not so favorable an aspect upon the liberties of the people, as if their session had been for a shorter term—Common sense teaches, that when public officers are chosen annually, or only for a short time at once; they naturally feel themselves more dependent upon the people, and consequently their obligations will be stronger to fidelity in their public trust—their fears will be alarmed on the one hand against maladministration, lest they be displaced at the next election—their hopes animated, on the other, to good conduct, in prospect of the approbation of their citizens, in a new choice; the people therefore have the strongest hold of their rulers, by having it in their power, soon to displace them upon misconduct; and consequently their liberties are more firmly established, by frequent elections than otherwise. It may be said here, that the longer men continue in office, the better they will be qualified for it, and consequently capable of doing more good. It may be so, and if they behave well, I would have them chosen again, and again, and so long as they approve themselves faithful to the public. But, on the supposition of their proving ill, the shorter their term in office the better—they will do much the least mischief to the community—and the chance of their proving ill, is at least as great, if not greater, than the contrary. There were more wicked kings in the nation of Israel, than good ones—and human nature is still the same, the bias to evil stronger than to good; the balance therefore preponderates against electing any persons for a long time together in any office; common prudence will teach us better. No wise man will contract with a menial servant for four or six years at once; he will chuse to engage him for a short term first, and if he proves faithful, he will renew the contract, if otherwise, he can easily discard him. The case holds equally good, with the honorary servants of the state: Here therefore, were I to give my opinion, I would advise, that no person be chosen into any office in Congress, for more than one or at the most two years at a time.—We choose all our legislative body annually, our members of Congress have been chosen but for one year at a time; and in that, short as it is, they have taken some pretty large strides—What may we not expect, in treeble the term, furnished with such very extensive powers. The long parliament in England was one of the worst, that ever disgraced the annals of mankind—the truth is, power long continued, makes men giddy, turns the head, and heart too, many times. The most promising characters, at first, have proved the worst in less than six years. Nero was one of the best among the Roman Emperors, at his first entering the Imperial throne, in a short time, he proved a monster of iniquity.

Remark 2. Upon the election of Senators and Representatives, Art. 1. Sect. 4.—The time, places, and manner of holding elections, for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but Congress may, at any time, by law make, or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators—By this it evidently appears, that Congress are to have power to alter, only the regulations the legislature may make respecting the time and manner of choosing Senators; the place which is much the most important is secured to the electors—But in the choice of the representative body, Congress may alter, not only the regulations of the time and manner, but the place of the election—the consequence is plain, Congress will, upon this plan, have full power to order all persons qualified, to appear at their shire towns, or their respective capitols, or even at the ten mile district to give in their votes for representatives—by this means nine tenths, or ninety-nine hundredths of the people, may be, yea must be wholly excluded from having any voice in the election. Where there is equal liberty, what privilege will the people have left: Fair & equal representation includes the whole privilege of the people, and if this may be curtailed, shackled or impeded at the pleasure and controul of Congress, farewell freedom—we may welcome tyranny with her galling chains. It may be said, this is overstraining the article, and no such thing was ever designed, or tho't of by the framers of the Constitution; if not, I would ask, how come the exception of place of election to be made; in one case, and not in the other—Was it not just as easy to have made the reserve to the people, as to the legislature. The making it to the one and not to the other, looks like a design to have an undue controul over the popular election; this breaths the spirit of British tyranny. The parliamentary influence is so great in England in the election of the members of the house of Commons, that some sensible writers have observed, that the people there have only the shadow, not the reality of liberty—This great and fundamental priviledge of the people, ought therefore to be well secured in the national plan of government—It is so in our State Constitution: all persons qualified shall be intitled to vote within the town, destrict, or parish where they dwell in the choice of Representatives; I can see no reason why the people ought not to have equal liberty, in the choice of Representatives for Congress—they must abide the consequence of what they do; they must pay taxes and duties laid by them—They ought therefore to have a full voice in their appointment; and so far as they may be deprived of it, by the alteration of the places of election, so far they are deprived of real liberty.

Remark 3. Upon the mode of paying Congress, art. 1, sect. 6. The Senators and Representatives, shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States, art. 2. The President shall at stated times receive a compensation for his services, &c.—Here, it is plain, that the salaries of the members of Congress are to be ascertained and fixed by law—But who are to make this law? It is not said—I presume it is not the several state legislatures—They are an inferior order and cannot give law to a superior—It must then be a law of their own making, by which their salaries will be ascertained—How far Congress will extend this power (provided the Constitution is adopted) there is no man alive can tell—It is left without bound or limitation—and we may be sure, from the craving appetites of men for gain, it will be stretched as far as the patience, and abilities of the people will bear—European fashions have been transplanted into America—The high taste of foreign Courts will be relished by Congress—They must live in all the splendor of equipage and attendance—Their revenue must be equivalent—This being an infant country, and besides loaded with a large debt, will by no means be able to support it. It appears to me therefore, it would be very imprudent, in the United States to let Congress go to the continental Chest, and take out as much money as they please for their services, tho' under form of law—Common sense will teach us better—No wise householder will let her servants make a law to fix their own wages, or dip as deep as they please in his coffers—Nor will any wise community give a greater liberty to the ruling servants of the state—Some bounds ought to be set, otherwise there is no safety.[1]

It may be objected here, that our General Court vote their own salary, and yet they are very moderate in their demands. It is true, but they stand, only for a year at a time, are under the constant inspection of the people; and the Representative branch draw their wages directly from their Constituents, who watch them very narrowly; so that they have no opportunity to be lavish of publick money—The case will be very different with Congress upon the new plan—They will stand on an average three or four times as long—The greater part will be several hundred miles distant from their constituents—They will draw from the Continental Treasury, over which they themselves will have the most ample controul, and besides by another power granted, art. 1. They have liberty to secrete such parts of their conduct, as in their judgment, may require secrecy—It is easy for men to believe secrecy, when it is for their own interest, how much soever it may be against the publick—Thus then, the disposal of publick money may constitutionally become one of the Arcana Imperii of Congress—For my part, I think here is a wide door open for great abuse; and it will be the wisdom of the states to shut it, by setting some bound to the salaries of their own officers—and this seems to be the more necessary, because we are loaded with a heavy debt, in order to clear it the greatest Œconomy is requisite in all our public expences. America is like a man who has a fine homestead and some out lands, but owes a large sum taken up, on interest; with care and frugality in all his expences, he can clear the interest and sink a little of the principal annually, and so finally discharge the whole. But if he drinks and games, and squanders in riotous living, he will very soon become a bankrupt; so we may, by care and prudence in our public expences, support our own government, pay the interest of our public debt, and a small part of the principal; so as in time to sink the whole—But if we lavish away our public money, and the ruling part of this young nation, will pattern after all the luxuries of European Courts, our revenue will not be sufficient to support our own government, and pay the interest to France and Holland; more money must be borrowed (if we have credit) the consequence follows, we shall sink deeper and deeper into debt, till the United States become a bankrupt.[2]

Remark 4. Upon the power of Congress, Sec. 8—They shall have power to raise and support armies; to provide and maintain a navy.—It is not mentioned expressly here when these armies are to be raised, and supported by Congress, whether in a time of peace, or war; it will be said in a time of war, or expectation of actual invasion, where there is a necessity of them, let it be so—But what is there here or in any other part of this Constitution to limit, or oblige Congress to disband the army when the war is at an end, for my part I can find nothing, it is true, in the following clause, it is said, that no appropriation of money for that use shall be for a longer term than two years; this amounts to no more, than that every second year, there shall be a new vote of Congress to appropriate money to the support of the army, upon this plan, an army may be continued, as long as they can get a vote for it; it will then be in the breast of Congress wholly to say, whether they shall exist in a time of peace; if they say they shall be kept up, they may tax the people to support them, and upon their non-compliance send the army to enforce payment, at the point of the sword; it will then to all intents and purposes upon this constitution, be in the power of congress to keep a standing army, in time of peace, their being voted every two years does not alter the case; great Britain has, as real a standing army as France, or Spain, and yet they are voted every year by parliament—Standing armies are ever dangerous, and have, always been accounted inconsistant with the liberties of a free people: it is not therefore safe, to entrust this power in the hands of any set of men without some greater limitation than is to be found in this Constitution;—As to the power of building a navy, it is also left unlimited in the hands of Congress, it is not said, where they shall begin, nor how far they shall proceed, in the exercise of it, they may, if they please, immediately upon the adoption of this plan, lay heavy and burthensome taxes upon the people to build and maintain a fleet of ships, and yet go exactly according to the Constitution—Another unlimited power to be vested in Congress is that of exclusive Legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such a district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by the cession of particular states, and the acceptance of Congress become the seat of government of the United States—We are not told in particular, what use is to be made of this district, but, no doubt, great designs are to be accomplished here equal to the authority to be delegated—A magnificent city, must be built to be the capital of the Empire—A spacious Congress house erected; A splended palace for the President—An amphitheatre for plays—A circus for games—An assembly for balls &c. (they will need no churches for public worship, for by the Constitution there is to be no religious test required in Congress)—All this will be done at the expence of the United States, for it is said, Congress shall have authority to make all laws necessary, and proper to carry into execution the foregoing powers; therefore they may constitutionally make laws for the accomplishment of the above purposes, and taxes may be levied of the people, or money borrowed of some European Power to defray the enormous expence.

How idle then is the notion that some entertain, that the establishment of this plan of government will speedily extricate us out of debt, and make us a rich and flourishing people—My opinion is the reverse, that in the complete operation and effect of it, it will be an insupportable burden, that will sink us the deeper under our present embarrassments.—It may be objected by the friends of the constitution, that this is all conjecture, and we have no reason to think or even suggest, that Congress will make such a use of their power to enslave the people—I would answer—Have we any reason to think they will not—they are to take a solemn oath to administer the Constitution faithfully, or according to the spirit of it, and if they do, the effect must necessarily be arbitrary government; this has always been pleasing to rulers—and there is no doubt, but they will make use of it, when it is voluntarily given them by the people—And when it is not, they have ever grasped after it—thus the nobles of Rome, after they had unanimously assisted the people, in abolishing the regal tyranny, were for enlarging their own power and exercising the very same tyranny, tho' under another name—So, tho' British tyranny is expelled out of these states yet, have we not reason to fear the same, tho' it may be under a different form.

Remark 5. Upon the slave trade, sect. 9. The migration, or importation of such persons, as any of the states shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year eighteen hundred and eight—By the importation of the persons above-mentioned is doubtless meant the Guinea trade, by which thousands and millions of poor negroes have been wrested from their native country, their friends and all that is dear to them, and brought into a state of the most abject slavery and wretchedness—By the above article, this cruel and barbarous practice is not to be prohibited by Congress for twenty years to come, and even then, it is not said, it shall cease—Here is a permission granted, for the enslaving and making miserable our fellow men, totally contrary to all the principles of reason, justice, benevolence and humanity, and all the kind and compassionate dictates of the Christian Religion. Can we then hold up our hands for a Constitution that licences this bloody practice? Can we who have fought so hard for Liberty give our consent to have it taken away from others? May the powers above forbid.[3]

Remark 6. Upon the appointment of the officers of the state, by the President, article 2, sect. 2—He shall have power by and with the advice and consent of the senate, to appoint Ambassadors, publick Ministers, and it is added all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, those appointments before provided for, in this Constitution, are the military officers reserved to the legislature; all other officers therefore, in the judicial department; such as justices of the peace and quorum judges of the inferior and superior courts must be appointed, and receive their commissions and salaries from Congress which will be improper and dangerous—The distance between so great, unworthy characters may get into office for want of proper information, and besides they will be independent of the people, and consequently suitable tools for the purposes of tyranny and oppression; as the Mandamus counsellors were under British government.

Remark 7. Upon the extent of the judicial power, art. 3, sect. 2. The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity—to all controversies between two or more states—between citizens of the same state—between citizens of different states—citizens and subjects—In the larger cases there is to be original jurisdiction in the smaller appellate—What exceptions and regulations, Congress may make to this is uncertain—But as it now stands, it extends to all cases, and disputes which may happen between man and man; and so may prove, in the issue, a source of mischief and ruin to thousands—The rich and the wilful citizen may, after passing through the lower forms of law, appeal up to this federal court, at four, or five hundred miles distance; there the other party must repair, at an amazing expence, or else loose his case however just and righteoce—Hereby the course of public justice may be much obstructed, the poor oppressed, and many undone—Every door therefore against such a pernicious effect, ought to be shut in the Constitution—All wise communities would choose such an establishment, as that individuals might obtain justice, with the greatest ease, and least expence.

Remark 8. Upon the admission of new states, art. 3, sect. 3. New States may be admitted by Congress into the Union: But no New State shall be formed or erected, within the jurisdiction of any other state without the consent of the Legislature of the state concerned—From this, it is evident, that Vermont can never be admitted as a state into the union without the consent of New-York, because of her claim of jurisdiction over it; that this consent will be obtained, is very improbable, such has long, and still continues to refuse it, the consequence is, Vermont must be obliged, either to remain as she is, and do nothing to defray the public expence which will be very impolitick, or else, submit to the government of New-York; this she will never do without a conquest by the sword: For this purpose New-York must have assistance, upon the adoption of this Constitution, she has a right to demand it of the United States; We shall consequently be bound to keep an army to cut the throats of our Brethren, a horrid scene is opened of blood and carnage. Nature shudders at the thought. We ought seriously to consider this, and not give our vote hastily to that, which we can never comply with in its operation and effects.

Remark 9. Upon the discarding of all religious tests, Art. 6, clause 3—But no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office, or public trust under the United States, according to this we may have a Papist, a Mohomatan, a Deist, yea an Atheist at the helm of Government: all nations are tenatious of their religion, and all have an acknowledgment of it in their civil establishment; but the new plan requires none at all; none in Congress, none in any member of the legislative bodies; none in any single officer of the United States; all swept off at one stroke totally contrary to our state plans.—But will this be good policy to discard all religion? It may be said the meaning is not to discard it, but only to shew that there is no need of it in public officers; they may be as faithful without as with—this is a mistake—when a man has no regard to God and his laws nor any belief of a future state; he will have less regard to the laws of men, or to the most solemn oaths or affirmations; it is acknowledged by all that civil governments can't well be supported without the assistance of religion; I think therefore that so much deference ought to be paid to it, as to acknowledge it in our civil establishment; and that no man is fit to be a ruler of protestants, without he can honestly profess to be of the protestant religion.[4]—To conclude I have now given my sentiments freely and honestly upon this important subject; if it serves to throw any light upon it, I have my desire and should be heartily glad, that the respectable Convention to set at Exeter upon the decisive question, might have all that has been said for, and all that has been said against the Constitution laid before them, that they may have the fullest means of information possible and if, after judiciously and candidly weighing every argument, it is their judgment that it will be for the general good of the community to adopt, let them adopt it; but if not let them reject it; and let us make another trial for a new plan, that may in more respects be agreeable, and better secure the liberties of the subjects.

Anti-Foederalist, No. II.

An Address to the members of the Convention, for the State of New-Hampshire, to meet at Exeter, on the second Wednesday in February 1788, for the important purpose of deciding upon a Constitution offered by the late Convention, through the medium of Congress.—

Not, Gentlemen, that I presume to think myself capable of informing you of your duty; or that you want such information, or would accept it from me. But, I would show my good wishes to my countrymen, and prepare them to reap the happy effects of their discrete choice.— 4.23.4

You, Gentlemen, have been chosen to deliberate and decide, upon the most important matter, perhaps, that ever was entrusted in the hands of any set of men; it is, in my opinion, the most dangerous crisis of our publick affairs, that any of us have beheld, in all the course of the late long and tedious war. May the God who governs the universe direct your steps.

If you adopt this constitution, as it now stands, it is my settled judgement, that you will, at once, surrender up all the liberties, privileges, and immunities of the state of New-Hampshire into the hands of Congress.— 4.23.5

Consider gentlemen—Whether it is the part of wisdom, or fidelity to your constituents, to give up all at once. Congress may thank you perhaps, for the mighty surrender, and may use you favourably at first, but, by and by, they may chastize you most severely with the rod you put into their hands. I have known men in private life, in a fit of good nature give up all their property into the hands of a favorite; and go mourning the remainder of their days, half starved and half naked to the grave.—But it is the first time, that I ever heard of a people, so soon after a long and tedious struggle for liberty attempt to surrender it to a set of men without their asking for it.—Men in power generally ask for enough—Let Congress have, what they have hitherto asked for, to regulate Trade and Commerce. They have told you that was sufficient, why will you give them more?

It has been said by Mr. Wilson, in support of this Constitution, and against a Bill of Rights, who dare be bold enough to enumerate all the Rights of a people:[5] Such sophistical assertions may do for his phlegmatick Germans, but will not answer for the bold, free and enterprizing people of New-Hampshire—Every honest man ought to be bold enough to declare his rights—at least, such great and essential ones, as never ought to be trusted to the caprice of any set of men—And you, gentlemen, I hope will be bold enough to spurn at a Constitution, offered you without a Bill of Rights; and receive none unless the most essential ones are enumerated—But I shall say no more on this particular, as abler pens have gone before me.— 4.23.6

But as many of you gentlemen are from the country; and have not had the advantage of hearing what has been said; I should advise you to collect 4.23.7

some of the most sensible writers, with their strictures upon the Constitution, and have them read in the Convention, and think and judge for yourselves, and decide cooly upon it—Beware of artful and designing men; (if any should be among you) as there may be those whose cunning and sophistry would deceive (if possible) the very elect.

4.23.8 Consider, gentlemen, how lavish Congress have been with your money! what exorbitant salaries they have given, and are daily giving to men, no better than yourselves, who would blush to have such salaries offered you, when, at this time, the public creditors are suffering for want of their just dues. If poverty has not made Congress frugal, it is in vain to give them the command of your purses.—Be not too much influenced, gentlemen, by the mighty sound of the great and exalted characters of those who formed this Constitution—We have thousands, as great, and good men as they, in the United States. Besides, gentlemen, there are not such mighty tallents, requisite for government as some who pretend to them (without possessing them) would make us believe—Honest affection for the general good and common qualifications are sufficient—Administration has always been best managed, and the public liberty best secured, when plain honesty and common sense alone governed the public affairs. Great abilities have for the most part been employed to mislead the honest, but unwary multitude, and to draw them out of the open and plain paths of public virtue and public good[6]—Consider for God's sake gentlemen, the sacredness of your office and the magnitude of your trust, your country, its Religion, and Laws are in your hands: if you adopt this Constitution, you overturn the whole at once; and subject yourselves and your constituents to be bound by such laws as the will and pleasure of Congress may hereafter make—Be as zealous to ward off public evil, as others are to bring it on; and you have a fair chance to prevent it for ages yet to come.—I had rather trust my purse in the hands of a sharper, than my liberties in the hands of any set of men, unless they are secured with restraints stronger than their temptations to destroy them; for the former by industry may be replenished; but liberty once lost, is scarce ever recovered, almost as rarely as human life, when it is once extinguished.

Great Abilities have, for the most part, if not always, been employed to mislead the honest but unwary Multitude, and to draw them out of the open and plain Paths of publick Virtue and publick Good."

Letter by David

MASSACHUSETTS GAZETTE
7 March 1788

Although not explicitly Anti-Federal, the essay of David is a reply to a Federalist defense of the absence from the Constitution of any religious test, and it is an excellent statement of an important Anti-Federalist theme: the need to promote civic virtue through the public protection and promotion of religion. "[I]t is not more difficult to build an elegant house without tools to work with, than it is to establish a durable government without the publick protection of religion" (4.24.6).

Mr. Allen,

4.24.1 A Connecticut writer, whose very curious production, under the signature of Elihu, was honoured with a place in your Gazette of the 26th of February, in treating of religious acknowledgements and professions, appears to consider all who retain any symptoms of religion, as rogues or fools.[1] It is not my intention to become a polemick divine, nor to enter into a dispute with those, whose argument, if it proves any thing, proves that their own hearts are not under the influence of religion. I mean only to consider the matter in a political view, in order, if we can, to determine whether the state ought or ought not to interfere at all in religious concernments.[2]

4.24.2 It is agreed on all hands, that the business of government is to secure the subjects in the enjoyment of their lives, liberty and property, and that it must be furnished with all the powers necessary to attain so desirable an object. It is clearly impossible to secure the subject unless the invasions of lawless men can be restrained. There have been but three ways hitherto invented by which the turbulent passions of mankind are controlled; 1st. By punishing offenders, 2d. By rewarding virtuous actions, and 3d. By prepossessing the people in favour of virtue by affording publick protection to religion. The first method is least eligible of them all unless when it is absolutely necessary; and the more frequent it becomes, the less efficacious it is. The second is in its own nature very confined, and can take place only in a few of the most exalted instances, so that it can produce no effect upon the body of mankind. The third method then, by forming the opinion of the people at large in favour of virtue and religion, is in theory the most probable, and if we find in practice it has been most successful, we shall hardly hesitate to say, that religion is a proper subject for publick protection and encouragement.

If we examine the history of mankind, under whatever dispensation of religion they lived, we find, that while their circumstances were improving, they attended much to their religious system. They frequently acknowledged the superintendence of the Gods, and sought their protection. They are careful to train up their children in the religion of their ancestors, and it has been generally if not always a fundamental article that moral offences would be punished by the Deity, even if they escaped the laws of human society, unless satisfaction was made to the sovereign of the universe for the violation of good order. Every nation, I believe, has committed the care of religion to the government, and almost every government has adopted some institution for instructing the subjects both old and young in principles, which had a direct tendency to secure the practice of good morals and consequently the peace of society. In Europe it has been carried to an absurd extreme. It gave rise to an elective monarchy, which claimed jurisdiction over the different states and princes, and pervaded all parts of their dominions. As it was an empire, founded in opinion, and in principles which took fast hold of the human mind, kings could not always defend themselves by force from its encroachments on their prerogatives. After the reformation, which Luther boldly begun, the reformed countries deprived the pope of his supremacy, and transferred it to themselves. Still however they took care to provide means for the instruction of the subjects, because that religion had always been found to attach the professors of it to what they conceived to be good order and the constitution they lived under. No good reason has been given why the government should not provide for their instruction in such principles as tend to secure internal peace, any more than for instructing the people in the arts of defence. The power indeed, like any other power, may be abused; but it by no means follows that government should not be possessed of it under certain limitations. 4.24.3

The practice of our own country has been uniformly in favour of a limited power of this kind in the government. We have from the beginning had laws in favour of a learned and able clergy, and have provided means for their education and support. We have had and still have laws for a due observance of the Sabbath; and our annual fasts and thanksgivings are not only uniform proofs of the exercise of such a power; but are instances of the propriety of our conduct in making frequent and publick acknowledgments of our dependence upon the Deity. Never did any people possess a more ardent love of liberty than the people of this state; yet that very love of liberty has induced them to adopt a religious test, which requires all publick 4.24.4 officers to be of some Christian, protestant persuasion, and to abjure all foreign authority. Thus religion secures our independence as a nation, and attaches the citizens to our own government.

4.24.5 I know it is a common objection against religious tests, that they bind only those who are good men, and do not exclude bad ones. The same remark is true of oaths; yet every government requires them, and an oath is, as much as a test, a religious declaration. Nothing can be urged in favour of one which does not apply to the other. It is true, indeed, that bad men will agree to either. Still however, those, whose avowed principles are unfriendly to the system of the country, will be excluded: And there are two descriptions of men that ought to be excluded. These are Papists and Atheists. The latter should be excluded because they have no principles of virtue, and the former because they acknowledge a foreign head, who can relieve them from the obligation of an oath. There is therefore no publick dependence upon either, and men publickly and avowedly of either description should be excluded.

4.24.6 We have now seen what have been the principles generally adopted by mankind, and to what degree they have been adopted in our own state. Before we decide in favour of our practice, let us see what has been the success of those who have made no publick provision for religion. Unluckily we have only to consult our next neighbours.[3] In consequence of this publick inattention they derive the vast benefit of being able to do whatever they please without any compunction. Taught from their infancy to ridicule our formality as the effect of hypocrisy, they have no principles of restraint but laws of their own making; and from such laws may Heaven defend us. If this is the success that attends leaving religion to shift wholly for itself, we shall be at no loss to determine, that it is not more difficult to build an elegant house without tools to work with, than it is to establish a durable government without the publick protection of religion. What the system is which is most proper for our circumstances will not take long to determine. It must be that which has adopted the purest moral principles, and which is interwoven in the laws and constitution of our country, and upon which are founded the habits of our people. Upon this foundation we have established a government of influence and opinion, and therefore secured by the affections of the people; and when this foundation is removed, a government of mere force must arise.

David.

1. The essay of Elihu was originally printed in the Hartford, Connecticut, American Mercury 18 February 1788; it was reprinted in the Massachusetts Gazette 26 February 1788, to which David replied. Elihu took up the argument of William Williams, a supporter of the Constitution, that the Constitution should contain a preamble expressing a belief in God and an acknowledgment that "all rightful powers among men are ordained of, and mediately derived from God" and that a religious test along these lines should be required of officers of the government. (For Williams' essay, see Ford, Essays 203–9. This matter was discussed at some length in both the Connecticut and Massachusetts conventions; see A Landholder [Oliver Ellsworth], Ford, Essays 167–71, 195; Elliot II, 44, 90, 118–20.) Elihu argued that a declaration of belief in God is unnecessary (the belief being universal), that it would exclude only those nonbelievers fools enough to declare their opinions, that it cannot be presumed to be needed or desired by God Himself, and therefore that the proposal must be some kind of political trick. "The time has been when nations could be kept in awe with stories of God's sitting with legislators and dictating laws; with this lure, cunning politicians have established their own power on the credulity of the people, shackling their uninformed minds with incredible tales. But the light of philosophy has arisen in these latter days; miracles have ceased, oracles are silenced, monkish darkness is dissipated, and even witches at last hide their heads. Mankind are no longer to be deluded with fable. Making the glory of God subservient to the temporal interest of man, is a worn-out trick: and a pretence to superiour sanctity and special grace, will not much longer promote weakness over the head of wisdom." "The most shining part, the most brilliant circumstance in honour of the framers of the constitution is their avoiding all appearance of craft, declining to dazzle even the superstitious, by a hint about grace or ghostly knowledge. They come to us in the plain language of common sense, and propose to our understanding a system of government, as the invention of mere human wisdom; no deity comes down to dictate it, not even a god appears in a dream to propose any part of it." Essay by A Newport Man

NEWPORT MERCURY
March 1788

This brief essay is distinguished chiefly by the fact that it contains what appears to be the only reference to Rousseau in the Anti-Federalist literature. A quotation from Rousseau, together with the examples of the Swiss cantons and the republics of San Marino and Lucca, are used to urge the dangers of giving up power to representatives.

Mr. Barber,
Please to insert the following in your impartial paper.

4.25.1 Trusting to the force of truth, and the ingenuity of abler men, I had determined to continue, as I have hitherto been, silent on the subject of the new Constitution; but seeing the unwearied attempts for innovation by a set of men who seem to consider government as "intended

"For nothing else, but to be mended."[1]

I think it my duty, however feeble the effort, to throw in my mite to oppose the torrent of sophistry and misrepresentation that is weekly obtruded on the public.

4.25.2 I perceive in your last a piece signed "A Rhode-Island Man," it seems wrote with an air of confidence and triumph—he speaks of reason and reasoning,[2] I wish he had known or practised some of that reasoning he so much pretends to, his essay had been much shorter—We are told in this piece, as well as others on the same side, that an ability given to British subjects to recover their debts in this country will be one of the blessings of a new government, by inducing the British to abandon the frontiers, or be left without excuse,—but the British have no other reason for holding the posts, after the time named in the treaty for their evacuation, than the last reason of Kings, that is, their guns,—and giving them the treasure of the United States is a very unlikely means of removing that,—if the British subject met with legal impediments to the recovery of his debts in this country, for British government to have put the same stop on our citizens would have been a proper, an ample retaliation; but there is nothing within the compass of possibility, of which I am not perfectly sure, that I am more fully persuaded of, than I am, that the British will never relinquish the posts in question until compelled by force; because no nation pays less regard to the faith of treaties than the British, witness their conduct to the French in 1755, when they took a very great number of men of war and merchant ships before war was declared, because the French had built some forts on the south side of an imaginery line in the wilde of America,—and again, the violation of the articles by which the people of Boston resigned their arms, and the violation of the capitulation of Charles-Town,—again we are told that Congress has no credit with foreigners, because they have no power to fulfill their engagements, and this we are told, with a boldness exceeded by nothing but its falshood, perhaps in the same paper that announces to the world the loan of a million of Holland gilders, if I mistake not the sum—a sum equal to 250,000 Spanish Dollars, and all this done by the procurement of that very Congress whose insignificancy and want of power had been constantly proclaimed for two or three years before,—The Dutch are the most cautious people on earth, and it is reasonable to suppose they were abundantly persuaded of the permanency and efficacy of our government by their risking so much money on it.

We are told that so long as we withhold this power from Congress we shall 4.25.3
be a weak, despised people—we were long contending for Independence, and now we are in a passion to be rid of it—but let us attempt to reason on this subject, and see to which side that will lead us—Reason is truly defined, in all cases short of mathematical demonstration, to be a supposing that the like causes will produce the like effects; let us proceed by this rule—the Swiss Cantons for an hundred years have remained separate Independent States, consequently without any controuling power; even the little Republic of St. Marino, containing perhaps but little more ground than the town of Newport, and about five thousand inhabitants, surrounded by powerful and ambitious neighbours, has kept its freedom and independence these thirteen hundred years, and is mentioned by travellers as a very enlightened and happy people; if these small republics, in the neighbourhood of the warlike and intriguing Courts of Paris, Vienna, and Berlin, have kept their freedom and original form of government, is it not reasonable to suppose, that the same good sense and love of freedom, on this side the Atlantic, will secure us from all attempts within and without; and the only internal discord that has happened in Switzerland was on a religious account, and a supreme controuling power is no security against this, as appears by what happened in Ireland in the time of Charles the first, and in France in the time of Henry the fourth,—It seems rational in a case of this importance to consult the opinion of the ablest men, and to whom can we better appeal than to J. J. Rouseau, a republican by birth and education, one of the most exalted geniuses and one of the greatest writers of his age, or perhaps any age, a man the most disinterested and benevolent towards mankind, a man the most industrious in the acquisition of knowledge and information, by travel, conversation, reading, and thinking, and one who has wrote a Volume on Government entitled the Social Contract, wherein he inculcates, that the people should examine and determine every public act themselves[;] his words are, that "every law that the people have not ratified in person, is void, it is no law. The people of England think they are free, they are much mistaken, they are never so but during the election of members of Parliament, as soon as they are elected, they are slaves, they are nothing, and by the use they make of their liberty, during the short moments they possess it, they well deserve to lose it."[3]—This is far from advising that thirty thousand souls should resign their judgments and wills intirely to one man for two years, to a man, who, perhaps, may go from home sincere and patriotic, but by the time he has dined in pomp for a week with the wealthy citizens of New-York or Philadelphia, will have lost all his rigid ideas of oeconomy and equality—he becomes fascinated with the elegancies and luxuries of wealth, these splendid appearances with some hints from his prerogative acquaintance, that if Government were fixed, and the perquisites of office sufficient to induce a man of abilities to accept, no doubt you, or one of your sons, would be the man for your quarter; objects and intimations like these soon change the champion for the people to an advocate for power, and the people finding themselves thus basely betrayed, cry that virtue is but a name. We are not sure that men have more virtue at this time and place than they had in England in the time of George the 2d[;] let any one look into the history of those times, and see with what boldness men changed sides and deserted the people in pursuit of profit and power. If to take up the cross and renounce the pomps and vanities of this sinful world, is a hard lesson for divines, 'tis much harder for politicians.—a Cincinnatus, a Cato, a Fabricious, and a Washington, are rarely to be found. We are told that the Trustees of our powers and freedom being mostly married men, and all of them inhabitants and proprietors of the country, is an ample security against an abuse of power[;] whether human nature be less corrupt than formerly I will not determine; but this I know that Julius Caesar, Oliver Cromwell, and the nobles of Venice, were natives and inhabitants of the countries whose power they usurped and drenched in blood. Again, our country is compared to a ship of which we are all part owners, and from thence 'tis gravely concluded that no officer can ever betray or abuse his trust; but that men will sacrifice the public to their private interest, is a saying too well known to need repeating, and the instances of designed shipwrecks, and ships run away with by a combination of masters, supercargoes, and part owners, is so great that nothing can equal them, but those instances in which pretended patriots and politicians have raised themselves and families to power and greatness, by destroying that freedom, and those laws, they were chosen to defend.

If it were necessary to cite more precedents to prove that the people ought not to trust or remove their power any further from them, the little Republic of Lucca may be mentioned, which, surrounded by the Dukedom of Tuscany, has existed under its present constitution about five hundred years, and as Mr. Addison says, is for the extent of its dominion the richest and best peopled of all the States of Italy—and he says further, that "the whole administration of the government passes into different hands every two months."[4] This is very far from confirming the doctrine of choosing those officers for two years who were before chosen for one. The want of a decisive efficient power is much talked of by the discontented, and that we are in danger of being conquered by the intrigues of European powers.—But it has already been shewn that we have delegated a more decisive power to our Congress than is granted by the Republic Swiss Cantons to their General Diet; these Republics have enjoyed peace some hundreds of years, while those governments which possess this decisive, efficient power, so much aimed at, are as often as twenty or thirty years, drawing their men from the plough and loom to be shot at and cut each others throats for the honour of their respective nations. And by how much further we are from Europe than the Swiss Cantons with their allies, and Lucca and St. Marino are from France, Prussia, and Austria, by so much less are we in danger of being conquered than those Republics, which have existed some earlier than others, but the youngest of them one hundred and thirty years, without being conquered. As for the United Provinces of Holland they are but nominal Republics, their Stadtholder, very much like our intended President, making them in reality a monarchy, and subject to all its calamities; but supposing that the present constitution penned by the ablest men, four or five years in completion, and its adoption considered as the happiest event—supposing, I say, the present Constitution destroyed, can a new one be ratified with more solemnity, agreed to in stronger or more binding terms? What security can be given that in seven years hence, another Convention shall not be called to frame a third Constitution? And as ancient Greece counted by olympiads, and monarchies by their Kings reigns, we shall date in the first, second, or third year, of the seventh, eighth, or ninth Constitution. 4.25.4

In treating this subject I have not presumed to advise, and have intruded but few comments. I have mentioned the state of those countries which most resemble our own and leave to the natural sense of the reader to make his own conclusions. The male-contents, the lovers of novelty, delight much in allegory. Should I be indulged a few words in that way, I should not compare the new Constitution to a house, I should fetch my simile from the country, and compare it to Siberian Wheat (otherwise called Siberian cheat) 4.25.5 which is known to have been the most praised, the most dear, the most worthless, and most short lived thing that was ever adopted—but if the freemen of this continent are weary of that power and freedom they have so dearly bought, and so shortly enjoyed—the power of judging and determining what laws are most wholesome, that taxes are requisite and sufficient, I say, if the people are tired of these privileges, now is the time to part with them forever. Much more might be said to shew the bitterness and mischief contained in this gilded pill, but being fond of brevity, I shall rely on the good sense of the public to keep themselves out of the trap, and sign myself in plain English,

Reasons for Dissent

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
9 and 16 April 1788

While stating that they are disposed to obey the Constitution if it is accepted, these three Anti-Federalist members of the Massachusetts ratifying convention, like many others, were led to publish their reasons for dissent. They object to the 3/5 clause, to the provision for Congress altering state regulations dealing with federal elections, and to the absence of sufficient checks in the proposed constitution against abuse of power. The interesting part of the statement has to do with the constitutional provision regarding the slave trade, which Consider Arms and his friends subject to fairly penetrating criticism as a falling away from the principles of liberty on which the country was based. The statement stimulated an exchange between Philanthrop and Phileleutheros between 23 April and 21 May in the Hampshire Gazette (see Phileleutheros 4.27).

9 April 1788

We the subscribers being of the number, who did not assent to the ratification of the federal constitution, under consideration in the late state convention, held at Boston, to which we were called by the suffrages of the corporations to which we respectively belong—beg leave, through the channel of your paper to lay before the public in general, and our constituents in particular, the reasons of our dissent, and the principles which governed us in our decision of this important question. 4.26.1

Fully convinced, ever since the late revolution, of the necessity of a firm, energetic government, we should have rejoiced in an opportunity to have given our assent to such a one; and should in the present case, most cordially have done it, could we at the same time been happy to have seen the liberties of the people and the rights of mankind properly guarded and 4.26.2

secured. We conceive that the very notion of government carries along with it the idea of justice and equity, and that the whole design of instituting government in the world, was to preserve men's properties from rapine, and their bodies from violence and bloodshed.

4.26.3 These propositions being established, we conceive must of necessity produce the following consequence: That every constitution or system, which does not quadrate with this original design, is not government, but in fact a subversion of it.

Having premised thus much, we proceed to mention some things in this constitution to which we object, and to enter into an inquiry, whether, and how far they coincide with those simple and original notions of government before mentioned.

4.26.4 In the first place, as direct taxes are to be apportioned according to the numbers in each state, and as Massachusetts has none in it but what are declared free men, so the whole, blacks as well as whites, must be numbered; this must therefore operate against us, as two-fifths of the slaves in the southern states are to be left out of the numeration. Consequently, three Massachusetts infants will increase the tax equal to five sturdy full-grown negroes of theirs, who work every day in the week for their masters, saving the Sabbath, upon which they are allowed to get something for their own support. We can see no justice in this way of apportioning taxes. Neither can we see any good reason why this was consented to on the part of our delegates.

4.26.5 We suppose it next to impossible that every individual in this vast continental union, should have his wish with regard to every single article composing a frame of government. And therefore, although we think it more agreeable to the principles of republicanism, that elections should be annual, yet as the elections in our own state government are so, we did not view it so dangerous to the liberties of the people, that we should have rejected the constitution merely on account of the biennial elections of the representatives—had we been sure that the people have any security even of this. But this we could not find. For although it is said, that "the House of Representatives shall be chosen every second year, by the people of the several states," etc., and that "the times, places and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives, shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof," yet all this is wholely superseded by a subsequent provision, which empowers Congress at any time to enact a law, whereby such regulations may be altered, except as to the places of choosing senators. Here we conceive the people may be very materially injured, and in time reduced to a state of as abject vassalage as any people were under the control of the most mercenary despot that ever tarnished the pages of history. The depravity of human nature, illustrated by examples from history, will warrant us to say, it may be possible, if not probable, that the congress may be composed of men who will wish to burden and oppress the people. In such case, will not their inventions be fruitful enough to devise occasions for postponing the elections? And if they can do this once, they can twice; if they can twice, they can thrice, so by degrees render themselves absolute and perpetual. Or, if they choose, they have another expedient. They can alter the place of holding elections. They can say, whatever the legislature of this state may order to the contrary, that all the elections of our representatives shall be made at Mechias, or at Williamstown. Consequently, nine-tenths of the people will never vote. And if this should be thought a measure favorable to their reelection, or the election of some tool for their mercenary purposes, we doubt not it will be thus ordered. But says the advocates for the constitution, "it is not likely this will ever happen; we are not to expect our rulers will ever proceed to a wanton exercise of the powers given them."[1] But what reason have we more than past ages, to expect that we shall be blessed with impeccable rulers? We think not any. Although it has been said that every generation grows wiser and wiser, yet we have no reason to think they grow better and better. And therefore the probability lies upon the dark side. Does not the experience of past ages teach, that men have generally exercised all the powers they had given them, and even have usurped upon them, in order to accomplish their own sinister and avaricious designs, whenever they thought they could do it with impunity? This we presume will not be denied. And it appeared to us that the arguments made use of by the favorers of the constitution, in the late convention at Boston, proceeded upon the plan of righteousness in those who are to rule over us, by virtue of this new form of government. But these arguments, we confess, could have no weight with us, while we judge them to be founded altogether upon a slippery perhaps.

We are sensible, that in order to the due administration of government, it 4.26.6 is necessary that certain powers should be delegated to the rulers from the people. At the same time, we think they ought carefully to guard against giving so much as will enable those rulers, by that means, at once, or even in process of time, to render themselves absolute and despotic. This we think is the case with the form of government lately submitted to our consideration. We could not, therefore, acting uprightly, consulting our own good and the good of our constituents, give our assents unto it. We could not then and we still cannot see, that because people are many times guilty of crimes and deserving of punishment, that it from thence follows the authority ought to have power to punish them when they are not guilty, or to punish the innocent with the guilty without discrimination, which amounts to the same thing. But this we think in fact to be the case as to this federal constitution. For the congress, whether they have provocation or not, can at any time order the elections in any or all the states to be conducted in such manner as wholey to defeat and render entirely nugatory the intention of those elections, and convert that which was considered and intended to be the palladium of the liberties of the people—the grand bulwark against any invasion upon them—into a formidable engine, by which to overthrow them all, and thus involve them in the depth of misery and distress. But it was pled by some of the ablest advocates of the constitution, that if congress should exercise such powers to the prejudice of the people (and they did not deny but they could if they should be disposed) they (the people) would not suffer it. They would have recourse to the ultima ratio, the dernier resort of the oppressed—the sword.[2]

4.26.7 But it appeared to us a piece of superlative incongruity indeed, that the people, whilst in the full and indefeasible possession of their liberties and privileges, should be so very profuse, so very liberal in the disposal of them, as consequently to place themselves in a predicament miserable to an extreme. So wretched indeed, that they may at once be reduced to the sad alternative of yielding themselves vassals into the hands of a venal and corrupt administration, whose only wish may be to aggrandize themselves and families—to wallow in luxury and every species of dissipation, and riot upon the spoils of the community; or take up the sword and involve their country in all the horrors of a civil war—the consequences of which, we think, we may venture to augur will more firmly rivet their shackles and end in the entailment of vassalage to their posterity. We think this by no means can fall within the description of government before mentioned. Neither can we think these suggestions merely chimerical, or that they proceed from an overheated enthusiasm in favor of republicanism; neither yet from an illplaced detestation of aristocracy; but from the apparent danger the people are in by establishing this constitution. When we take a forward view of the proposed congress—seated in the federal city, ten miles square, fortified and replenished with all kinds of military stores and every implement; with a navy at command on one side, and a land army on the other—we say, when we view them thus possessed of the sword in one hand and the purse strings of the people in the other, we can see no security left for them in the enjoyment of their liberties, but what may proceed from the bare possibility that this supreme authority of the nation may be possessed of virtue and integrity sufficient to influence them in the administration of equal justice and equity among those whom they shall govern. But why should we voluntarily choose to trust our all upon so precarious a tenure as this? We confess it gives us pain to anticipate the future scene: a scene presenting to view miseries so complicated and extreme, that it may be part of the charms of eloquence to extenuate, or the power of art to remove.

Conclusion of Mrssrs. Arms's, Maynard's and Field's Reasons for giving their Dissent to the Federal Constitution.

But we pass on to another thing, which (aside from every other consider- 4.26.8
ation) was, and still is an insuperable objection in the way of our assent. This we find in the 9th section under the head of restrictions upon Congress, viz. "The migration or importation of such persons as any of the states now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress, prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight," &c.[3] It was not controverted in the Convention, but owned that this provision was made purely that the southern states might not be deprived of their profits arising from that most nefarious trade of enslaving the Africans. The hon. Mr. King himself, who was an assistant in forming this constitution, in discoursing upon the slave trade, in the late Convention at Boston, was pleased to design it by this epithet, nefarious,[4] which carries with it the idea of something peculiarly wicked and abominable: and indeed we think it deserving of this and every odious epithet which our language affords, descriptive of the iniquity of it. This being the case, we were naturally led to enquire why we should establish a constitution, which gives licence to a measure of this sort—How is it possible we could do it consistent with our ideas of government consistent with the principles and documents we endeavour to inculcate upon others? It is a standing law in the kingdom of Heaven, "Do unto others as ye would have others do unto you." This is the royal law—this we often hear inculcated upon others. But had we given our affirmative voice in this case, could we have claimed to ourselves that consistent line of conduct, which marks the path of every honest man? Should we not rather have been guilty of a contumelious repugnancy, to what we profess to believe is equitable and just? Let us for once bring the matter home to ourselves, and summons up our own feelings upon the occasion, and hear the simple sober verdict of our own hearts, were we in the place of those unhappy Africans—this is the test, the proper touch-stone by which to try the matter before us. Where is the man, who under the influence of sober dispassionate reasoning, and not void of natural affection, can lay his hand upon his heart and say, I am willing my sons and my daughters should be torn from me and doomed to perpetual slavery? We presume that man is not to be found amongst us: And yet we think the consequence is fairly drawn, that this is what every man ought so be able to say, who voted for this constitution. But we dare say this will never be the case here, so long as the country has power to repel force by force. Notwithstanding this we will practice this upon those who are destitute of the power of repulsion: from whence we conclude it is not the tincture of a skin, or any disparity of features that are necessarily connected with slavery, and possibly may therefore fall to the lot of some who voted it, to have the same measure measured unto them which they have measured unto others.[5] If we could once make it our own case, we should soon discover what distress & anxiety, what poignant feelings it would produce in our own breasts, to have our infants torn from the bosoms of their tender mothers—indeed our children of all ages, from infancy to manhood, arrested from us by a banditti of lawless ruffians, in defiance of all the laws of humanity, and carried to a country far distant, without any hopes of their return—attended likewise with the curring reflection, that they were likely to undergo all those indignities, those miseries, which are the usual concomitants of slavery. Indeed when we consider the depredations committed in Africa, the cruelties exercised towards the poor captivated inhabitants of that country on their passage to this—crowded by droves into the holds of ships, suffering what might naturally be expected would result from scanty provisions, and inelastic infectious air, and after their arrival, drove like brutes from market to market, branded on their naked bodies with hot irons, with the initial letters of their masters names—fed upon the entrails of beasts like swine in the slaughter-yard of a butcher; and many other barbarities, of which we have documents well authenticated: then put to the hardest of labour, and to perform the vilest of drudges—their master (or rather usurpers) by far less kind and benevolent to them, than to their horses and their hounds. We say, when we consider these things (the recollection of which gives us pain) conscience applauds the dicision we have made, and we feel that satisfaction which arises from acting agreeable to its dictates. When we hear those barbarities pled for—When we see them voted for, (as in the late Convention at Boston) when we see them practised by those who denominate themselves Christians, we are presented with something truely heterogeneous—something monstrous indeed! Can we suppose this line of conduct keeps pace with the rule of right? Do such practices coincide with the plain and simple ideas of government before-mentioned? By no means. We could wish it might be kept in mind, that the very notion of government is to protect men in the enjoyment of those privileges to which they have a natural, therefore an indefeasible right; and not to be made an engine of rapine, robbery and murder. This is but establishing inequity, by law founded on usurpation. Establishing this constitution is, in our opinion establishing the most ignominious kind of theft, man-stealing, and so heinous and agrivated was this crime considered, by ONE who cannot err, that under the Jewish theocracy it was punished with death.[6] Indeed what can shew men scarcely more hardened, than being guilty of this crime? For there is nothing else they will stick at in order to perpetrate this.

4.26.9 The question therefore—Why should we vote for the establishment of this system? recoils upon us armed with treple force—force which sets at defiance, the whole power of sophistry, employed for the defence of those, who by a "cursed thirst for gold," are prompted on to actions, which cast an indelible stain upon the character of the human species—actions at which certain quadrupeds, were they possessed of Organs for the purpose, would discover a BLUSH.

But we were told by an honourable gentleman who was one of the framers 4.26.10 of this Constitution, that the two southermost states, absolutely refused to confederate at all, except they might be gratified in this article.[7] What then? Was this an argument sufficient to induce us to give energy to this article, thus fraught with iniquity? By no means. But we were informed by that gentleman, further that those two states pled, that they had lost much of their property during the late war. Their slaves being either taken from them by the British troops, or they themselves taking the liberty of absconding from them, and therefore they must import more, in order to make up their losses. To this we say they lost no property, because they never had any in them, however much money they might have paid for them. For we look upon it, every man is the sole proprietor of his own liberty, and no one but himself hath a right to convey it unless by some crime adequate to the punishment, it should be made forfeit, and so by that means becomes the property of government: But this is by no means the case in the present instance. And we cannot suppose a vendee, can acquire property in any thing, which at the time of purchase, he knew the vendor had no right to convey. This is an acknowledgment, we are constrained to make as a tribute due to justice and equity. But suppose they had lost real property; so have we; and indeed where is the man, but will tell us he has been a great looser by means of the war? And shall we from thence argue that we have a right to make inroads upon another nation, pilfer and rob them, in order to compensate ourselves for the losses we have sustained by means of a war, in which they had been utterly neutral? Truly upon this plan of reasoning it is lawful thus to do, and had we voted the constitution as it stands, we must have given countenance to conduct equally criminal, and more so, if possible. Such arguments as the above seem to be calculated and designed for idiotcy. We however acknowledge, we think them rather an affront, even upon that.

The Hon. Gentleman above named, was asked the question—What would 4.26.11 be the consequence, suppose one or two states, upon any principle, should refuse confederating? His answer was—"The consequence is plain and easy—they would be compelled to it; not by force of arms; but all commerce with them would be interdicted; their property would be seized in every port they should enter, and by law made forfeit: and this line of conduct would soon reduce them to order." This method of procedure perhaps no one would be disposed to reprehend; and if eleven, or even nine states were agreed, could they not, ought they not to take this method, rather than to make a compact with them, by which they give countenance, nay even bind themselves (as the case may be) to aid and assist them in spo[r]ting with the liberties of others, and accumulating to themselves fortunes, by making thousands of their fellow creatures miserable. To animadvert upon the British manoevres at that time, would not fall within the compass of our present design. But that the Africans had a right to depart, we must assert, and are able to prove it from the highest authority perhaps that this Commonwealth does or ever did afford. In a printed pamphlet, published in Boston in the year 1772, said to be the report of a Committee, and unanimously voted by said town, and ordered to be sent to the several towns in the state for their consideration. In said pamphlet we find the following axiom, which we will quote verbatim,—page 2d—"All men have a right to remain in a state of nature as long as they please, and in case of intolerable oppression, civil or religious, to leave the society they belong to, and enter into another."[8] If it can by any kind of reasoning be made to appear, that this authority is not pertinently adduced in the case before us, then we think it can by the same reasoning be investigated, that black is white and white is black—that oppression and freedom are exactly similar, and benevolence and malignity synonymous terms.

4.26.12 The advocates for the constitution seemed to suppose, that this restriction being laid upon Congress only for a term of time, is the "fair dawning of liberty." That "it was a glorious acquisition towards the final abolition of slavery."[9] But how much more glorious would the acquisition have been, was such abolition to take place the first moment the constitution should be established. If we had said that after the expiration of a certain term the practice should cease, it would have appeared with a better grace; but this is not the case, for even after that, it is wholly optional with the Congress, whether they abolish it or not. And by that time we presume that enslaving the Africans will be accounted by far less an inconsiderable affair than it is at present; therefore conclude from good reasons, that the 'nefarious practice' will be continued and increased as the inhabitants of the country shall be found to increase.[10]

4.26.13 This practice of enslaving mankind is in direct opposition to a fundamental maxim of truth, on which our state constitution is founded, viz. "All men are born free and equal."[11] This is our motto. We have said it—we cannot go back. Indeed no man can justify himself in enslaving another, unless he can produce a commission under the broad seal of Heaven, purporting a licence therefor from him who created all men, and can therefore dispose of them at his pleasure.

4.26.14 We would not be thought to detract from the character of any person, but to us it is somewhat nearly paradoxical, that some of our leading characters in the law department (especially in the western counties) after having (to their honour be it spoken) exerted themselves to promote, and finally to effect the emancipation of slaves, should now turn directly about, and exhibit to the world principles diametrically opposite thereto: that they should now appear such strenuous advocates for the establishment of that diabolical trade of importing the Africans. But said some, it is not we who do it—and compared it to entering into an alliance with another nation, for some particular purpose;[12] but we think this by no means a parallel. We are one nation, forming a constitution for the whole, and suppose the states are under obligation, whenever this constitution shall be established, reciprocally to aid each other in defence and support of every thing to which they are entitled thereby, right or wrong. Perhaps we may never be called upon to take up arms for the defence of the southern states, in prosecuting this abominable traffick.

It is true at present there is not much danger to be apprehended, and for 4.26.15 this plain reason are those innocent Africans (as to us) pitched upon to drag out their lives in misery and chains. Such is their local situation—their unpolished manner—their inexperience in the art of war, that those invaders of the rights of mankind knew they can, at present, perpetrate those enormities with impunity. But let us suppose for once, a thing which is by no means impossible, viz. that those Africans should rise superior to all their local and other disadvantages, and attempt to avenge themselves for the wrongs done them? Or suppose some potent nation should interfere in their behalf, as France in the cause of America, must we not rise and resist them? Would not the Congress immediately call forth the whole force of the country, if needed, to oppose them, and so attempt more closely to rivet their manacles upon them, and in that way perpetuate the miseries of those unhappy people? This we think the natural consequence which will flow from the establishment of this constitution, and that it is not a forced, but a very liberal construction of it. It was said that "the adoption of this Constitution, would be ominous of much good, and betoken the smiles of Heaven upon the country."[13] But we view the matter in a very different light; we think this latch for unjust gains, this lust for slavery, portentous of much evil in America, for the cry of innocent blood, which hath been shed in carrying on this execrable commerce, hath undoubtedly reached to the Heavens, to which that cry is always directed, and will draw down upon them vengeance adequate to the enormity of the crime. To what other cause, than a full conviction, of the moral evil in this practice, together with some fearful forebodings of punishment therefor arising in the minds of the Congress in the year 1774, can it be imputed, that drew from them at that time, (at least an implied) confession of guilt, and a solemn, explicit promise of reformation? This is a fact, but lest it should be disputed, we think it most safe for ourselves to lay before our readers, an extract from a certain pamphlet, entitled "Extracts from the votes and proceedings of the American Continental Congress, held at Philadelphia, on the 5th of September, 1774, &c."[14] In the 22d page of this same pamphlet, we find the following paragraph, viz. "Second. That we will neither import, nor purchase any slave imported, after the first day of December next; after which time we will wholly discontinue the slave-trade, and will neither be concerned in it ourselves, nor will we hire our vessels nor sell our commodities or manufactures to those who are concerned in it." The inconsistency of opposing slavery, which they thought designed for themselves, and by clandestine means, procuring others to enslave at the same time—it is very natural to suppose would stare them in the face, and at all times guard them against breaking their resolution. Hence it appears to us unaccountably strange, that any person who signed the above resolve, should sign the federal constitution. For do they not hold up to view principles diametrically opposite? Can we suppose that what was morally evil in the year 1774, has become in the year 1788, morally good? Or shall we change evil into good and good into evil, as often as we find it will serve a turn? We cannot but say the conduct of those who associated in the year 1774 in the manner above, and now appear advocates for this new constitution, is highly inconsistent, although we find such conduct has the celebrated names of a Washington and an Adams to grace it. And this may serve as a reason why we could not be wrought upon by another argument, which was made use of in the Convention in favour of the constitution, viz. the weight of names—a solid argument with some people who belonged to the Convention, and would have induced them to comply with measures of almost any kind. It was urged that the gentlemen who composed the federal Convention, were men of the greatest abilities, integrity and erudition, and had been the greatest contenders for freedom. We suppose it to be true, and that they have exemplified it, by the manner in which they have earnestly dogmatized for liberty—But notwithstanding we could not view this argument, as advancing any where towards infallibility—because long before we entered upon the business of the Convention, we were by some means or other possessed with a notion (and we think from good authority) that "great men are not always wise". And to be sure the weight of the name adduced to give efficacy to a measure where liberty is in dispute, cannot be so likely to have its intended effect, when the person designed by that name, at the same time he is brandishing his sword, in the behalf of freedom for himself—is likewise tyranizing over two or three hundred miserable Africans, as free born as himself.

4.26.16 In fine we view this constitution as a curious piece of political mechanism, fabricated in such manner as may finally despoil the people of all their privileges; and we are fully satisfied, that had the same system been offered to the people in the time of the contest with Great-Britain, the person offering the same would not have met the approbation of those who now appear the most strenuous advocates for it. We cannot slip this opportunity of manifesting our disgust at the unfair methods which were taken in order to obtain a vote in this state, which perhaps was the means of producing the small majority of nineteen, out of nearly three hundred and sixty members. What those methods were is well known. It is past dispute that the opposers of the constitution were, in sundry instances, treated in a manner utterly inconsistent with that respect which is due to every freeborn citizen of the commonwealth, especially when acting in the capacity of a representative.

Notwithstanding what has been said, we would not have it understood, that we mean to be disturbers of the peace, should the states receive the constitution; but on the contrary, declare it our intention, as we think it our duty, to be subject to "the powers that be," wherever our lot may be cast.

Essay by Phileleutheros

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
21 May 1788

The objections of Consider Arms and his friends were answered by Philanthrop in the Hampshire Gazette, 23 April 1788, which in turn gave rise to an exchange with Phileleutheros, whose first essay follows. The author pursues the issue of the extent of the involvement of the free states in the sin of Southern slavery and its implications for American civil society.

Quid miseros toties in operta Pericula-Cives, projitus
Virgil.[1]

I have somewhat to say in regard to a piece under the signature of Philanthrop, inserted in the Hampshire Gazette of April 23, intended as an answer to the three gentlemen, who have lately published their reasons of dissent from the Federal Constitution[2]—Herein I shall study brevity. 4.27.1

It would seem Philanthrop had been for some time in hard labour, and for all that appears to the contrary, his travail is likely to continue; for it seems he has not yet brought forth; and from his complaints, there is no prospect of a speedy delivery; and therefore, according to the common course of things, his dissolution must soon ensue, unless some skilful operator should step in and facilitate the birth. But to drop the metaphor—Philanthrop seems to be perplexed, not being able to spy out the cause of the publication of those three gentlemen. And it would seem, he has been as hard put to it to obviate their objections, as to investigate their designs. It matters not, that I know of, to Philanthrop, what their intention was. It is evident (if we take his own words for it) that he is by no means assured they had a bad one; for says he, "I am at a loss to conjecture what motives occasioned their publications." Therefore one would think that candour, he recommends to the gentlemen, would have induced him to suppose they had nothing very atrocious in view. In considering this piece, I shall (setting aside sophistry) do pretty much as Philanthrop has done, in animadverting upon the objections. 4.27.2

I shall not confine myself to order—I think he did not—and if it should so happen, I find any thing I cannot censure[?]. I shall follow his example and say nothing about it.

4.27.3 He says, "he hopes if charity obliges them to bless the negroes, it will not lead them to curse the Convention"—this is evidently intended as a sarcasm upon the gentlemen, for vindicating the injured rights of the Africans. Why is it thus? Is it because their colour is not so fashionable in this country as in Africa? Or that their features are not supposed to be so beautifully arranged as those of the Americans, and therefore not to be treated with that humanity which it is generally thought belongs to white people? Or does Philanthrop suppose, with some scoffers at sacred history, that those Africans did not proceed from the loins of the same parent with himself, and so on that score to be treated like brutes? He seems to charge them with cursing the Convention, only because they said that body voted for those barbarities which are exercised towards the Africans. Does this amount to a curse? can rehersing a plain matter of fact, concerning any man or body of men, by good logic, be construed into a curse? Did not the Convention vote, that the Congress should not have it in their power to prohibit the slave-trade until the year eighteen hundred and eight? Were they not sensible, therefore, that this trade would be carried on, with all those barbarities annexed to it?[3] Did they not very generally confess that it was a most wicked piece of business? Where then is the great crime in saying such barbarities were voted for? If it is so, let Philanthrop point out the criminality of it, and no doubt he will obtain credence. If he make a charge he ought certainly to adduce some proof to support it. He must be possessed of some entirely new constructed spy-glass, else he never could have spied out curses where there were none. As little ground had he to dream, from any which dropped from the gentlemen, that they had a desire to return back to Great-Britain, as he had to tax them with cursing the Convention. Two constitutions were offered to the people of Massachusetts before one could obtain. Must we infer from thence, that those who opposed the first, did it with a view of becoming subject to Great-Britain? Let him answer, if he please.

4.27.4 I wish, seeing Philanthrop thought fit to take the matter up, that he had made use of less false reasoning—I will give an instance of it. He says, "While under Great-Britain, we heard nothing from the gentlemen, because that nation more than any under heaven, carried on that trade;" and "that whenever a neighbour had imported a slave, their duty was either to drive him out of the country or to quit it themselves." It would not, one would think, require a degree of discernment far beyond mediocrity, to discover the falacy of this argument. Will the gentleman pretend there is no difference between a man's being born under a government, in the framing of which, consequently he could have no hand, and in making one himself? If a man in a state of nature assists in forming a constitution, which gives countenance to iniquity and all kinds of cruelty, does he not by his own act incur guilt to his conscience? But if he is born under such a government, where is the guilt? Neither hath he any right to take upon himself the office of an executioner, and so undertake to punish those who are guilty, as Philanthrop would suppose—all he can have any right to is to remonstrate and exhort. He indeed may share in the calamities which may fall upon the community in consequence thereof; but he has this consolation, that those calamities are not derived through his means, and therefore he cannot share in the guilt.

When a man is called to establish a frame of government, it ought to be such an one as his conscience will justify, or he must give his voice against it. I must say the whole Philanthrop has said on this subject is falacious, from the foundation to the top-stone. His first position seems calculated to deceive the people, whether designedly or not, I do not say—the purport of which is evidently this, that by civil connections people cannot become partakers of each others sins.[4] What is the import of "civil connections?" Let them import what they will, it is evident Philanthrop would have us think, that in establishing this constitution, we have no more connection in the wickedness which the southern states may commit, with our hearty and free consent and engagements to support them in, than we should be with any one nation under heaven in their inequities, provided we had connected with them for the sake of their trade, &c. But these are not parallel—I wish Philanthrop had ingenuity enough to confess it. It is idle for him to pretend, that establishing this constitution is no more than barely establishing certain civil connections with the southern states; was this the case I would agree with him. I am sensible America may enter into a treaty and connect with Spain for certain purposes, and still not become partakers in the iniquity of the inquisition. But if America and Spain were about to form themselves into one politic national body, and America should in that case pledge to Spain their lives and fortunes for the support of the inquisition, (*cousin german, to the slave-trade) I should certainly suppose, upon good grounds, they would become partakers of the sin, connected with the inquisition. But lest I should be too lengthy, I shall wave what I have to say further upon Philanthrop's piece, until another opportunity, only adding my wish, that if he writes again, his sentiments may better agree with his signature. 4.27.5

Observations On the New Constitution, And on the Federal and State Conventions. By A Columbian Patriot

Boston, 1788

This pamphlet was written some time after the ratification of the Constitution by Massachusetts (16 February 1788) and before the ratification of Maryland (26 April 1788). It is known to have been distributed in New York and probably elsewhere.[1] Although formerly attributed to Elbridge Gerry, the author has now been persuasively identified by Charles Warren as his ancestor, Mercy Otis Warren.[2] An active member of Massachusetts intellectual and political circles, Mrs. Warren, the sister of James Otis and wife of James Warren, was the author of several plays and poems, many on political themes. Her most ambitious work was an excellent three-volume account of the Revolution, The History of the Rise, Progress and Termination of the American Revolution. A comparison of A Columbian Patriot with the last chapters of this history tends to confirm her authorship of the former, for there are many close parallels of both substance and style.[3]

The essay opens with reflections on the changes that revolutions produce in the character of a people and the dangers to Americans of the present period. The body of the essay consists of a list of eighteen objections to the Constitution (4.28.4). In the first the author describes this complex government, this "heterogeneous phantom" or "favored bantling," so inconsistent with simple, responsible government (1, 9). Objections are made to the following: the absence of a provision for liberty of the press and rights of conscience (2); the extensive original and appellate judiciary powers and the "abolition" of trial by jury in civil cases (3, 5, 10); the blending of the executive and the legislative powers (5); the provisions for the army and militia (6); the absence of a capacity of self-defense by the states and the attempt to provide a single legislature for such a large territory (7, 15); the inadequate representation in the general government (11, 12, 13); the absence of a bill of rights (14); the unauthorized proposal of a new consolidated system (16); and the proposed mode of ratification (17–18).

The author concludes with a strong criticism of the proceedings in the Massachusetts convention and a call for a new convention. Warning against the effects of monarchy and aristocracy on the American character and public virtue (4.28.8), she speculates on the actions of the state conventions yet to meet, points to the need and the possibility of leaders "who have genius and capacity sufficient to form the manners and correct the morals of the people, and virtue enough to lead their country to freedom" (4.28.12).

While the bulk of the essay is a rather florid version of standard arguments—Robert Rutland refers to "the strident tones of Mercy Warren's scorching pamphlet"[4]—A Columbian Patriot is at the same time more philosophical than most of her fellows. She penetrates deeper than most into a favorite Anti-Federal theme, the relation of forms of government and the character of the people. And in the last two pages (4.28.12–13) the author touches, though she does not develop, a great theme of republican government, in her acknowledgment of the need for high statesmanship (at this and, by implication, other critical moments) but at the same time her denial that this proves the incapacity of the people to govern themselves. In a very rare note, the essay concludes with the reflection that if the issue over the Constitution is decided wrongly and freedom lost, the "sublimer characters, the philosophic lovers of freedom" must needs "retire to the calm shades of contemplation, [and] there they may look down with pity on the inconsistency of human nature, the revolutions of states, the rise of kingdoms, and the fall of empires."

Sic transit gloria Americana.

Mankind may amuse themselves with theoretick systems of liberty, and trace its social and moral effects on sciences, virtue, industry, and every improvement of which the human mind is capable; but we can only discern its true value by the practical and wretched effects of slavery; and thus dreadfully will they be realized, when the inhabitants of the Eastern States are dragging out a miserable existence, only on the gleanings of their fields; and the Southern, blessed with a softer and more fertile climate, are languishing in hopeless poverty; and when asked, what is become of the flower of their crop, and the rich produce of their farms—they may answer in the 4.28.1

hapless stile of the Man of La Mancha,—"The steward of my Lord has seized and sent it to Madrid."[1]—Or, in the more literal language of truth, The exigencies of government require that the collectors of the revenue should transmit it to the Federal City.

4.28.2 Animated with the firmest zeal for the interest of this country, the peace and union of the American States, and the freedom and happiness of a people who have made the most costly sacrifices in the cause of liberty,—who have braved the power of Britain, weathered the convulsions of war, and waded thro' the blood of friends and foes to establish their independence and to support the freedom of the human mind; I cannot silently witness this degradation without calling on them, before they are compelled to blush at their own servitude, and to turn back their languid eyes on their lost liberties—to consider, that the character of nations generally changes at the moment of revolution.—And when patriotism is discountenanced and publick virtue becomes the ridicule of the sycophant—when every man of liberality, firmness, and penetration, who cannot lick the hand stretched out to oppress, is deemed an enemy to the State—then is the gulph of despotism set open, and the grades to slavery, though rapid, are scarce perceptible—then genius drags heavily its iron chain—science is neglected, and real merit flies to the shades for security from reproach—the mind becomes enervated, and the national character sinks to a kind of apathy with only energy sufficient to curse the breast that gave it milk, and as an elegant writer observes, "To bewail every new birth as an encrease of misery, under a government where the mind is necessarily debased, and talents are seduced to become the panegyrists of usurpation and tyranny." He adds, "that even sedition is not the most indubitable enemy to the publick welfare; but that its most dreadful foe is despotism, which always changes the character of nations for the worse, and is productive of nothing but vice, that the tyrant no longer excites to the pursuits of glory or virtue; it is not talents, it is baseness and servility that he cherishes, and the weight of arbitrary power destroys the spring of emulation."* If such is the influence of government on the character and manners, and undoubtedly the observation is just, must we not subscribe to the opinion of the celebrated Abbé Mablé? "That there are disagreeable seasons in the unhappy situation of human affairs, when policy requires both the intention and the power of doing mischief to be punished; and that when the senate proscribed the memory of Caesar they ought to have put Anthony to death, and extinguished the hopes of Octavius."[3] Self defence is a primary law of nature, which no subsequent law of society can abolish; this primœval principle, the immediate gift of the Creator, obliges every one to remonstrate against the strides of ambition, and a wanton lust of domination, and to resist the first approaches of tyranny, which at this day threaten to sweep away the rights for which the brave sons of America have fought with an heroism scarcely paralleled even in ancient republicks. It may be repeated, they have purchased it with their blood, and have gloried in their independence with a dignity of spirit, which has made them the admiration of philosophy, the pride of America, and the wonder of Europe. It has been observed, with great propriety, that "the virtues and vices of a people when a revolution happens in their government, are the measure of the liberty or slavery they ought to expect—An heroic love for the publick good, a profound reverence for the laws, a contempt of riches, and a noble haughtiness of soul, are the only foundations of a free government."* Do not their dignified principles still exist among us? Or are they extinguished in the breasts of Americans, whose fields have been so recently crimsoned to repel the potent arm of a foreign Monarch, who had planted his engines of slavery in every city, with design to erase the vestiges of freedom in this his last asylum. It is yet to be hoped, for the honour of human nature, that no combinations either foreign or domestick have thus darkened this Western hemisphere.—On these shores freedom has planted her standard, diped in the purple tide that flowed from the veins of her martyred heroes; and here every uncorrupted American yet hopes to see it supported by the vigour, the justice, the wisdom and unanimity of the people, in spite of the deep-laid plots, the secret intrigues, or the bold effrontery of those interested and avaricious adventurers for place, who intoxicated with the ideas of distinction and preferment, have prostrated every worthy principle beneath the shrine of ambition. Yet these are the men who tell us republicanism is dwindled into theory—that we are incapable of enjoying our liberties—and that we must have a master.—Let us retrospect the days of our adversity, and recollect who were then our friends; do we find them among the sticklers for aristocratick authority? No, they were generally the same men who now wish to save us from the distractions of anarchy on the one hand, and the jaws of tyranny on the other; where then were the class who now come forth importunately urging that our political salvation depends on the adoption of a system at which freedom spurns?—Were not some of them hidden in the corners of obscurity, and others wrapping themselves in the bosom of our enemies for safety? Some of them were in the arms of infancy; and others speculating for fortune, by sporting with public money; while a few, a very few of them were magnanimously defending their country, and raising a character, which I pray heaven may never be sullied by aiding measures derogatory to their former exertions. But the revolutions in principle which time produces among mankind, frequently exhibits the most mortifying instances of human weakness; and this alone can account for the extraordinary appearance of a few names, once distinguished in the honourable walks of patriotism, but now found on the list of the Massachusetts assent to the ratification of a

*Abbé Mablé.[4]

Constitution, which, by the undefined meaning of some parts, and the ambiguities of expression in others, is dangerously adapted to the purposes of an immediate aristocratic tyranny; that from the difficulty, if not impracticability of its operation, must soon terminate in the most uncontrouled despotism.

4.28.3 All writers on government agree, and the feelings of the human mind witness the truth of these political axioms, that man is born free and possessed of certain unalienable rights—that government is instituted for the protection, safety, and happiness of the people, and not for the profit, honour, or private interest of any man, family, or class of men—That the origin of all power is in the people, and that they have an incontestible right to check the creatures of their own creation, vested with certain powers to guard the life, liberty and property of the community: And if certain selected bodies of men, deputed on these principles, determine contrary to the wishes and expectations of their constituents, the people have an undoubted right to reject their decisions, to call for a revision of their conduct, to depute others in their room, or if they think proper, to demand further time for deliberation on matters of the greatest moment: it therefore is an unwarrantable stretch of authority or influence, if any methods are taken to preclude this reasonable, and peaceful mode of enquiry and decision. And it is with inexpressible anxiety, that many of the best friends to the Union of the States—to the peaceable and equal participation of the rights of nature, and to the glory and dignity of this country, behold the insiduous arts, and the strenuous efforts of the partisans of arbitrary power, by their vague definitions of the best established truths, endeavoring to envelope the mind in darkness the concomitant of slavery, and to lock the strong chains of domestic despotism on a country, which by the most glorious and successful struggles is but newly emancipated from the sceptre of foreign dominion.—But there are certain seasons in the course of human affairs, when Genius, Virtue, and Patriotism, seems to nod over the vices of the times, and perhaps never more remarkably, than at the present period; or we should not see such a passive disposition prevail in some, who we must candidly suppose, have liberal and enlarged sentiments; while a supple multitude are paying a blind and idolatrous homage to the opinions of those who by the most precipitate steps are treading down their dear bought privileges; and who are endeavouring by all the arts of insinuation, and influence, to betray the people of the United States, into an acceptance of a most complicated system of government; marked on the one side with the dark, secret and profound intrigues, of the statesman, long practiced in the purlieus of despotism; and on the other, with the ideal projects of young ambition, with its wings just expanded to soar to a summit, which imagination has painted in such gawdy colours as to intoxicate the inexperienced votary, and send him rambling from State to State, to collect materials to construct the ladder of preferment.

But as a variety of objections to the heterogeneous phantom, have been repeatedly laid before the public, by men of the best abilities and intentions; I will not expatiate long on a Republican form of government, founded on the principles of monarchy—a democratick branch with the features of aristocracy—and the extravagance of nobility pervading the minds of many of the candidates for office, with the poverty of peasantry hanging heavily on them, and insurmountable, from their taste for expence, unless a generous provision should be made in the arrangement of the civil list, which may enable them with the champions of their cause to "sail down the new pactolean channel." Some gentlemen with laboured zeal, have spent much time in urging the necessity of government, from the embarrassments of trade—the want of respectability abroad and confidence in the public engagements at home:—These are obvious truths which no one denies; and there are few who do not unite in the general wish for the restoration of public faith, the revival of commerce, arts, agriculture, and industry, under a lenient, peaceable and energetick government: But the most sagacious advocates for the party have not by fair discusion, and rational argumentation, evinced the necessity of adopting this many-headed monster; of such motley mixture, that its enemies cannot trace a feature of Democratick or Republican extract; nor have its friends the courage to denominate it a Monarchy, an Aristocracy, or an Oligarchy, and the favoured bantling must have passed through the short period of its existence without a name, had not Mr. Wilson, in the fertility of his genius, suggested the happy epithet of a Federal Republic[5]—But I leave the field of general censure on the secrecy of its birth, the rapidity of its growth, and the fatal consequences of suffering it to live to the age of maturity, and will particularize some of the most weighty objections to its passing through this continent in a gigantic size.—It will be allowed by every one that the fundamental principle of a free government, is the equal representation of a free people—And I will first observe with a justly celebrated writer, "That the principal aim of society is to protect individuals in the absolute rights which were vested in them by the immediate laws of nature, but which could not be preserved in peace, without the mutual intercourse which is gained by the institution of friendly and social communities."[6] And when society has thus deputed a certain number of their equals to take care of their personal rights, and the interest of the whole community, it must be considered that responsibility is the great security of integrity and honour; and that annual election is the basis of responsibility.—Man is not immediately corrupted, but power without limitation, or amenability, may endanger the brightest virtue—whereas a frequent return to the bar of their Constituents is the strongest check against the corruptions to which men are liable, either from the intrigues of others of more subtle genius, or the propensities of their own hearts,—and the gentlemen who have so warmly advocated in the late Convention of the Massachusetts, the change from annual to biennial elections;[7] may have been in the same predicament, and perhaps with the same views that Mr. Hutchinson once acknowledged himself, when in a letter to Lord Hillsborough, he observed, "that the grand difficulty of making a change in government against the general bent of the people had caused him to turn his thoughts to a variety of plans, in order to find one that might be executed in spite of opposition," and the first he proposed was that, "instead of annual, the elections should be only once in three years:" but the Minister had not the hardiness to attempt such an innovation, even in the revision of colonial charters:[8] nor has any one ever defended Biennial, Triennial, or Septennial, Elections, either in the British House of Commons, or in the debates of Provincial assemblies, on general and free principles: but it is unnecessary to dwell long on this article, as the best political writers have supported the principles of annual elections with a precision, that cannot be confuted, though they may be darkned, by the sophistical arguments that have been thrown out with design, to undermine all the barriers of freedom.

2. There is no security in the profered system, either for the rights of conscience, or the liberty of the Press: Despotism usually while it is gaining ground, will suffer men to think, say, or write what they please; but when once established, if it is thought necessary to subserve the purposes of arbitrary power, the most unjust restrictions may take place in the first instance, and an imprimator on the Press in the next, may silence the complaints, and forbid the most decent remonstrances of an injured and oppressed people.

3. There are no well defined limits of the Judiciary Powers, they seem to be left as a boundless ocean, that has broken over the chart of the Supreme Lawgiver "thus far shalt thou go and no further," and as they cannot be comprehended by the clearest capacity, or the most sagacious mind, it would be an Herculean labour to attempt to describe the dangers with which they are replete.

4. The Executive and the Legislative are so dangerously blended as to give just cause of alarm, and every thing relative thereto, is couched in such ambiguous terms—in such vague and indefinite expression, as is a sufficient ground without any other objection, for the reprobation of a system, that the authors dare not hazard to a clear investigation.

5. The abolition of trial by jury in civil causes.—This mode of trial the learned Judge Blackstone observes, "has been coeval with the first rudiments of civil government, that property, liberty and life, depend on maintaining in its legal force the constitutional trial by jury." He bids his readers pauze, and with Sir Matthew Hale observes, how admirably this mode is adapted to the investigation of truth beyond any other the world can produce.[9] Even the party who have been disposed to swallow, without examination, the proposals of the secret conclave, have started on a discovery that this essential right was curtailed; and shall a privilege, the origin of which may be traced to our Saxon ancestors—that has been a part of the law of nations, even in the fewdatory systems of France, Germany and Italy—and from the earliest records has been held so sacred, both in ancient and modern Britain, that it could never be shaken by the introduction of Norman customs, or any other conquests or change of government—shall this inestimable privilege be relinquished in America—either thro' the fear of inquisition for unaccounted thousands of public monies in the hands of some who have been officious in the fabrication of the consolidated system, or from the apprehension that some future delinquent possessed of more power than integrity, may be called to a trial by his peers in the hour of investigation?

6. Though it has been said by Mr. Wilson and many others, that a Standing-Army is necessary for the dignity and safety of America,[10] yet freedom revolts at the idea, when the Divan, or the Despot, may draw out his dragoons to suppress the murmurs of a few, who may yet cherish those sublime principles which call forth the exertions, and lead to the best improvement of the human mind. It is hoped this country may yet be governed by milder methods than are usually displayed beneath the bannerets of military law.—Standing armies have been the nursery of vice and the bane of liberty from the Roman legions, to the establishment of the artful Ximenes, and from the ruin of the Cortes of Spain, to the planting the British cohorts in the capitals of America:—By the edicts of authority vested in the sovereign power by the proposed constitution, the militia of the country, the bulwark of defence, and the security of national liberty is no longer under the controul of civil authority; but at the rescript of the Monarch, or the aristocracy, they may either be employed to extort the enormous sums that will be necessary to support the civil list—to maintain the regalia of power—and the splendour of the most useless part of the community, or they may be sent into foreign countries for the fulfilment of treaties, stipulated by the President and two thirds of the Senate.

7. Notwithstanding the delusory promise to guarantee a Republican form of government to every State in the Union—If the most discerning eye could discover any meaning at all in the engagement, there are no resources left for the support of internal government, or the liquidation of the debts of the State. Every source of revenue is in the monopoly of Congress, and if the several legislatures in their enfebled state, should against their own feelings be necessitated to attempt a dry tax for the payment of their debts, and the support of internal police, even this may be required for the purposes of the general government.

8. As the new Congress are empowered to determine their own salaries, the requisitions for this purpose may not be very moderate, and the drain for public moneys will probably rise past all calculation: and it is to be feared when America has consolidated its despotism, the world will witness the truth of the assertion—"that the pomp of an eastern monarch may impose on the vulgar who may estimate the force of a nation by the magnificence of its palaces; but the wise man, judges differently, it is by that very magnificence he estimates its weakness. He sees nothing more in the midst of this imposing pomp, where the tyrant sets enthroned, than a sumptuous and mournful decoration of the dead; the apparatus of a fastuous funeral, in the centre of which is a cold and lifeless lump of unanimated earth, a phantom of power ready to disappear before the enemy, by whom it is despised!"[11]

9. There is no provision for a rotation, nor any thing to prevent the perpetuity of office in the same hands for life; which by a little well timed bribery, will probably be done, to the exclusion of men of the best abilities from their share in the offices of government.—By this neglect we lose the advantages of that check to the overbearing insolence of office, which by rendering him ineligible at certain periods, keeps the mind of man in equilibrio, and teaches him the feelings of the governed, and better qualifies him to govern in his turn.

10. The inhabitants of the United States, are liable to be draged from the vicinity of their own county, or state, to answer to the litigious or unjust suit of an adversary, on the most distant borders of the Continent: in short the appelate jurisdiction of the Supreme Federal Court, includes an unwarrantable stretch of power over the liberty, life, and property of the subject, through the wide Continent of America.

11. One Representative to thirty thousand inhabitants is a very inadequate representation; and every man who is not lost to all sense of freedom to his country, must reprobate the idea of Congress altering by law, or on any pretence whatever, interfering with any regulations for the time, places, and manner of choosing our own Representatives.

12. If the sovereignty of America is designed to be elective, the circumscribing the votes to only ten electors in this State, and the same proportion in all the others, is nearly tantamount to the exclusion of the voice of the people in the choice of their first magistrate. It is vesting the choice solely in an aristocratic junto, who may easily combine in each State to place at the head of the Union the most convenient instrument for despotic sway.

13. A Senate chosen for six years will, in most instances, be an appointment for life, as the influence of such a body over the minds of the people will be coequal to the extensive powers with which they are vested, and they will not only forget, but be forgotten by their constituents—a branch of the Supreme Legislature thus set beyond all responsibility is totally repugnant to every principle of a free government.

14. There is no provision by a bill of rights to guard against the dangerous encroachments of power in too many instances to be named: but I cannot pass over in silence the insecurity in which we are left with regard to warrants unsupported by evidence—the daring experiment of granting writs of assistance in a former arbitrary administration is not yet forgotten in the Massachusetts; nor can we be so ungrateful to the memory of the patriots who counteracted their operation, as so soon after their manly exertions to save us from such a detestable instrument of arbitrary power, to subject ourselves to the insolence of any petty revenue officer to enter our houses, search, insult, and seize at pleasure. We are told by a gentleman of too much virtue and real probity to suspect he has a design to deceive—"that the whole constitution is a declaration of rights"—but mankind must think for themselves, and to many very judicious and discerning characters, the whole constitution with very few exceptions appears to perversion of the rights of particular states, and of private citizens.—But the gentleman goes on to tell us, "that the primary object is the general government, and that the rights of individuals are only incidentally mentioned, and that there was a clear impropriety in being very particular about them."[12] But, asking pardon for dissenting from such respectable authority, who has been led into several mistakes, more from his prediliction in favour of certain modes of government, than from a want of understanding or veracity. The rights of individuals ought to be the primary object of all government, and cannot be too securely guarded by the most explicit declarations in their favor. This has been the opinion of the Hampdens, the Pyms, and many other illustrious names, that have stood forth in defence of English liberties; and even the Italian master in politicks, the subtle and renouned Machiavel acknowledges, that no republic ever yet stood on a stable foundation without satisfying the common people.[13]

15. The difficulty, if not impracticability, of exercising the equal and equitable powers of government by a single legislature over an extent of territory that reaches from the Missisippi to the Western lakes, and from them to the Atlantic ocean, is an insuperable objection to the adoption of the new system.—Mr. Hutchinson, the great champion for arbitrary power, in the multitude of his machinations to subvert the liberties of this country, was obliged to acknowledge in one of his letters, that, from the extent of country from north to south, the scheme of one government was impracticable." But if the authors of the present visionary project, can by the arts of deception, precipitation and address, obtain a majority of suffrages in the conventions of the states to try the hazardous experiment, they may then make the same inglorious boast with this insidious politician, who may perhaps be their model, that "the union of the colonies was pretty well broken, and that he hoped never to see it revewed."[14]

16. It is an indisputed fact, that not one legislature in the United States had the most distant idea when they first appointed members for a convention, entirely commercial, or when they afterwards authorised them to consider on some amendments of the Federal union, that they would without any warrant from their constituents, presume on so bold and daring a stride, as ultimately to destroy the state governments, and offer a consolidated system, irreversible but on conditions that the smallest degree of penetration must discover to be impracticable.

17. The first appearance of the article which declares the ratification of nine states sufficient for the establishment of the new system, wears the face of dissention, is a subversion of the union of the Confederated States, and tends to the introduction of anarchy and civil convulsions, and may be a means of involving the whole country in blood.

18. The mode in which this constitution is recommended to the people to judge without either the advice of Congress, or the legislatures of the several states, is very reprehensible—it is an attempt to force it upon them before it could be thoroughly understood, and may leave us in that situation, that in the first moments of slavery the minds of the people agitated by the remembrance of their lost liberties, will be like the sea in a tempest, that sweeps down every mound of security.

4.28.5 But it is needless to enumerate other instances, in which the proposed constitution appears contradictory to the first principles which ought to govern mankind; and it is equally so to enquire into the motives that induced to so bold a step as the annihilation of the independence and sovereignty of the thirteen distinct states.—They are but too obvious through the whole progress of the business, from the first shutting up the doors of the federal convention and resolving that no member should correspond with gentlemen in the different states on the subject under discussion; till the trivial proposition of recommending a few amendments was artfully ushered into the convention of the Massachusetts. The questions that were then before that honorable assembly were profound and important, they were of such magnitude and extent, that the consequences may run parallel with the existence of the country; and to see them waved and hastily terminated by a measure too absurd to require a serious refutation, raises the honest indignation of every true lover of his country. Nor are they less grieved that the ill policy and arbitrary disposition of some of the sons of America has thus precipitated to the contemplation and discusion of questions that no one could rationally suppose would have been agitated among us, till time had blotted out the principles on which the late revolution was grounded; or till the last traits of the many political tracts, which defended the seperation from Britain, and the rights of men were consigned to everlasting oblivion. After the severe conflicts this country has suffered, it is presumed that they are disposed to make every reasonable sacrifice before the altar of peace,—But when we contemplate the nature of men and consider them originally on an equal footing, subject to the same feelings, stimulated by the same passions, and recollecting the struggles they have recently made, for the security of their civil rights; it cannot be expected that the inhabitants of the Massachusetts, can be easily lulled into a fatal security, by the declamatory effusions of gentlemen, who, contrary to the experience of all ages would persuade them there is no danger to be apprehended, from vesting discretionary powers in the hands of man, which he may, or may not abuse. The very suggestion, that we ought to trust to the precarious hope of amendments and redress, after we have voluntarily fixed the shackles on our own necks should have awakened to a double degree of caution.—This people have not forgotten the artful insinuations of a former Governor, when pleading the unlimited authority of parliament before the legislature of the Massachusetts; nor that his arguments were very similar to some lately urged by gentlemen who boast of opposing his measures, "with halters about their necks."[15]

We were then told by him, in all the soft language of insinuation, that no 4.28.6 form of government of human construction can be perfect—that we had nothing to fear—that we had no reason to complain—that we had only to acquiesce in their illegal claims, and to submit to the requisitions of parliament, and doubtless the lenient hand of government would redress all grievances, and remove the oppressions of the people:—[16]Yet we soon saw armies of mercenaries encamped on our plains—our commerce ruined—our harbours blockaded—and our cities burnt. It may be replied, that this was in consequence of an obstinate defence of our privileges; this may be true; and when the "ultima ratio" is called to aid, the weakest must fall. But let the best informed historian produce an instance when bodies of men were intrusted with power, and the proper checks relinquished, if they were ever found destitute of ingenuity sufficient to furnish pretences to abuse it. And the people at large are already sensible, that the liberties which America has claimed, which reason has justified, and which have been so gloriously defended by the sword of the brave; are not about to fall before the tyranny of foreign conquest: it is native usurpation that is shaking the foundations of peace, and spreading the sable curtain of despotism over the United States. The banners of freedom were erected in the wilds of America by our ancestors, while the wolf prowled for his prey on the one hand, and more savage man on the other; they have been since rescued from the invading hand of foreign power, by the valor and blood of their posterity; and there was reason to hope they would continue for ages to illumine a quarter of the globe, by nature kindly seperated from the proud monarchies of Europe, and the infernal darkness of Asiatic slavery.—And it is to be feared we shall soon see this country rushing into the extremes of confusion and violence, in consequence of the proceedings of a set of gentlemen, who disregarding the purposes of their appointment, have assumed powers unauthorised by any commission, have unnecessarily rejected the confederation of the United States, and annihilated the sovereignty and independence of the individual governments.—The causes which have inspired a few men assembled for very different purposes with such a degree of temerity as to break with a single stroke the union of America, and disseminate the seeds of discord through the land may be easily investigated, when we survey the partizans of monarchy in the state conventions, urging the adoption of a mode of government that militates with the former professions and exertions of this country, and with all ideas of republicanism, and the equal rights of men.

4.28.7 Passion, prejudice, and error, are characteristics of human nature; and as it cannot be accounted for on any principles of philosophy, religion, or good policy; to these shades in the human character must be attributed the mad zeal of some, to precipitate to a blind adoption of the measures of the late federal convention, without giving opportunity for better information to those who are misled by influence or ignorance into erroneous opinions.—Litterary talents may be prostituted, and the powers of genius debased to subserve the purposes of ambition, or avarice; but the feelings of the heart will dictate the language of truth, and the simplicity of her accents will proclaim the infamy of those, who betray the rights of the people, under the specious, and popular pretence of justice, consolidation, and dignity.

4.28.8 It is presumed the great body of the people unite in sentiment with the writer of these observations, who most devoutly prays that public credit may rear her declining head, and remunerative justice pervade the land; nor is there a doubt if a free government is continued, that time and industry will enable both the public and private debtor to liquidate their arrearages in the most equitable manner. They wish to see the Confederated States bound together by the most indissoluble union, but without renouncing their seperate sovereignities and independence, and becoming tributaries to a consolidated fabrick of aristocratick tyranny.—They wish to see government established, and peaceably holding the reins with honour, energy, and dignity; but they wish for no federal city whose "cloud cap't towers" may screen the state culprit from the hand of justice; while its exclusive jurisdiction may protect the riot of armies encamped within its limits.—They deprecate discord and civil convulsions, but they are not yet generally prepared with the ungrateful Israelites to ask a King, nor are their spirits sufficiently broken to yield the best of their olive grounds to his servants, and to see their sons appointed to run before his chariots—It has been observed by a zealous advocate for the new system, that most governments are the result of fraud or violence,[17] and this with design to recommend its acceptance—but has not almost every step towards its fabrication been fraudulent in the extreme? Did not the prohibition strictly enjoined by the general Convention, that no member should make any communication to his Constituents, or to gentlemen of consideration and abilities in the other States, bear evident marks of fraudulent designs?—This circumstance is regretted in strong terms by Mr. Martin, a member from Maryland, who acknowledges "He had no idea that all the wisdom, integrity, and virtue of the States was contained in that Convention, and that he wished to have corresponded with gentlemen of eminent political characters abroad, and to give their sentiments due weight"—he adds, "so extremely solicitous were they, that their proceedings should not transpire, that the members were prohibited from taking copies of their resolutions, or extracts from the Journals, without express permission, by vote."[18]—And the hurry with which it has been urged to the acceptance of the people, without giving time, by adjournments, for better information, and more unanimity has a deceptive appearance; and if finally driven to resistance, as the only alternative between that and servitude, till in the confusion of discord, the reins should be seized by the violence of some enterprizing genius, that may sweep down the last barrier of liberty, it must be added to the score of criminality with which the fraudulent usurpation at Philadelphia, may be chargeable.—Heaven avert such a tremendous scene! and let us still hope a more happy termination of the present ferment:—may the people be calm, and wait a legal redress; may the mad transport of some of our infatuated capitals subside; and every influential character through the States, make the most prudent exertions for a new general Convention, who may vest adequate powers in Congress, for all national purposes, without annihilating the individual governments, and drawing blood from every pore by taxes, impositions and illegal restrictions.—This step might again re-establish the Union, restore tranquility to the ruffled mind of the inhabitants, and save America from distresses, dreadful even in contemplation.—"The great art of governing is to lay aside all prejudices and attachments to particular opinions, classes or individual characters; to consult the spirit of the people; to give way to it; and in so doing, to give it a turn capable of inspiring those sentiments, which may induce them to relish a change, which an alteration of circumstances may hereafter make necessary."[19]—The education of the advocates for monarchy should have taught them, and their memory should have suggested that "monarchy is a species of government fit only for a people too much corrupted by luxury, avarice, and a passion for pleasure, to have any love for their country, and whose vices the fear of punishment alone is able to restrain; but by no means calculated for a nation that is poor, and at the same time tenacious of their liberty—animated with a disgust to tyranny—and inspired with the generous feelings of patriotism and liberty, and at the same time, like the ancient Spartans have been hardened by temperance and manly exertions, and equally despising the fatigues of the field, and the fear of enemies,"[20]—and while they change their ground they should recollect, that Aristocracy is still a more formidable foe to public virtue, and the prosperity of a nation—that under such a government her patriots become mercenaries—her soldiers, cowards, and the people slaves.—Though several State Conventions have assented to, and ratified, yet the voice of the people appears at present strong against the adoption of the Constitution.—By the chicanery, intrigue, and false colouring of those who plume themselves, more on their education and abilities, than their political, patriotic, or private virtues—by the imbecility of some, and the duplicity of others, a majority of the Convention of Massachusetts have been flattered with the ideas of amendments, when it will be too late to complain—While several very worthy characters, too timid for their situation, magnified the hopeless alternative, between the dissolution of the bands of all government, and receiving the proffered system in toto, after long endeavouring to reconcile it to their consciences, swallowed the indigestible penacea, and in a kind of sudden desperation lent their signature to the dereliction of the honorable station they held in the Union, and have broken over the solemn compact, by which they were bound to support their own excellent constitution till the period of revision.—Yet Virginia, equally large and respectable, and who have done honour to themselves, by their vigorous exertions from the first dawn of independence, have not yet acted upon the question; they have wisely taken time to consider before they introduce innovations of a most dangerous nature:—her inhabitants are brave, her burgesses are free, and they have a Governor who dares to think for himself, and to speak his opinion (without first pouring libations on the altar of popularity) though it should militate with some of the most accomplished and illustrious characters.

4.28.9 Maryland, who has no local interest to lead her to adopt, will doubtless reject the system—I hope the same characters still live, and that the same spirit which dictated to them a wise and cautious care, against sudden revolutions in government, and made them the last State that acceded to the independence of America, will lead them to support what they so deliberately claimed.—Georgia apprehensive of a war with the Savages, has acceded in order to insure protection.—Pennsylvania has struggled through much in the same manner, as the Massachusetts, against the manly feelings, and the masterly reasonings of a very respectable part of the Convention: They have adopted the system, and seen some of its authors burnt in effigy—their towns thrown into riot and confusion, and the minds of the people agitated by apprehension and discord.

4.28.10 New-Jersey and Delaware have united in the measure, from the locality of their situation, and the selfish motives which too generally govern mankind; the Federal City, and the seat of government, will naturally attract the intercourse of strangers—the youth of enterprize, and the wealth of the nation to the central States.

4.28.11 Connecticut has pushed it through with the precipitation of her neighbour, with few dissentient voices;—but more from irritation and resentment to a sister State, perhaps partiality to herself in her commercial regulations, than from a comprehensive view of the system, as a regard to the welfare of all.—But New-York has motives, that will undoubtedly lead her to a rejection, without being afraid to appeal to the understanding of mankind, to justify the grounds of their refusal to adopt a Constitution, that even the framers dare not risque to the hazard of revision, amendment, or reconsideration, least the whole superstructure should be demolished by more skilful and discreet architects.—I know not what part the Carolinas will take; but I hope their determinations will comport with the dignity and freedom of this country—their decisions will have great weight in the scale.—But equally important are the small States of New-Hampshire and Rhode-Island:—New-York, the Carolinas, Virginia, Maryland, and these two lesser States may yet support the liberties of the Continent; if they refuse a ratification, or postpone their proceedings till the spirits of the community have time to cool, there is little doubt but the wise measure of another federal convention will be adopted, when the members would have the advantage of viewing, at large, through the medium of truth, the objections that have been made from various quarters; such a measure might be attended with the most salutary effects, and prevent the dread consequences of civil feuds.—But even if some of those large states should hastily accede, yet we have frequently seen in the story of revolution, relief spring from a quarter least expected.

Though the virtues of a Cato could not save Rome, nor the abilities of a Padilla defend the citizens of Castile from falling under the yoke of Charles; yet a Tell once suddenly rose from a little obscure city, and boldly rescued the liberties of his country.—Every age has its Bruti and its Decii, as well as its Caesars and Sejani:—The happiness of mankind depends much on the modes of government, and the virtues of the governors; and America may yet produce characters who have genius and capacity sufficient to form the manners and correct the morals of the people, and virtue enough to lead their country to freedom.[21] Since her dismemberment from the British empire, America has, in many instances, resembled the conduct of a restless, vigorous, luxurious youth, prematurely emancipated from the authority of a parent, but without the experience necessary to direct him to act with dignity or discretion. Thus we have seen her break the shackles of foreign dominion, and all the blessings of peace restored on the most honourable terms: She acquired the liberty of framing her own laws, choosing her own magistrates, and adopting manners and modes of government the most favourable to the freedom and happiness of society. But how little have we availed ourselves of these superior advantages: The glorious fabric of liberty successfully reared with so much labour and assiduity totters to the foundation, and may be blown away as the bubble of fancy by the rude breath of military combinations, and politicians of yesterday. 4.28.12

It is true this country lately armed in opposition to regal despotism—impoverished by the expences of a long war, and unable immediately to fulfil their public or private engagements, have appeared in some instances, with a boldness of spirit that seemed to set at defiance all authority, government, or order, on the one hand; while on the other, there has been, not only a secret with, but an open avowal of the necessity of drawing the reins of government much too taught, not only for republicanism, but for a wise and limited monarchy.—But the character of this people is not averse to a degree of subordination: the truth of this appears from the easy restoration 4.28.13 of tranquility, after a dangerous insurrection in one of the states; this also evinces the little necessity of a complete revolution of government throughout the union. But it is a republican principle that the majority should rule; and if a spirit of moderation could be cultivated on both sides, till the voice of the people at large could be fairly heard it should be held sacred—And if, on such a scrutiny, the proposed constitution should appear repugnant to their character and wishes; if they, in the language of a late elegant pen, should acknowledge that "no confusion in my mind, is more terrible to them than the stern disciplined regularity and vaunted police of arbitrary governments, where every heart is depraved by fear, where mankind dare not assume their natural characters, where the free spirit must crouch to the slave in office, where genius must repress her effusions, or like the Egyptian worshippers, offer them in sacrifice to the calves in power, and where the human mind, always in shackles, shrinks from every generous effort."[22] Who would then have the effrontory to say, it ought not to be thrown out with indignation, however some respectable names have appeared to support it.—But if after all, on a dispassionate and fair discussion, the people generally give their voice for a voluntary dereliction of their privileges, let every individual who chooses the active scenes of life, strive to support the peace and unanimity of his country, though every other blessing may expire—And while the statesman is plodding for power, and the courtier practising the arts of dissimulation without check—while the rapacious are growing rich by oppression, and fortune throwing her gifts into the lap of fools, let the sublimer characters, the philosophic lovers of freedom who have wept over her exit, retire to the calm shades of contemplation, there they may look down with pity on the inconsistency of human nature, the revolutions of states, the rise of kingdoms, and the fall of empires.

A Note on Cross References

For convenient cross reference, and without any other editorial purpose, a three-part number has been assigned to each paragraph (or group of paragraphs where they are brief) of the writings assembled in The Complete Anti-Federalist. The first number denotes the volume, the second the position of the essay or series within that volume, and the third the paragraph. A reference to, for example, Federal Republican 3.16.13 locates a passage in the Review of the Constitution Proposed by the Late Convention, by A Federal Republican, which can be found in volume 3 of this edition. These numbers are distinct from any numbering by the authors themselves or any of their publishers; Centinel III, 2.7.73 refers to the third letter of Centinel, in volume 2 above. The abbreviation "intro." is used for Storing's introductions to volumes or parts of volumes as well as the introductions to individual texts. A reference to, say, 2.8.intro. denotes the introductory sketch and outline of the Federal Farmer, located in volume 2. Cross references to volume 1 are by page number. A cross reference from one note to another uses a three-part number plus a note number, so that the reader may refer to the text as well as the note if necessary.

PART 1

Maryland

Introduction

By the spring of 1788 six states had ratified the Constitution, and the center of activity shifted to the South, where only Georgia had ratified. The great danger to the Constitution here lay in the possibility of concerted southern action under the leadership of Patrick Henry of Virginia. The Maryland and South Carolina conventions were to meet before Virginia's, and the strategy of their Anti-Federalists was to work for a postponement if they could not secure rejection and thus to invite Virginia, with its strong Anti-Federalist group, to take the lead in rejecting or drastically modifying the Constitution.

Maryland was one of the most aristocratic of the American states, being governed by a group of planters and merchants linked by interest, background, and marriage under a constitution that required fairly high property qualifications for political participation, especially for holding senatorial and executive office. Despite a relatively low level of political participation, however, there was an active opposition group, led by Samuel Chase, and there had been considerable controversy over paper money.[1] When the legislature took up the proposed new Constitution in 1787 the Federalists agreed to delay the convention until April 1788, and to eliminate the normal property qualifications for delegates. The Senate also accepted a proposal for a "convention of the people for their full and free investigation and decision" in the place of its own words, "for their assent and ratification."[2] But the Federalists compromised out of strength and a desire to get on with the business. The convention elected was overwhelmingly Federalist. For unknown reasons the Anti-Federalist leaders did not appear in the convention for the first few days. By the time Chase, Luther Martin, and William Paca arrived, three days after the convention opened, the Constitution had gone through two readings and the question to adopt was before the House. Chase gave a lengthy speech opposing ratification. Knowing they had a safe majority and favorable rules, the Federalists listened in silence, offering no rebuttal. After an unsuccessful attempt by Paca to introduce amendments, the vote was taken, and on 26 April the Constitution was adopted 63–11.[3] The Federalists refused to accept even recommendatory amendments, which, after several days of attempted compromise in committee, were rejected by a vote of 47–26. Maryland was the only state to ratify after Massachusetts that did not submit recommendatory amendments.

Essays by A Farmer

(BALTIMORE) MARYLAND GAZETTE
February–April 1788

Among the more penetrating and comprehensive Anti-Federalist essays are these written by A [Maryland] Farmer, printed in the Maryland Gazette during February, March, and April of 1788, and here reprinted for the first time. On the issues of a bill of rights, political parties, and especially representation and simple versus complex government, the argument of this Maryland writer is indispensable to the student of Anti-Federalist thought.

While no direct evidence of authorship has been found, it seems likely that A [Maryland] Farmer was John Francis Mercer, a non-signing member of the Constitutional Convention and an active Maryland Anti-Federalist.[1] Born in Virginia, Mercer was educated at William and Mary, studied law under Thomas Jefferson, performed extensive military service during the Revolutionary War, and represented Virginia in Congress. On his marriage in 1785, he removed to Maryland, from which state he was chosen to serve in the Federal Convention in 1787, which he left before its work was finished. He played an active part in the Maryland opposition to the Constitution. On the establishment of the new government, Mercer aligned himself with the Republicans and devoted himself largely to politics. He served as a member of the Maryland House of Delegates, briefly as a member of the federal House of Representatives, and as Governor of Maryland.[2] The attribution is inconclusive since it depends almost entirely on a similarity in argument between those of A Farmer and those known to have been made by Mercer. Yet the similarity is striking and goes well beyond ordinary parallels among Anti-Federalists. The chief source of Mercer's views is Madison's report of his speech in the Convention on 14 August. We have in addition a useful letter to Jefferson, written in 1804, and the "Address to the Members of the Conventions of New York and Virginia," which is printed below.[3]

Both Mercer and A Farmer find their central argument in the contention that the Constitution falls between the two stools of genuine simple government and genuine mixed or complex government. Like many Anti-Federalists, they are much concerned with representation, but their analyses of representation—as a system tending to lead to aristocratic domination and then to tyranny unless held in check by permanent and fixed orders—are very similar to one another and quite distinct from the more usual discussions by, for example, Samuel Chase of Maryland and Richard Henry Lee of Virginia.[4] Both Mercer and A Farmer are favorably impressed with England as an example of mixed government, and both argue for a strong executive in any stable complex government.[5] Their concern for the preservation of the states is less distinctive, but here too Mercer and A Farmer are unusual in their particular discussion of the federal system as a system of balance of power[6] and in their concern with party.[7]

References are provided to the main points of similarity, so that the reader can judge for himself the accuracy of the editor's opinion that Mercer was in all probability the author of this interesting and important series of essays.

A Farmer took up his pen to reply to a Federalist pamphlet by Aristides, the pseudonym of Alexander Contee Hanson, a Maryland legislator and judge.[8] First he replies to what Aristides had described as his attack on "the whole body of anti-federalists in their stronghold," the absence of a bill of rights. While making the usual arguments here, A Farmer also turns a common Federalist view on its head by contending that, whereas in a monarchy numbers are typically on the side of the individual, in a popular government the danger to the individual lies in the interests or heated passions of the majority and that, therefore, the freer or more democratic the government, the greater the need for clear expressions of individual rights. A Farmer concludes this essay with the question whether a national government is to be preferred for the United States to a league or a confederation.

In his second essay A Farmer postpones a promised discussion of consolidation and takes up the subject of representation. This is one of the four or five major Anti-Federalist discussions of this critical issue. Here and throughout there is a tension in the author's thought between a defense of simple government in principle and an objection to a premature adoption of a complex government for which America does not provide the materials. He begins with sharp sarcasm about the brash confidence of his opponents in their new knowledge and an unusually strong statement (even for the conservative Anti-Federalists) that "there is nothing solid or useful that is new" (II, 5.1.22). Far from being unknown in former times, government by representation is coeval with mankind but, being the government most liable to corruption, has always been of short duration. Broadly speaking, the argument in this important if somewhat loose essay is that representative government is aristocracy, which is corrupt and tyrannical and which leads the desperate people to hand themselves over to a single man. Normally, then, representative government leads to tyranny supported by a standing army; but A Farmer holds out a possibility of tempering the aristocracy with a strong and independent executive (unlike the union of Senate and Executive under the Constitution). The usual course of degeneration will be speeded and exaggerated in the United States, however, when thirteen complicated forms of government are bound in a single further complicated government to the complete destruction of "all responsibility (the only test of good government)" (II, 5.1.34). The question of standing armies, their effects on liberty, and guards against them, occupy the latter half of the essay (II, 5.1.35–53).

In the third essay, A Farmer takes up the question of whether a national or a federal government is to be preferred. While a national government will add to the dignity and splendor of the United States, true happiness lies in simple quiet government. However, A Farmer sees little in the present corrupted manners of his fellow citizens to suggest that they are now capable of sustaining self-government. So far as relations among the states and defense against foreign intrigue or corruption are concerned, a confederation of small popular governments is best. In the latter part of the essay, A Farmer provides a very interesting sketch of the three main classes in the United States, and their probable future (III, 5.1.56–60). He ends with the observation that "on the preservation of parties, public liberty depends," and that the aim of a free and wise people should be to balance parties so that from the weakness of all they may be governed by the moderation of the combined judgments of the whole (III, 5.1.60).

In the fourth essay A Farmer criticizes the absence of provision for trial by jury in civil cases and discusses the value of the jury as the democratic part of the judiciary—the people's check on government and their school in public affairs.

In his very important and complex fifth essay, A Farmer returns to his major theme of representation. The discussion begins with "governments of simplicity and equal right," which have not been dealt with faithfully in theory and practice (V, 5.1.69). For whatever reasons, we seem to be tending toward mixed government with permanent and fixed orders. If this is to be our direction, let us proceed slowly and carefully. Government by representation "sets all system at defiance" by inducing constant change (V, 5.1.71). A representative system can only succeed if based on fixed and permanent orders, but the only such order in America is the yeomanry, which is powerless. The Constitution tries to erect a republic on the ruins of a corrupt monarchy. A government for the United States founded on representation requires at least an executive for life and a senate also for life appointed by the executive. The problem is to prevent the executive from becoming hereditary, for which reason the vice presidency is important (V, 5.1.72–74).

Having considered the dangers of representation and the requirements of a representative system—if that is what the United States must have—A Farmer returns in the conclusion of this essay to the advantages of simple government (V, 5.1.75–82). The English system, although good of its kind, is undeservedly praised. It is a rational system; but it required the introduction of a ministerial system and corruption to support it, and it does not prevent poverty in the lower orders and disorder. England may be compared with Switzerland, whose government is simple and in the hands of the people personally, where every citizen is legislator and soldier and where liberty, peace, and prosperity reign. Government should be in the hands of the people, that is, those who hold the property of the soil. With government in the hands of the freeholders, with reasonable sumptuary laws, and with the institution of seminaries of useful learning, the people would cease abusing their governments and would "wade up to their knees in blood" to defend them (V, 5.1.82).

In his sixth essay A Farmer replies to Aristides on various minor points, chiefly the question of concurrent jurisdiction of federal and state courts.

A Farmer concludes with a long essay, extending over several numbers of the Maryland Gazette, in which he replies to some further criticisms of Aristides and summarizes his own argument. He traces the decline of government from its initial devotion to equal rights to its unavoidably (or so A Farmer seems to think) unequal operation. Oppressed by the few, the people call on one man to rule them (VII, 5.1.94–100). This monarchy, in turn, suffers its inevitable corruption, which in turn corrupts the whole society (VII, 5.1.101–3). At length, the people look to heaven for that solace and equality they are denied on earth, but religious tyranny and corruption support and are supported by civil tyranny and corruption (VII, 5.1.104–7). Despite the loss of civil and political liberty, Europe has at least preserved a degree of social happiness impossible in great empires, due to the moderating influence of a system of balance among national powers (VII, 5.1.108–11). A Farmer concludes with reflections on the American state governments, the imperfections of which have led to the present agitations. Yet the future seems likely to be worse than the past (VII, 5.1.112–13). "[T]he truth is that we aimed at, and still aim at premature public splendor and private luxury, forgetting that bodies politic, like natural bodies, have their duration of manly vigor and the decline of age. . . . We wanted to be every thing at once—that is what we now wish, and in the event we shall be nothing or worse than nothing, we strived to patch up the ruined fabric of the British constitution for our use, and . . . we never reflected, that we had none of the distinctions of ranks which preserve that government—that the state of our society was altogether different—and that we had only the wishes, but none of the means" (VII, 5.1.113).

1. If it is assumed that the author was a fairly prominent Maryland Anti-Federalist, a reasonable assumption especially given the somewhat aristocratic structure of Maryland politics, Mercer becomes one of a handful of possibilities, and some of these had expressed themselves publicly in other forms. Mercer probably was "retired in the country," as A Farmer says he was in his sixth essay (VI, 5.1.84), on his estate in Anne Arundel County. The last of A Farmer's pieces was published on 22 April 1788, the day after the opening of the Maryland Convention (where Mercer was present), and it may be that the promised continuation was cut off by the necessity to attend the convention. None of this proves more, of course, than that Mercer might have been the author. For an address of John Francis Mercer, see 5.5.

I
15 February 1788

When men, to whom the guardianship of public liberty has been committed, 5.1.1
discover a neglect if not contempt for a bill of rights—when they answer reasons by alledging a fact,—which fact too, is no fact at all—it becomes a duty to bear testimony against such conduct, for silence and acquiescence in political language are synonimous terms.[1]

If men were as anxious about reality as appearance, we should have fewer professions of disinterested patriotism—true patriotism like true piety, is incompatible with an ostentatious personal display.

In a world more cautious than correct, the intrusion of private names in a 5.1.2
public cause, is generally considered as a sacrifice of prudence to vanity, and not unfrequently censured as impertinent—in either view it is unreasonable to require it—It is more, it is inadmissible—it would be betraying one of those inestimable rights of an individual, over which society should have no controul—the freedom of the press—and the only recompence for the treason, would be a boundless increase of private malice.[2]

That men who profess an attachment to the liberty of the press, should 5.1.3
also require names, is one of those instances of human weakness and inconsistency, that deserves rather pity than resentment. Political as well as religious freedom has ever been and forever will be destroyed by that invariable tendency of enthusiasts and bigots to mark out as objects of public resentment and persecution, those who presume to dispute their opinions or question their infallibility—and whilst there are men, enthusiasm and bigotry will prevail—it is the natural predominance of the passions over reason—The citizens of America are not yet so agitated by the phrenzy of innovation as to forget—that the object of public inquiry is, or ought to be, truth—that to convert truth into falsehood, right into wrong, is equally beyond the reach of the good, the bad, the great and the humble—A great name may indeed impose falsehood for truth—wrong for right—and whenever such voluntarily offer themselves, there may be ground for suspicion—But the people may listen with safety to those, who assert no other claim to their attention, than the reason and merit of their remarks.

5.1.4 To assert that bills of rights have always originated from, or been considered as grants of the King or Prince, and that the liberties which they secure are the gracious concessions of the sovereign, betrays an equal ignorance of history and of law, or what in effect amounts to the same thing a violent and precipitate zeal.[3]

5.1.5 I believe no writer in the most venal age, has ever openly asserted this doctrine, but the prostituted, rotten Sir Robert Filmer,[4] and Aristides—And the man who at this day would contend in England that their bill of rights is the grant of the King, would find the general contempt his only security—In saying this, I sincerely regret that the name of Aristides should be joined with that of Sir Robert Filmer, and I freely acknowledge that no contemptible degree of talents, and integrity render him who uses it, much more worthy of the very respectable association he has selected for himself—But the errors of such men alone are dangerous—the man who has too much activity of mind, or restlessness to be quiet, qualities to engage public and private esteem, talents to form and support an opinion, fortitude to avow it, and too much pride to be convinced, will at all times have weight in a free country, (especially where indolence is the general characteristic) though that weight he will always find impaired in proportion as he indulges levity, caprice and passion.

5.1.6 I will confine my inquiry to the English constitution—Example there, is in a great measure law here—and the authority of an American judge on a point of English law, should be digested with coolness and promulgated with caution, because it is frequently conclusory.

The celebrated and only bill of rights of Great-Britain, which is considered as the supreme law of the land, and not to be questioned or impeached in their courts, was the work of that convention of lords and commons in 1688, which declared that King James 2d. had abdicated the crown, and that the throne had thereby become vacant, and who after they had compleated and asserted this glorious declaration of the unalienable rights of their fellow citizens, pursuing the peculiar duty of a convention, conferred the crown of the three kingdoms on an alien and foreigner, William the 3d.

5.1.7 Can any man imagine that this convention could at that time, have considered these rights as the grant of a King, whom they previously declared to have abdicated the throne, or the gracious concessions of a Prince whom they were about to deprive forever of the crown? Or could they have considered this bill of rights as the concession of Prince William, at that time a foreigner and alien, not entitled to hold a foot of land, or any of the common rights of citizenship, and who could afterwards only derive his title to the crown from the same source, which gave authority and sanction to this fundamental and most inestimable law? or, could the British nation at that time, or ever since, have viewed this declaration, as the grant and concession of a King or Prince, when no King or Prince was at that time in existence?—But should there remain any minds yet unsatisfied, I refer such to the debates of that convention, which are preserved in Grey's debates in parliament,[5] and there will be found in them, the principles of equal liberty, the inherent and unalienable rights of men, as amply and ably discussed, and as fully recognized by the authors of that blessing, the artists of that British palladium, as ever they have since been by the animated patriots of America, or the present age.—I also refer them to an inestimable little treatise composed on this occasion by that accomplished lawyer and patriot, afterwards the Lord Somers—High Chancellor of Great-Britain—then a member of the convention, and chiefly instrumental in their great work—a pamphlet that should find a place in the library of every American judge at least[6]—Whoever peruses these, will discover undeniable evidence, that the British convention, considered this their declaration, as the concession of no Prince, but the Prince of Heaven—whom alone they acknowledged as the author of their liberties—they will there find that a bill of rights, is an enumeration of those conditions on which the individuals of the empire agreed to confirm the social compact; and consequently that no power, which they thus conditionally delegated to the majority (in whatever form organized) should be so exercised as to infringe and impair these their natural rights—not vested in SOCIETY, but reserved to each member thereof.

This was not the doctrine of that period alone—It was the common law and constitution of England, so asserted and maintained by the ablest lawyers of every age of the empire.—The petition of right, which came forward in the reign of Charles 1st, said to have been originally penned by the celebrated Lord Coke—although in its title a contradiction in terms, is yet in substance equally strong and clear—asserting the rights of the people to be coeval with the government—We find this principle strenuously and ably maintained through all the works of this great man, and to this doctrine he finally, with the devotion of a freeman, and the fortitude of an Englishman, sacrificed his vanity, his ambition and his avarice—This last act of an aged and venerable judge, has obliterated the errors of a youthful courtier—it has made his peace with posterity, who with gratitude and indulgence has forgiven the conduct of a court lawyer, which she might have punished with detestation, although she could not correct. 5.1.8

luminaries of the English law have been: to Lord Coke and Lord Somers, I will add that [ ] of human nature, Sir Matthew Hale, in whom were united true Christian piety, Roman fortitude, and an understanding more than human.

This perfect man although firmly opposed to the violences of the mad fanatics of the age, stood up almost alone in that parliament which restored the regal government, in favor of a bill of rights—but the tide of popular rage, hastening to place the worthless Charles on the throne of his more worthless ancestors, was too strong, and the voice of that man could not be heard, who was the delight of his own and the admiration of succeeding ages.

5.1.10 It is true, that something like the doctrine of Aristides was frequently the language of courtiers and sycophants in the feeble reigns of the arbitrary Stuarts—times of impotent and impudent usurpation—and they grounded their assertions on the form of the statute of magna charta, a statute much estemed for the many valuable rights it ascertains—the enacting words of which imply it to be an act of the King—But Aristides must know that this was the frequent form of the ancient statutes, sometime it is the King alone enacts, sometime the King with advice and consent of the great men and Barons, and sometimes the three estates—Even at this day, the King uses these words in passing laws that bear the same implication; and we see even in America acts of authority issue under the name and signature of the Governor alone, who has not a voice unless the council are divided—But as to the legal and acknowledged authority of the King at the time of enacting magna charta, there can remain but little doubt. Henry Bracton a contemporary lawyer and judge, who has left us a compleat and able treatise on the laws of England, is thus clear and express—Omnes quidem sub rege, ipse autem sub lege, all are subject to the King, but the King is subject to the law[7]—It will hardly then be imagined, that the supreme law and constitution were the grants and concessions of a Prince, who was thus in theory and practice, subject himself to ordinary acts of legislation—But all these things are so amply discussed and the authorities so accurately collected in the publication of my Lord Somers, that a reference must be much more satisfactory than a repetition.

5.1.11 If I understand Aristides, he says that it would have been considered as an arrogant usurpation of sovereign rights in the members of convention, to have affixed a bill of rights—Can he reconcile this position with another opinion in his remarks, where he maintains that in offering this constitution, they could only act as private individuals, any of whom have a right to propose a constitution to the Americans to adopt at their discretion—In this view they could only have proposed—it is certain they could not have enacted a bill of rights—Nor would there have been any usurpation in WE the people, of the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, &c. securing to ourselves and our posterity the following unalienable rights, &c. which is the stile of the new constitution—The convention have actually engrafted some of these natural rights, yet no one calls it an usurpation—nor can I believe that any of my fellow-citizens of the United States, would have discovered the least indignation, had they engrafted them all—The universal complaint has been that they have enumerated so few—But says Aristides, it would have been a work of great difficulty, if not impossible to have ascertained them—Are the fundamental rights of mankind at this day unknown? Are they so soon forgot? If they are not imprinted on our hearts, they are in several of the constitutions—Although various in form, they are certainly not contradictory in substance—It did not require the wisdom of a national convention to have reduced them into order, and such as would not have gained the suffrage of a majority, would never have been regretted by America—or, I will venture to assert, what I shall never believe, that the majority were very unworthy of the trust reposed in them—Nor yet can I believe, that the late convention were incompetent to a task that has never been undertaken in the separate States without success.

5.1.12 This constitution is to be the act of the individual members of the American empire—the highest source of terrestrial power with us—As it is a subsequent act, it not only repeals all prior acts of the same authority where it interferes with them—But being a government of the people of all the States, I do not know what right the citizens of Maryland for instance, have to expect that the citizens of Connecticut or New-Jersey, will be governed by the laws or constitution of Maryland—or what benefit a citizen of Maryland could derive from his bill of rights in a court of the United States, which can only be governed by the constitution and laws of the United States—Nor will it help the question to say, what will certainly be denied, that the future Congress may provide by law for this,—that an ordinary law of the United States can make, is an admission that it can unmake, and to submit the bills of rights of the separate States to the power of every annual national parliament, is a very uncertain tenure indeed.

5.1.13 If a citizen of Maryland can have no benefit of his own bill of rights in the confederal courts, and there is no bill of rights of the United States—how could he take advantage of a natural right founded in reason, could he plead it and produce Locke, Sydney, or Montesquieu as authority? How could he take advantage of any of the common law rights, which have heretofore been considered as the birthright of Englishmen and their descendants, could he plead them and produce the authority of the English judges in his support? Unquestionably not, for the authority of the common law arises from the express adoption by the several States in their respective constitutions, and that in various degrees and under different modifications—If admitted at all, I do not see to what extent, and if admitted, it must be admitted as unalterable by ordinary acts of legislation, which would be impossible—and it could never be of use to an individual, but in combating some national law infringing natural right.—To render this more intelligible—suppose for instance, that an officer of the United States should force the house, the asylum of a citizen, by virtue of a general warrant, I would ask, are general warrants illegal by the constitution of the United States?[8] Would a court, or even a jury, but juries are no longer to exist, punish a man who acted by express authority, upon the bare recollection of what once was law and right? I fear not, especially in those cases which may strongly interest the passions of government, and in such only have general warrants been used—Suppose a case that must and will frequently happen, for such happen almost daily in England—That an officer of the customs should break open the dwelling, and violate the sanctuary of a freeman, in search for smuggled goods—impost and revenue laws are and from necessity must be in their nature oppressive—in their execution they may and will become intolerable to a free people, no remedy has been yet found equal to the task of detering and curbing the insolence of office, but a jury—It has become an invariable maxim of English juries, to give ruinous damages whenever an officer has deviated from the rigid letter of the law, or been guilty of any unnecessary act of insolence or oppression—It is true these damages to the individual, are frequently paid by government, upon a certificate of the judge that there was probable cause of suspicion—But the same reasons that would induce an English judge to give this certificate, would probably lead an American judge, who will be judge and jury too, to spare the public purse, if not favour a brother officer.

5.1.14 I could proceed with an enumeration of familiar [similar?] instances that must and will happen, that would be as alarming as prolix; but it is not my intention to ring an alarm bell—If I know myself I would rather conciliate than divide—But says Aristides the government may establish [ ] for such cases, though not commanded; what they will do I will not presume to say; but I can readily and will hereafter prove if they do, they will violate the constitution; and even admitting their power, it would be but a slender thread to [ ] so great a stake upon.[9]

5.1.15 Here I must meet a position that has been ingeniously advanced—That all powers and rights not expressly given, [ ] consequently reserved—If this is not downright political nonsense, it is at least, untrue in theory and impossible in practice—until man is gifted with one of the most important attributes of the Deity—that of fore knowledge and [ ] it will be impossible to limit affirmatively legislative [ ]. When a people part with the legislative power to government they can no more say, you shall make such and such [ ] than they can say, such and such events shall happen—[ ] must be regulated by events—All the precaution that [ ] to human wisdom, is the exertion of a negative [ ] speaking thus in the language of a bill of rights, no [ ] shall authorize, no plea of necessity shall justify the legislature in making a law to abolish or infringe the freedom of the press, or the liberty of conscience, &c.—And even [ ] these bounds are expressly and clearly affirmed, we [ ] lament that they do not always prove an effectual safeguard against the power of government; but they are [ ] guard, and why shall we leave our citizens totally [ ]. A gentleman in the Pennsylvania convention, of [ ] reputation, said, that the form of the constitution—the organization of power, if a bill of rights—he had then a defensible, but unformed idea floating in his imagination [ ] however, expressed it inaccurately, and unfortunately [ ] on the wrong side of his own question.[10] A proper organization of power would most probably prevent a violation [ ] bill of rights and prove the best security of political [ ]. Such an organization is nothing more than a good [ ] a mint or die, that will make money in its proper form, [ ] the quantity of alloy must be regulated by law, or the people may be cheated by a debased currency—The truth is, that the rights of individuals are frequently opposed to the apparent interests of the majority—For this reason the greater the portion of political freedom in a form of government the greater the necessity of a bill of rights—often the natural rights of an individual are opposed to the presumed interests or heated passions of a large majority of [ ] democratic government; if these rights are not clearly and expressly ascertained, the individual must be lost; and for the truth of this I appeal to every man who has borne a part in the legislative councils of America. In such government the tyranny of the legislative is most to be dreaded.[11]—In monarchical governments, the feelings of the majority [ ] most frequently on the side of the individual from the [ ] jealousy inseperably attendant on those forms of government, where the tyranny of the executive prevails tyranny whether exercised in the garb of a despot, or [ ] plain coat of a quaker, is equally detestable, and should be guarded against.

If a bill of rights was that essential requisite to a [ ] constitution, 5.1.16
why was it omitted by a convention of the ablest men in America, a large majority of whom were unquestionably well disposed? This has been a natural inequity, and perhaps the true reason yet remains to be disclosed. I have been informed that the proposed constitution was carried through its several stages, in a very inoffensive form to the last, and that it did not assume its decided features until days before the convention rose—the changes then effected produced much difference of opinion—created some [ ] and their patience was too much exhausted to make the necessary correspondent alterations and additions. These [ ] may, I believe, be depended on, but the inference is [ ] offered as conjecture—if true, we may attribute the omission of a bill of rights, and many other imperfections to [ ] rather than design.

From the foregoing observations, many will conclude [ ] I am the 5.1.17 determined foe to the new constitution—I am [ ] its concealed or open enemy—Sorry I am to say [ ] cannot in its present state be its advocate or friend—]] it is as far preferable to the present existing confederation (considered as a national government) as substance is preferable to form, is a truth I have as little doubt of, as [ ] very numerous defects.—The true and only question is, whether any national government whatever, ought to be [ ] to a league or confederacy administered by a diet, or [ ] congress of diplomatic deputies—And this is a question that [ ] continue to divide the ablest and best men in America [ ] misfortune it, that experience alone will decide a [ ] which perhaps no theory is competent to solve—But that [ ] proposed confederal constitution, cannot be considered [ ] such a diplomatic assembly must appear to all men—It is a national government, and a league between independent States compounded—One of those mixtures of heterogeneous qualities that will forever produce a neutral—a caput mortuum—consequently the present Congress is already found to be, but the carcase of a government, and a rotten [ ] too.—The momentous subject has led me farther than I [ ] intended.—My remarks will discover the hurry in which they were written—Had I leisure I would censure freely [ ] in the proposed system, that must be amended, [ ] have strong doubts whether it can be administered in its present form—In doing this I should, I am persuaded, [ ] the public that Aristides has generally erred and frequently mistated in his remarks—that he has done so intentionally [ ] neither believe myself or would wish the public to believe [ ] to err is the common portion of humanity—and to be misinformed the frequent misfortune of ARISTIDES and

5.1.18 A Bill of rights is an useless, if not a dangerous thing; and a standing army, a bugbear, an hobgoblin to freighten children.—This seems to me the doctrine of Aristides,[12] and the common language abroad.—What amazing progress in political knowledge have the Americans made in the last ten years! Should they go on improving by such laudable and rapid discoveries, what may we not expect in the course of a few years to come? Nothing less, surely, than a demonstration, that liberty is a visionary phantom, fleeting forever from our embrace—never intended for the possession of mankind, and never existing but in the enthusiastic imaginations of some illustrious madmen.

5.1.19 We talk now with the utmost confidence of our own experience, and an appeal to the history of mankind, is considered as an insult on the sagacity and understanding, of THE CHOICE AND MASTER SPIRITS OF THIS AGE.—[13]

That we are the wisest people under the sun, seems to be no longer disputed, and those whose youthful vanity has been flattered, by a transient public applause, think that because they have come later into the world, they have therefore all the wisdom and experience, of those who have gone before them—This is the opinion of the Americans now.—Machiavelli informs us, that it was the firm persuasion of the Florentines, his countrymen, in his day, and Peter Kolben relates the same thing of the Hottentots when he was amongst them[14]—perhaps the greatest share of confidence is inseperably united with the greatest share of ignorance.

Notwithstanding all this, human nature has always been, and always will 5.1.20 continue the same, and so long will it be impossible to put old heads upon young shoulders.—It is as unnatural to be guided by the experience of others, as for one man to see with another's eyes. This fatal and unalterable law of nature, is founded not less on our presumption and confidence, than on a persuasion, which the young and unexperienced always feel, that there is some peculiar circumstance, that distinguishes their own particular case, from that which a father describes to a son, or an historian to posterity.—Where our vanity is not strong enough to despise, inclination will invent an excuse to avoid the lessons of experience; and where the passions do not entirely command, they are sure to blind the understanding.

Is there one branch of science, literary knowledge, or even art, pleasing 5.1.21 or useful to an individual, or society, that has received any improvement from the earliest records of time?—Homer, Theocritus, Pindar and Sophocles are yet unrivalled in poetry.—Thucydides, Polybius and Livy surpass all who have followed them in history.—Demosthenes and Cicero in eloquence.—Socrates, Plato and Plutarch in those moral lessons which form the human heart to virtue.—We penetrate into Grecian forests, and dive into the Tyber to rescue the relics of ancient architecture, painting, sculpture and statuary; and preserve them as the most precious and perfect models of art.—Although, perhaps, gunpowder was unknown, yet they contrived to slaughter men enough without it, and the invention has only put the cowardice of a dastardly slave in uniform, more on a level with the manly exertions of an undisciplined freeman.—The invention of printing, the most important of all modern discoveries, has rather multiplied books than increased knowledge; nor has the discovery of an eighth planet brought with it any remedy for the inclemencies of a cold winter.—Our acquaintance with the skies is as useless as balloons. There is nothing solid or useful that is new—And I will venture to assert, that if every political institution is not fully explained by Aristotle, and other ancient writers, yet that, there is no new discovery in this the most important of all sciences, for ten centuries back.[15]

Our politicians of an hour, of an empire of a day, boast of government by 5.1.22 representation, as a most important improvement; and whilst they discant on its excellencies they do not scruple to assert, that it was unknown to the ancients.*—Some, indeed, have confined it to the British and their descendants.

Government, by representatives, freely chosen by the body of the people, is as old as the history of mankind, and once formed the basis of every European government now existing;[17] but as it is the most liable to corruption, it has always proved of the shortest duration; it has first degenerated into aristocracy, or the government of a few wealthy individuals, and has terminated regularly by a monarchy and standing army.—The reasoning on this progress is not essential at this moment, but as to the antiquity of government by representation, example must be produced to expose an error as general as it is surprizing.

5.1.23 The first legal government of Athens, the most ancient we have any authentic history of, was by Archons elected by the body of the people, first for one and then for five years. Solon divided the legislative from the executive, as we have done, although not exactly in the same form.—This government lasted a very few years, and was destroyed by Pisistratus, assisted by a small standing force.—The examples drawn from several modern governments of Europe will be presently adduced.—

5.1.24 But before this, it is essential that we examine what is meant by monarchy and aristocracy:—Unhappily for mankind frequent and ridiculous dispute is the least inconvenience arising from the imperfection of language.—Ambiguity and uncertainty of expression admit the imposition of dangerous doctrine, and produce more misfortune than error—Because in the government, from which we separated, the monarchy and aristocracy were attended with certain hereditary names and titles, we are to be compelled to view the substance of those powers as inseperable from those forms and titles.

5.1.25 Formerly the public authority exercised by one person, whether dignified with the title of Emporer, King, Stadtholder, Doge, &c. was elective, and generally revocable—as for instance, the ancient Emperors of Rome; the Emperors of Germany; the Emperor of Russia; the Kings of Denmark and Sweden; the Stadtholder of Holland; Doge of Genoa, &c.—They were seldom entrusted with any legislative power.—These various offices and titles, have all become hereditary, and have generally swallowed up the legislative power; except the Doge, who is only the pageant of the day, decorated with the tinsel trappings of authority, but not entrusted with the most trifling portion of its substance. Three great families have established an hereditary

*Is it not strange to hear the Governor of Connecticut, gravely asserting in their Convention, the novelty of government by representation, and pinning all his hopes of our future happiness, and exemption from evil on this new discovery! And yet the Governor of Connecticut is not only one of the worthiest of our citizens, but rather of uncommon information in a country, where very few are so independent in their fortunes as to afford much time to study.[16] despotism over three-fourths of the habitable globe.—The house of HOLSTEIN, who now govern Sweden, Denmark, Norway, Russia, great part of Poland, Germany, and the greatest part of Asia, within two centuries has sprung from a gentleman of less fortune than many Americans now possess.—The house of AUSTRIA, who have usurped the imperial office of Germany, as a patrimony, and govern a great proportion of Europe, are derived, within a few centuries back, from a poor Count of Hapsburg without fortune or honor—And the mighty race of BOURBON, who possess France, Spain, the two Sicilies, two-thirds of America, and extensive dominions in Asia and Africa, sprung not long since from Hugh Capel, who, if he was not the son of a butcher (as is generally believed) was certainly of very low extraction.—There is not a kingdom in Europe, that does not contain many better families than these,—that is families, that have been longer people of property, and produced more illustrious men; but they are all involved in one common fate, reduced to a despicable slavery by these individuals, whose usurpations have been as successful as rapid, and who hold them in trembling subjection by numerous standing armies.—This is the history of MONARCHY divested of its glitter and pomp.

Where wealth is hereditary, power is hereditary, for wealth is power— 5.1.26
Titles are of very little, or no consequence—The rich are nobility, and the poor plebeans in all countries—And on this distinction alone, the true definition of aristocracy depends.—An aristocracy is that influence of power, which property may have in government; a democracy is the power or influence of the people or numbers, as contradistinguished from property. Machiavelli exposes the futility of an attempt to establish an aristocracy, upon any other principles than the solid distinction of property.[18]—In examining the principles of those aristocracies that now exist, we shall find hereditary wealth the only universally pervading principle and characteristic.

In England the aristocracy have hereditary titles, and share in the 5.1.27 legislature.—It is preserved by the power of the King to add the most wealthy and able of the commons to this order;—and if that principle, by which George Neville, Duke of Bedford, was degraded from his nobility on account of his poverty, still continued, it would be the most perfect and confirmed aristocracy in the world.—Although this aristocracy is extremely powerful, yet from the happy temperature of the government, by three well constituted estates, it has not proved oppressive; on the contrary, a firm rock, that has preserved this system from every shock of innovation.—Were the other two estates even as perfect as the aristocracy, the government might last forever.

In Scotland, the aristocracy have hereditary titles, but they are almost entirely deprived of any share in the legislature, and their power is much broken by the axe and confiscation.

In Holland, the aristocracy is composed of the wealthiest.—They hold 5.1.28 their power for life most commonly, though in some instances for a limited time;—and elections are generally, though by no means universally abolished. Their estates are hereditary, but they have no titles.—Such is the aristocracy of America, yet in its infancy, and that of the aristocratic Cantons of Switzerland,—and they are all the most odious, oppressive and abominable aristocratics in the world;—for as their power is exclusively derived from wealth, which is more frequently the reward of iniquity and oppression than merit,—iniquity and oppression will be therefore openly and without shame practised to secure that wealth, which attended by power, defends its possessor from punishment.

5.1.29 In France and Spain, the aristocracies are decorated with titles, but have no share in the legislature, yet still they are almost as powerful as the former, from their wealth;—but not so oppressive.—This wealth they hold by those fundamental laws which secure the descent of property from ancestors to heirs, on the preservation of which the King's safety, in a great measure, depends.—In fine, in all governments by representation or delegation of power, where property is secured by fixed and permanent laws, from the rage of the populace on one side, and the tyranny of a despot on the other, the aristocracy will and must rule; that is a number of the wealthiest individuals, and the heads of great families:—The perfection of all political wisdom is so to temper this aristocracy as to prevent oppression.[19]

5.1.30 Between these two powers, the aristocracy and democracy, that is the rich and poor, there is a constant warfare.—Sir William Temple observes, that all the disputes, factions and revolutions in government spring from this source,—that the rich want to keep what they have got, and the poor to take it from them;[20]—this is the favourable side of aristocracy, and is true where numbers unqualified by property have too great a weight in government.—Hence in such States, agrarian laws, and an abolition of debts, are always agitated; but this is only the infancy of government.—So long as the rich, only mean honestly to secure what they have lawfully gained, by their own or the industry of their ancestors, the contest is of short duration, and government, at an early period is so far strengthened as to secure property; but it is then, that the corruption of human nature discovers itself—the more we have, the more we want, and the possession of one object, becomes only the means of attaining another.—The aristocracy who move by system and design, and always under the colourable pretext of securing property, act as has been frequently said like the screw in mechanics, always gaining, holding fast what it gains, and never loosing; and in the event has ever proved an overmatch for the multitude, who never act but from their feelings, and are never permitted to feel until it is too late; and whose ineffectual violence, being generally attended by the outrages of despair, involves their cause in odium and horror.[21] Hence it is that unsuccessful popular insurrections have always been succeeded by a general disposition favourable to tyranny.

A great and good man has said, that an aristocracy in their progress to power is the most correct of all governments—after they have attained it, the most corrupt and abominable on earth.[22]—The honest emoluments of office, are too few to gratify the many, who must be interested in administration in order to render it effectual,—they first connive at each other,—bad laws are made,—the good are perverted and avoided,—in fine, oppression becomes general, and the multitude in a paroxism of despair generally conclude, that it is better to suffer the tyranny of one man, than one hundred.[23]

properly constituted and independent executive,—a vindex injuriarum—an avenger of public wrongs; who with the assistance of a third estate, may enforce the rigor of equal law on those who are otherwise above the fear of punishment; and who may expose to public view and inquiry, those who screen their peculations under the sanction of office:[24]—How well the new proposed federal or national government, for it is a government of individuals, not of States, has provided for this great end of all government, by uniting the executive with the aristocracy, or senate, tempting the aristocracy with every executive power that can rouse or stimulate their ambition,—and how the executive will be enabled to discharge its duty against those, without whose consent it cannot act, I leave to the sensible and discerning part of my fellow-citizens. A senate should not only be composed of men of ripe age, where the violent passions have quitted the mental field, overcome by the vigor of judgment, but its chief perfection consists in such organization, that content with more than independence and a very respectable situation, they should be cut off from the active exercise of those powers which gratify personal ambition and tend to self aggrandizement or that of their friends, relatives and dependants:—That this feature of the constitution—that this union of the senate and executive will prove fatal to the liberty and happiness of America, unless corrected, I cannot doubt;—as I shall adduce examples of the same form of government, only not quite so bad as ours, terminating in despotism and a standing army, almost as soon as established.—For once let mankind listen to the counsel of experience:—This form of government is not new, it is the same form as that established in Denmark and Sweden, previous to the late revolutions, and exactly such a form as a number of wealthy and well disposed individuals, deliberately set to work, have made, and forever will make, in every age and every clime.—These examples will shew that ruin comes from a quarter entirely unexpected—they will, I hope, entirely disperse the delusion which now misleads our judgments, when we hug ourselves in the security, that we cannot be betrayed by representatives chosen every two years;—let every man, of any property, who has been active in the late revolution, and who is tolerably apprized of the sentiments of the people at large, scrutinize his own judgment; and let him ask himself whether in even the present disposition of the lower orders of our citizens, who bear with great impatience and reluctance their present inconveniences and incumberances, and those trifling distinctions and pre-eminences, which our present disinterested forms of government afford so trifling, that offices almost go a begging,—if in the event of the proposed plan the burthens of government should be encreased, greater distinctions among citizens arise, and emoluments of office be augmented—Will not the multitude croud with joy to the standard erected by any man in whom they have the least confidence, who will promise them vengeance on those whom they will consider as the authors of all their misfortunes, and to rid them at once of the evils of complicated government and numerous officers, whom they always think they pay, only to plunder them?

5.1.32 To attempt to form a government composed simply of aristocracy and democracy—where rich and poor are jointly to govern—is long of yore represented in the fable of the league between the wolves and sheep—The sheep were soon compelled to recall the shepherd and his dogs.—

5.1.33 But let us here for a moment return to Aristides.—He asks, what European power is without a standing army? and which has lost its liberties by them?[25] Many of his remarks betray a misrecollection of the A, B, C, of politics, and some of the historical questions discover a total absence of memory.—It may be answered, that both political and civil liberty have long since ceased to exist in almost all the countries that now employ standing troops, and that their slavery has in every instance been effected and maintained by the instrumentality and invariable obedience of these living machines to their chief.—I grant that the discontent of the people under the oppressions of a complicated aristocratical government has always paved the way to the despotism of one man;—the progress is natural, troops must be raised in such circumstances to compel an unwilling obedience to the laws—these troops must not be part of the discontented—they cannot be trusted—they must not feel like them, and must therefore have separate interests—they must be paid and well paid—they must be admitted to a preference and pre-eminence over those whom they subdue—Here are new taxes and new oppressions, which cause insurrections.—A foreign enemy is expected to take advantage of the confusion; the people are not to be trusted—Your liberties (as they will then be called) must be committed to the guardianship of the standing army—a day which, as I am informed, a member in the late convention declared he wished to see[26]—The people look anxiously for the punishment of their oppressors, and they look up to that man who will gratify their revenge on the aristocracy.—All senates have been, and always will be for raising standing troops, notwithstanding they have invariably found to their destruction, that no oaths can prevent them, from following the fortunes of a favourite leader, whose orders their rigid discipline has accustomed them to obey.—

That this is not the painting of a warm imagination, the history of those governments that were far less complicated and onerous than ours must prove, will evidence—Thirteen complicated forms all under one form of government, still more complicated, seem to bid defiance to all responsibility, (the only test of good government) as it can never be discovered where the fault lies—the blame will be shifted from the States to Congress—from Congress to the States—from one State to another, and so from one shoulder to another, until investigation is tired—the burthen of double government complete throughout, when we can scarce support its expence single.—This double officering from front to rear, will prove so extremely burthensome, and above all, this double set of laws will afford so plentiful an harvest of oppression and confusion, that I do not see what right we have to expect a more fortunate fate, than those nations who had happier and fairer prospects. 5.1.34

Let us now view the catastrophes of these governments.—First of Sweden—previous to the year 1772—the States or legislature was composed of four orders—I. Nobility, who were only as we are informed the heads of the wealthiest families represented in a senate by selection—the old nobility having been almost to a man extirpated by that Nero of the North, Christian IId, who made a general massacre of the order assisted by the populace, who hunted them like bloodhounds—II. The clergy—III. The citizens chosen by the magistrates and common council of each corporation, their number about 150—IV. The farmers, chosen in each district by a majority of voices out of the landholders, their number 180.—It would seem as if theory could hardly invent a more perfect legislature.—The executive was committed to one man, dignified indeed by the title of King, a word to which we attach ideas unauthorized by its meaning—but this King however (who was elected for life) was in fact, hardly more than a president of the senate, without whose concurrence he could exercise none of the important powers belonging to the executive branch:—Although the King and every officer, civil and military, were sworn to support this constitution, yet there was but one military officer found who regarded this oath, when solicited by Gustavus to take a contrary oath to support its usurpation.—This singular man had the courage to declare, that the Prince ought to have no confidence in him, if he should by one oath violate another.—A few grenadiers with bayonets fixed, ordered to the senate-room, and a very few regiments previously prepared, effected the most sudden and unexpected revolution that ever mankind were the melancholy witnesses of.—A few days after the King published that form of government, which it was his will and pleasure the Swedes and their posterity should be governed by—The Americans ought to read it—they will find it in William's history of Northern Governments.—In the preface is this remarkable passage: "We, whose names are hereunto subscribed, Senators, States, Counts, Barons, Bishops, Knights, and Nobles, Military Officers, Citizens, and Commons, who are 5.1.35 actually here assembled, make known for us and our absent citizens and commons, that many of our citizens under the name of liberty had assumed a power and domination that was insupportable, &c. &c. &c."[27]

5.1.36 In Denmark, the revolution in 1666, presents exactly the same story over again.—The constitution was the same as in Sweden precisely, senate, representatives of the people, and an executive elected for life, clogged in the same manner by the senate.—The representatives of the people became at last so tired of the senate, that they made a formal offer of their liberties to Frederick IIId, and actually compelled the senate to give their assent.—This man whose moderation and real disinterested virtue had captivated the affections of all ranks, with the assistance of 24,000 troops, selected chiefly from foreign vagabonds, established the most despotic government, that ever mankind groaned under for them and their posterity;[28]—and no doubt with the best intentions, as from his declaration we find he believed what Mr. Pope has wrote, and what many good, but mistaken men, both in Europe and America, have thought and now think—

For forms of government let fools contest
That which is best administered, is best.—[29] and as for the good administration he thought he could very well trust that to himself and his posterity.

5.1.37 It was thus that the hardy descendants of the Goths and Vandals lost their liberties, and from the boldest and most enterprizing they have degenerated into the most miserable and depressed of mankind, the country depopulated, commerce destroyed, dirty minions, and court-favourites plundering every thing and nothing flourishing but the standing army.—For the truth of this picture I refer to William's history.

5.1.38 In Holland, at this moment, the standing troops adhering to the Stadtholder (who from the best accounts proved a traitor to his country last war) in conjunction with those bred under that grand Prince of despots, the late King of Prussia, have disarmed the Burghers, the national militia, and are now changing the form of government, under the pretext of throwing power into the hands of the States-General, but actually paving the way for the hereditary despotism of William of Nassau.

5.1.39 It is so long since the other States of Europe have lost all semblance of liberty, that it may be difficult to trace their revolutions.—In France the oppressions of the aristocracy enabled first the politic Lewis IId, and afterwards Lewis XIIIth, and Cardinal Richlieu, by the assistance of the mob and standing army, since become the standing law of France, to destroy every vestige of freedom.

5.1.40 In Spain the immense estates, which by the six fortunate marriages of the house of Austria (as they are called) became concentered in the person of Charles Vth.—The mines of the two Indies then lately discovered which became the property of his family, and above all the obstinacy of that hardy, disinterested and frugal priest, Ximenes, finished at a blow the power of the Cortes, who were chiefly composed of representatives elected by the people in the several States of Old and New Castile, Arragon, Catalonia, &c.—For Spain was at that time divided into as many States almost as we are, and perhaps more independent of each other, having separate legislatives and executives, and the general power not entrusted with the right of taxation.—However, a standing army has from that time destroyed all hopes of a revolution in favour of the rights of mankind.

It will be asked how has England preserved her liberties, with at least an apparent standing army?—I answer, she did loose them; but as there was no standing army until lately, she regained them again:—She lost them under the Tudors, who broke the then oppressive power of the aristocracy, but the unparalleled avarice of Henry VIIth, the boundless extravagance of Henry VIIIth, the short reign of Edward VIth, (which was but the sickly blaze of a dying candle) the bigotry of that weak woman Mary, who had no other object than religious persecution, and lastly the parsimony of Elizabeth, who had no children of her own to provide for, and who hated her legal successor and his family—all conspired to prevent their establishing a military standing force, sufficient to secure their usurpations; and the nation recovered from their paroxism under the Stuarts, who were too weak and too wicked to command even respect, notwithstanding their dignity.—On the revolution in 1688, the patriots of that day formed some glorious bulwarks, which seem as yet to have secured them from the evils and danger of their present standing army, though still in my opinion, they hold their remaining liberties by a very precarious tenure indeed, as the first enterprizing and popular Prince will most probably convince them. 5.1.41

Let us now examine these defences and compare them with those of the proposed constitution. 5.1.42

In England,[30] by their bill of rights, a standing army is declared to be contrary to their constitution, and a militia the only natural and safe defence of a free people—This keeps the jealousy of the nation constantly awake, and has proved the foundation of all the other checks.

In the American constitution, there is no such declaration, or check at all.

In England, the military are declared by their constitution to be in all cases subordinate to the civil power; and consequently the civil officers have always been active in supporting this pre-eminence.

In the American constitution, there is no such declaration.

In England, the mutiny bill can only be passed from year to year, or on its expiration every soldier is as free, and the equal by law of the first general officer of the land. 5.1.43

In America, the articles of war (which is the same thing) has been already considered as perpetual (as I am well informed) under even the present Congress, although the constitutions of all the States positively forbid any standing troops at all, much less laws for them.

In England, the appropriation of money for the support of their army must be from year to year; in America it may be for double the period.

How favorable is this contrast to Britain—that Britain which we lavished our blood and treasure to separate ourselves from, as a country of slavery—But we then held different sentiments from those now become so fashionable; for this I appeal to the constitutions of the several States.

5.1.44 In the declaration of rights of Massachusetts, sect. 17.—The people have a right to keep and to bear arms for the common defence. And as in time of peace, armies are dangerous to liberty, they ought not to be maintained without the consent of the legislature, and the military power shall always be held in exact subordination to the civil authority, and be governed by it.

Sect. 27. In time of peace, no soldier ought to be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner; and in time of war, such quarters ought not to be made but by the civil magistrate, in a manner ordained by the legislature.

Declaration of rights of Pennsylvania, sect. 13.—That the people have a right to bear arms for the defence of themselves and the State; and as standing armies in the time of peace, are dangerous to liberty, they ought not to be kept up: And that the military should be kept under strict subordination to, and governed by the civil power.

Declaration of rights of Maryland, sect. 25.—That a well regulated militia is the proper and natural defence of a free government.

Sect. 26. That standing armies are dangerous to liberty, and ought not to be raised or kept without consent of the legislature.

Sect. 27. That in all cases and at all times the military ought to be under strict subordination to, and controul of the civil power.

Sect. 28. That no soldier ought to be quartered in any house in time of peace, without the consent of the owner; and in time of war, in such manner only as the legislature shall direct.

Declaration of rights of Delaware, in the same words as Maryland.

Declaration of rights of North-Carolina, sect. 17.—That the people have a right to bear arms for the defence of the State; and as standing armies in time of peace are dangerous to liberty, they ought not to be kept up; and that the military should be kept under strict subordination to, and governed by the civil power.

Constitution of South-Carolina, sect. 42.—That the military be subordinate to the civil power of the State.

5.1.45 But we are told by Aristides, that our poverty is our best security against many standing troops.[31]—Are we then, and our posterity, always to be poor? This security would certainly cease with our poverty; but the truth is, our poverty instead of preventing will be the first cause of the increase of a standing army.—Our poverty will render the people less able to pay the few troops it is admitted we must keep.—This expence added to the immense public and private debts, which an efficient government seems to be requisite to enforce payment of, together with the onerous and complicated civil governments, both Continental and State, will be productive of future uneasiness and discontent.—The most sanguine among us must expect some turbulence and commotion; let the smallest appearance of commotion peep out again in any part of the Continent, and there is not a rich man in the United States, who will think himself or his property safe, until both are surrounded with standing troops. This is the only public purpose for which these men ever did, or ever will willingly contribute their money. But then, according to their laudable custom, they must have interest for their advances;—this increases the public burthens—Commotion is followed by commotion, until the spirit of the people is broken and sunk by the halter, the scaffold, and a regular standing army.—

Yet notwithstanding this I am as sensible as Aristides, that a few troops 5.1.46 will be necessary for the United States, for those very services which he says it would be oppressive to a free people constantly to execute.—The western territory, some guards, arsenals and posts whenever our finances will admit our attention to that safe and honorable defence, a navy—will require a few men in constant pay. But it is this necessity that alone causes all my apprehension. There is no public abuse that does not spring from the necessary use of power,—it is that insensible progress from the use to the abuse, that has led mankind through scenes of calamity and woe, that make us now shrink back with horror, from the history of our species. Do we not see at this moment, that even the present Congress have been compelled by necessity to embody and maintain troops in time of peace for these purposes; and yet the raising or maintaining one man is as complete a violation of the bill of rights of the several States, as the raising 100,000.—This necessary infraction of the only check that existed, has already caught all America to view the approach of a standing army, with composure and indifference, nay when a limitation of the evil is proposed, Aristides asks without hesitation—how shall we distinguish between peace and a threatened war? Shall we not be surprized, unprepared?

I must confess that from the vigor and resolution with which we began the 5.1.47 erection of these our fabrics of freedom, I was persuaded that the grave would have closed on my bones, before this question would be publicly proposed in America.—Are we then to look up to a standing army for the defence of this soil from foreign invasion? Have we forgot that a few freemen of Sparta defended their country against a million of Persian slaves? Have not an handful of free Swiss farmers, defended their country against the numerous veteran armies, which Burgandy, Austria and Bourbon have led against them? They beat them among their rocks, and then descended into the plains and beat them, and they will beat them forever on any ground, to all eternity, whilst they remain free and are defending that freedom.—Did it not cost the Spaniards more time and blood to subdue a few republican unarmed Indians, on the little island of Gran Canaria, than they expended in the destruction of the mighty empires of Mexico and Peru, defended by numerous standing armies? Did their arms meet with any resistance on this Continent, until they penetrated to the free republics of Chili?—I had rather trust the defence of a country to the savage valour of a few Shawnesse and Delawares, who live in freedom and value the blessing, than to the numerous hosts of civilized slaves that surround the thrones of Delhi, Pekin and Ispahan—But a few years have elapsed since that feather of a King, Lewis XIVth, overrun all Holland in a few days, and became master, almost without resistance, of that country which the veteran infantry of Spain, led by the most celebrated Captains, an age of chivalry produced, Alva, Alexander Farneza, and the Marquis Spinola, were forced to gain inch by inch, from a few desperate Burghers. When the French troops came, the people were universally discontented with the oppressions of the rich, as soon as they had reeked a brutal vengeance on the aristocracy, the latent courage of the nation revived, and Lewis was obliged to scamper off as fast as he came.—Let the body of the people be interested in the defence of a good government, and my countrymen need not fear being surprized by all the slaves and brutes that the despots of the old and new world can arm against them.—There will then need no distinction of a threatened war, and our establishment may at all times be limited to the purposes just mentioned.—

5.1.48 But perhaps standing troops may be wanted to suppress domestic insurrections? The people cannot be trusted to [ ] the people, is becoming a cant expression; but I fervently hope by no means a general sentiment. I am free to declare, that I never wish to see any measure of government enforced by arms, which the yeomanry of the United States will not turn out to support.

5.1.49 My countrymen! never forget this truth, which the sad experience of your fellow-mortals has witnessed with their blood!—Remember it yourselves!—Engrave it on the tender minds of your children, as the first article of their political creed—that, There is no form of government safe with a standing army, and there is none that is not safe without.—A people may frequently be so unfortunate as to loose their liberties. They may be so foolish as to give them away, as in Denmark, where not only the senators and representatives of the people, but also every man in the whole empire of the smallest note, or consequence, signed a formal surrender of their liberties on an instrument now kept in the archives of that kingdom—an everlasting monument of—how catching a thing this signing of names is; or of what is now called—a modest deference for the opinion of others. But whether they loose them, or give them away, they will soon regain them, or resume them, unless they are prevented by a standing army—And also recollect, my fellow-citizens, That what is doctrine to day, may be treason to-morrow.

There are but two modes by which men are connected in society, the one 5.1.50 which operates on individuals, this always has been, and ought still to be called, national government; the other which binds States and governments together (not corporations, for there is no considerable nation on earth, despotic, monarchical, or republican, that does not contain many subordinate corporations with various constitutions) this last has heretofore been denominated a league or confederacy.—The term fœderalists is therefore improperly applied to themselves, by the friends and supporters of the proposed constitution.—This abuse of language does not help the cause,—every degree of imposition serves only to irritate, but can never convince.—They are national men, and their opponents, or at least a great majority of them, are fœderal, in the only true and strict sense of the word.—[32]

Whether any form of national government is preferable for the Ameri- 5.1.51
cans, to a league or confederacy, is a previous question we must first make up our minds upon.—There will then remain still another—Whether, if any, is the one proposed the best, in our circumstances safe, and such a one as we should unconditionally receive? and if ever duty required deliberation before decision, it calls for it now, and in terms too strong to be resisted or evaded.—Let the light come in free from every quarter. If reason cannot satisfy, experiment will determine. But even then, is it not the duty of those to whom the happiness of so great a proportion of the human species is entrusted, to conduct that experiment with the utmost coolness and fairness, with all those precautions which the wisdom of antiquity affords, and finally qualified with those securities to our liberty, that, should it prove oppressive or impracticable, ourselves, or at least our posterity, may not be prevented, by the power or influence of a civil or military oligarchy, from adopting the alternative?

The advantages or disadvantages of national government, open too wide 5.1.52 a field of discussion for my leisure or talents.—Some few remarks I shall cursorily offer. That a national government will add to the dignity and encrease the splendour of the United States abroad, can admit of no doubt: It is essentially requisite for both. That it will render government, and officers of government, more dignified at home is equally certain. That these objects are more suited to the manners, if not genius and disposition of our people is, I fear, also true. That it is requisite in order to keep us at peace among ourselves, is doubtful. That it is necessary, to prevent foreigners from dividing us, or interfering in our government, I deny positively; and after all, I have strong doubts whether all its advantages are not more specious than solid.—We are vain, like other nations,—we wish to make a noise in the world; and feel hurt that Europeans are not so attentive to America in peace, as they were to America in war. We are also, no doubt, desirous of cutting a figure in history.—Should we not reflect, that quiet is happiness?—That content and pomp are incompatible?—I have either read or heard this truth, which Americans should never forget,—That the silence of historians is the surest record of the happiness of a people.—[33]The Swiss have been four hundred years the envy of mankind, and there is yet scarcely an history of their nation. What is history, but a disgusting and painful detail of the butcheries of conquerors, and the woeful calamities of the conquered? Many of us are proud, and are frequently disappointed that office confers neither respect or difference. No man of merit can ever be disgraced by office. A rogue in office may be feared in some governments—he will be respected in none.—After all, what we call respect and difference only arise from contrast of situation, as most of our ideas come by comparison and relation. Where the people are free there can be no great contrast, or distinction among honest citizens in or out of office.—In proportion as the people loose their freedom, every gradation of distinction, between the Governors and governed obtains, until the former become masters, and the latter become slaves. In all governments virtue will command reverence.—The divine Cato knew every Roman citizen by name, and never assumed any pre-eminence; yet Cato found, and his memory will find, respect and reverence in the bosoms of mankind, until this world returns into that nothing, from whence Omnipotence called it.—That the people are not at present disposed for, and are actually incapable of, governments of simplicity and equal rights, I can no longer doubt—But whose fault is it? We make them bad, by bad governments, and then abuse and despise them for being so. Our people are capable of being made any thing, that human nature was or is capable of, if we would only have a little patience and give them good and wholesome institutions; but I see none such and very little prospect of such.—Alas! I see nothing in my fellow-citizens, that will permit my still fostering the delusion, that they are now capable of sustaining the weight of SELF-GOVERNMENT:[34] A burthen to which Greek and Roman shoulders proved unequal.—The honor of supporting the dignity of the human character, seems reserved to the hardy Helvetians alone.—If the body of the people will not govern themselves, and govern themselves well too, the consequence is unavoidable.—A FEW will, and must govern them.—Then it is that government becomes truly a government by force only,—where men relinquish part of their natural rights to secure the rest, instead of an union of will and force, to protect all their natural rights, which ought to be the foundation of every rightful social compact.—Whether national government will be productive of internal peace, is too uncertain to admit of decided opinion.—I only hazard a conjecture when I say, that our state disputes, in a confederacy, would be disputes of levity and passion, which would subside before injury.—The people being free, government having no right to them, but they to government, they would separate and divide as interest or inclination prompted—as they do at this day, and always have done, in Switzerland—In a national government, unless cautiously and fortunately administered, and disputes will be the deep-rooted differences of interest, where part of the empire must be injured by the operation of general law; and then should the sword of government be once drawn (which Heaven avert) I fear it will not be sheathed, until we have waded through that series of desolation, which France, Spain, and the other great kingdoms of the world have suffered, in order to bring so many separate States into uniformity, of government and law; in which event the legislative power can only be entrusted to one man (as it is with them) who can have no local attachments, partial interests, or private views to gratify.[35]

That a national government will prevent the influence or danger of foreign intrigue, or secure us from invasion, is in my judgment directly the reverse of the truth:—The only foreign, or at least evil foreign influence, must be obtained through corruption.—Where the government is lodged in the body of the people, as in Switzerland, they can never be corrupted; for no prince, or people, can have resources enough to corrupt, the majority of a nation;—and if they could, the play is not worth the candle.—The facility of corruption is encreased in proportion as power tends by representation or delegation, to a concentration in the hands of a few.—The French have kept a minister in Switzerland for 300 years back to persuade them to place power in their general Assembly or Diet.—The Swiss have always proved faithful allies and friends to France,—but have laughed at her political advice—as the assembly of Foxes treated with derision the curtailed Reynard—who advised them to part with their cumbersome quantity of brush.—As to any nation attacking a number of confederated independent republics, who are always as populous as brave, it is not to be expected, more especially as the wealth of the empire is there universally diffused, and will not be collected into any one overgrown, luxurious and effeminate capital to become a lure to the enterprizing ambitious.—That extensive empire is a misfortune to be deprecated, will not now be disputed.—The balance of power has long engaged the attention of all the European world, in order to avoid the horrid evils of a general government.[36]—The same government pervading a vast extent of territory, terrifies the minds of individuals into meanness and submission.—All human authority, however organized, must have confined limits,—or insolence and oppression will prove the offspring of its grandeur,—and the difficulty or rather impossibility of escape prevents resistance.—Gibbon relates that some Roman Knights who had offended government in Rome were taken up in Asia, in a very few days after.—It was the extensive territory of the Roman republic that produced a Sylla, a Marius, a Caligula, a Nero, and an Eliagabalus.—In small independent States continguous to each other, the people run away and leave despotism, to reek its vengeance on itself; and thus it is that moderation becomes with them, the law of self-preservation.[37]—These and such reasons founded on the eternal and immutable nature of things have long caused and will continue to cause much difference of sentiment throughout our wide extensive territories—From our divided and dispersed situation, and from the natural moderation of the American character, it has hitherto proved a warfare of argument and reason.

5.1.54 Thus it was that the opposite qualities of the first confederation were rather caused by than the cause of two parties, which from its first existence began and have continued their operations, I believe, unknown to their country and almost unknown to themselves—as really but few men have the capacity or resolution, to develope the secret causes, which influence their daily conduct.—The old Congress was a national government and an union of States, both brought into one political body[;] as these opposite powers, I do not mean parties, were so exactly blended and very nearly balanced, like every artificial, operative machine where action is equal to re-action—it stood perfectly still—it would not move at all—Those who were merely confoederal in their views, were for dividing the public debt—those who were for national government, were for encreasing of it—Those who thought any national government would be destructive to the liberties of America, as I imagine, assisted those who thought it our only safety, to put every thing as wrong as possible.—Requisitions were made, which every body knew it was impossible to comply with—either in 82 or 83, ten millions of hard dollars, if not thirteen, were called into the continental treasury, when there could not be half that sum in the whole tract of territory between Nova-Scotia and Florida—The States neglected them in despair—The public honor was tarnished, and our governments abused by their servants and best friends—In fine, it became a cant word—things are not yet bad enough to mend—However, as great part of the important objects of society were entrusted to this mongrel species of general government, the sentiment of pushing it forward became general throughout America, and the late Convention met at Philadelphia under the uniform impression, that such was the desire of their constituents—But even then the advantages and disadvantages of national government operated so strongly, although silently, on each individual, that the conflict was nearly equal—A third or middle opinion, which always arises in such cases, broke off and took the lead—the national party assisted, pursued steadily their object—the foederal party dropt off, one by one, and finally, when the middle party came to view the offspring which they had given birth to, and in a great measure reared, several of them immediately disowned the child—Such has been hitherto the progress of party, or rather of the human mind dispassionately contemplating our separate and relative situation, and aiming at that perfect completion of social happiness and grandeur, which perhaps can be combined only in idea—Every description of men entertain the same wishes (excepting perhaps a few very bad men of each)—they forever will differ about the mode of accomplishment—and some must be permitted to doubt the practibility.

As our citizens are now apprized of the progress of parties or political opinions on the continent, it is fit they should also be informed of the present state, force and designs of each, in order that they may form their decisions with safety to the public and themselves—this shall be given with all the precision and impartiality the author is capable of. 5.1.55

America is at present divided into three classes or descriptions of men, and in a few years there will be but two. 5.1.56

The first class comprehends all those men of fortune and reputation who stepped forward in the late revolution, from opposition to the administration, rather than the government of Great-Britain—All those aristocrats whose pride disdains equal law—Many men of very large fortune, who entertain real or imaginary fears for the security of property—Those young men, who have sacrificed their time and their talents to public service, without any prospect of an adequate pecuniary or honorary reward—All you people of fashion and pleasure who are corrupted by the dissipation of the French, English and American armies; and a love of European manners and luxury—The public creditors of the continent, whose interest has been heretofore sacrificed by their friends, in order to retain their services on this occasion—A large majority of the mercantile people, which is at present a very unformed and consequently dangerous interest—Our old native merchants have been almost universally ruined by the receipt of their debts in paper during the war, and the payment in hard money of what they owed their British correspondents since peace—Those who are not bankrupts, have generally retired and given place to a set of young men, who conducting themselves as rashly as ignorantly, have embarrassed their affairs and lay the blame on the government, and who are really unacquainted with the true mercantile interest of the country—which is perplexed from circumstances rather temporary than permanent—The foreign merchants are generally not to be trusted with influence in our government—they are most of them birds of passage—some perhaps British emissaries encreasing and rejoicing in our political mistakes, and even those who have settled among us with an intention to fix themselves and their posterity in our soil, have brought with them more foreign prejudices, than wealth—time must elapse before the mercantile interest will be so organized as to govern themselves, much less others, with propriety: And lastly, to this class I suppose we may ultimately add the tory interest with the exception of very many respectable characters, who reflect with a gratification mixed with disdain, that those principles are now become fashionable for which they have been persecuted and hunted down—which, although by no means so formidable as is generally imagined, is still considerable—They are at present wavering—they are generally, though with very many exceptions, openly for the proposed, but secretly against any American government—A burnt child dreads the fire—but should they see any fair prospect of confusion arise, these gentry will be off at any moment for these five and twenty years to come—Ultimately should the administration promise stability to the new government, they may be counted on as the Janizaries of power, ready to efface all suspicion by the violence of their zeal—In general, all these various people would prefer a government, as nearly copied after that of Great-Britain, as our circumstances will permit—some would strain these circumstances—others still retain a deep rooted jealousy of the executive branch and strong republican prejudices as they are called—finally, this class contains more aggregate wisdom and moral virtue than both the other two together—it commands nearly two-thirds of the property and almost one half the numbers of America, and has at present, become almost irresistible from the name of the truly great and amiable man who it has been said, is disposed to patronize it, and from the influence which it has over the second class—This class is nearly at the height of their power, they must decline or moderate, or another revolution will ensue, for the opinion of America is becoming daily more unfavorable to those radical changes which high-toned government requires:—A conflict would terminate in the destruction of this class, or the liberties of their country—May the Guardian Angel of America prevent both!

5.1.57 The second class is composed of those descriptions of men who are certainly more numerous with us than in any other part of the globe—First, those men who are so wise as to discover that their ancestors and indeed all the rest of mankind were and are fools. We have a vast over proportion of these great men, who, when you tell them that from the earliest period at which mankind devoted their attention to social happiness, it has been their uniform judgment, that a government over governments cannot exist—that is two governments operating on the same individual—assume the smile of confidence and tell you of two people travelling the same road—of a perfect and precise division of the duties of the individual: Still however, the political apothegm is as old as the proverb—That no man can serve two masters, and whoever will run their noddles against old proverbs will be sure to break them, however hard they may be, and if they broke only their own, all would be right; but it is very horrible to reflect that all our numskulls must be cracked in concert.—Second—The trimmers who from sympathetic indecision are always united with, and when not regularly employed, always fight under the banners of these great men. These people are forever at market and when parties are nearly equally divided, they get very well paid for their services. Thirdly—The indolent, that is almost every second man of independent fortune you meet with in America—these are quite easy, and can live under any government. If men can be said to live, who scarcely breathe, and if breathing was attended with any bodily exertion, would give up their small portion of life in despair. These men do not swim with the stream as the trimmers do, but are dragged like mud at the bottom. As they have no other weight than their fat flesh, they are hardly worth mentioning when we speak of the sentiments and opinions of America. As this second class never can include any of the yeomanry of the union, who never affect superior wisdom, and can have no interest but the public good, it can be only said to exist at the birth of government, and as soon as the first and third classes become more decided in their views, this will divide with each and dissipate like a mist, or sink down into what are called moderate men, and become the tools and instruments of others. These people are prevented by a cloud from having any view; and if they are not virtuous, they at least preserve the appearance which in this world amounts to the same thing.

At the head of the third class appear the old rigid republicans, who 5.1.58
although few in number, are still formidable—Reverence will follow these men in spite of detraction, as long as wisdom and virtue are esteemed among mankind—they are joined by the true democrats, who are in general fanatics and enthusiasts, and some few sensible, charming madmen—a decided majority of the yeomanry of America will, for a length of years, be ready to support these two descriptions of men; but as this last class is forced to act as a residuary legatee, and receive all the trash and filth—it is in some measure disgraced and its influence weakened, by 3dly, the free-booters[38] and plunderers, who infest all countries and ours perhaps as little as any other whatever—these men have that natural antipathy to any kind or sort of government, that a rogue has to a halter. In number they are few indeed—such characters are the offspring of dissipation and want, and there is not that country in the world where so much real property is shared so equally among so few citizens, or where property is as easily acquired by fair means, very few indeed will resort to foul. Lastly, by the poor mob, infoelix pecus! the property of whoever will feed them and take care of them—let them be spared—let the burthen of taxation sit lightly on their shoulders, but alas! this is not their fate—it is here that government forever falls with all its weight—it is here that the proposed government will press where it should scarcely be felt.—

Oves bis mulget in hora, et succus pecori et lac subducitur agnis.[39]

If ever a direct tax is laid by the general government, it must, if not from 5.1.59

necessity, at least from propriety, be laid on polls—it is the only one I believe to be practicable—there ought then to be some security that they avoid direct taxation where not absolutely indispensible, and some better security than the opinion of Aristides.

5.1.60 In this class may be counted men of the greatest mental powers and of as sublime virtue as any in America—they at present command nearly one-third of the property and above half the numbers of the United States, and in either event [, adoption of the Constitution or not,] they must continue to encrease in influence by great desertions from both the other classes[:]—If the government is adopted, [they will increase] by the numerous, discontented and disappointed, and from that natural jealousy, which Englishmen and their descendants always will retain, of their government and Governors. If the government is not adopted theirs will be the prevalent opinion. The object of this class either is or will be purely fœderal—an union of independent States, not a government of individuals: And should the proposed fœderal plan fail, from the obstinancy of those who will listen to no conditional amendments, although such as they cannot disapprove; or should it ultimately in its execution upon a fair trial, disappoint the wishes and expectations of our country: An union purely fœderal is what the reasonable and dispationate patriots of America must bend their views to. My countrymen, preserve your jealousy—reject suspicion, it is the fiend that destroys public and private happiness. I know some weak, but very few if any wicked men in public confidence; and learn this most difficult and necessary lesson:—That on the preservation of parties, public liberty depends. Whenever men are unanimous on great public questions, whenever there is but one party, freedom ceases and despotism commences. The object of a free and wise people should be so to balance parties, that from the weakness of all you may be governed by the moderation of the combined judgments of the whole, not tyranized ever by the blind passions of a few individuals.[40]

A Farmer.

21 March 1788

5.1.61 I have said that the boasted birthright of Englishmen and their posterity—the trial by jury in civil cases, is destroyed under the proposed fœderal constitution; that the hope of its re-establishment by the future Congress is at best doubtful; that its tenure, depending on the fluctuating breath of annual or biennial sessions, is uncertain; and finally, I denied the power of reviving it by a Congressional law at all, as it would be a violation of the constitution:[41]—It may be expected that in a cause like this, assertion and proof should go, hand in hand.

5.1.62 It has ever been contended, at least on one side, that the proposed Congress are to exercise no power not expressly vested in them by the fœderal plan. This is the position of Aristides, and of all the friends of the system.—It is now asked, is the power of establishing juries in civil cases by Congress, given in that constitution? It must be answered NO, not at least in express words.—Is it then given by implication? If so great an authority can be taken from the judges, the judiciary, an independent branch of government, by the legislature, and vested in a distinct branch, a jury, I do not see in what judiciary independence consists.—Can these judical powers, vested in the judges, by the constitution, which gives them the cognizance of certain causes, be divested by an implied legislative power? If we imply this power, may we not imply any other? And does not the doctrine of implication totally defeat the fundamental position of Aristides, and the friends of the new government? But moreover does not Aristides, and every lawyer, know that in the interpretation of all political as well as civil laws, this fundamental maxim must be observed, That where there are two objects in contemplation of any legislature, the express adoption of one, is the total exclusion of the other; and that the adoption of juries in criminal cases, in every legal interpretation, amounts to an absolute rejection in civil cases:—If the right of establishing juries, by a Congressional law is admitted at all, it must be admitted, as an inherent legislative right, paramount to the constitution, as it is not derived from it, and then the power that can make, can by law unmake; so that referring this power to a source of authority superior to the act of government, would leave us without any juries at all (even in criminal cases) if Congress should so please; which position can never be the object of either friends or enemies to the system at present.—If it is defective, it is still bad policy to make it worse; but still in every view, we must reflect, that the establishment of trials by jury, belongs to political, not to civil legislation. It includes the right of organizing government, not of regulating the conduct of individuals, as the following enquiry will prove; we must never give an assembly the power of giving itself power.

5.1.63 As the worth and excellence of this mode of trial, preserved and handed down from generation to generation for near two thousand years, has drawn down the enthusiastic encomiums of the most enlightened lawyers and statesmen of every age; as it has taken deep root in the breast of every freeman, encompassed by the defences of affection and veneration, a repetition of its praises would be as tedious as useless: Some remarks however, still remain to be made, which will place this subject in a more important and conspicuous view.

5.1.64 The trial by jury, is the only remaining power which the Commons of England have retained in their own hands, of all that plentitude of authority and freedom, which rendered their northern progenitors irresistible in war, and flourishing in peace.—The usurpations of the few, gradually effected by artifice and force, have robbed the many, of that power which once formed the basis of those governments, so celebrated by mankind.—The government of Sparta, the form of which, it is said, has continued from the days of Lycurgus to our age, preserving its model amidst those overwhelming tides of revolution and shipwrecks of governments, which Greece has sustained for near three thousand years; the same form of government among the Saxons and other Germans, consisting of King, Lords and Commons, applauded by Tacitus and Machiavelli, were thus distinguished from the present government of England—The power of the Commons resided with them, not in representatives but in the body of the people.—De minoribus rebus, principes consultant; de majoribus omnes, are either the words of Tacitus or Caesar.[42] The administration of ordinary affairs was committed to the select men; but all important subjects were deliberated on by the whole body of the people.—Such was the constitution of Sparta, and of England, when Machiavelli gives them as a model, for there can be no doubt but that the folk-motes of the Saxons were not formed by representation—The venerable remembrance of which assemblies, hung long about the affections of Englishmen, and it was to restore them that they offered such frequent libations of their noblest blood; but the usurpations of the few have been unwearied and irresistible, and the trial by jury is all that now remains to the many.

5.1.65 The trial by jury is—the democratic branch of the judiciary power—more necessary than representatives in the legislature; for those usurpations, which silently undermine the spirit of liberty, under the sanction of law, are more dangerous than direct and open legislative attacks; in the one case the treason is never discovered until liberty, and with it the power of defence is lost; the other is an open summons to arms, and then if the people will not defend their rights, they do not deserve to enjoy them.

5.1.66 The judiciary power, has generally been considered as a branch of the executive, because these two powers, have been so frequently united;—but where united, there is no liberty.—In every free State, the judiciary is kept separate, independent, and considered as an intermediate power;—and it certainly partakes more of a legislative, than an executive nature—The sound definition which Delolme applied to one branch may be justly extended to the whole judiciary,—That it is a subordinate legislation in most instances, supplying by analogy, and precedent in each particular case, the defects of general legislative acts,[43]—[W]ithout then the check of the democratic branch—the jury, to ascertain those facts, to which the judge is to apply the law, and even in many cases to determine the cause by a general verdict—the latitude of judicial power, combined with the various and uncertain nature of evidence, will render it impossible to convict a judge of corruption, and ascertain his guilt.—Remove the fear of punishment, give hopes of impunity, and vice and tyranny come scowling from their dark abodes in the human heart.—Destroy juries and every thing is prostrated to judges, who may easily disguise law, by suppressing and varying fact:—Whenever therefore the trial by juries has been abolished, the liberties of the people were soon lost—The judiciary power is immediately absorbed, or placed under the direction of the executive, as example teaches in most of the States of Europe.—So formidable an engine of power, defended only by the gown and the robe, is soon seized and engrossed by the power that weilds the sword.—Thus we find the judiciary and executive branches united, or the former totally dependent on the latter in most of the governments in the world.—It is true, where the judges will put on the sword and weild it with success, they will subject both princes and legislature to their despotism, as was the case in the memorable usurpation of the Justizia of Arragon, where the judiciary erected themselves into a frightful tyranny.

Why then shall we risque this important check to judiciary usurpation, 5.1.67 provided by the wisdom of antiquity? Why shall we rob the Commons of the only remaining power they have been able to preserve, for their personal exercise? Have they ever abused it?—I know it has and will be said—they have—that they are too ignorant—that they cannot distinguish between right and wrong—that decisions on property are submitted to chance; and that the last word, commonly determines the cause:—There is some truth in these allegations—but whence comes it—The Commons are much degraded in the powers of the mind:—They were deprived of the use of understanding, when they were robbed of the power of employing it.—Men no longer cultivate, what is no longer useful,—should every opportunity be taken away, of exercising their reason, you will reduce them to that state of mental baseness, in which they appear in nine-tenths of this globe—distinguished from brutes, only by form and the articulation of sound—Give them power and they will find understanding to use it—But taking juries with all their real and attributed defects, is it not better to submit a cause to an impartial tribunal, who would at least, as soon do you right as wrong—than for every man to become subservient to government and those in power?—Would any man oppose government, where his property would be wholly at the mercy and decision of those that govern?—We know the influence that property has over the minds of men—they will risque their lives rather than their property; and a government, where there is no trial by jury, has an unlimited command over every man who has any thing to loose.—It is by the attacks on private property through the judiciary, that despotism becomes as irresistible as terrible. I could relate numerous examples of the greatest and best men in all countries, who have been driven to despair, by vexatious lawsuits, commenced at the instigation of the court, of favorites and of minions, and all from the loss of juries.—France was reduced to the brink of destruction in one instance.—The Queen mother Louise of Savoy, piqued at the constable of Bourbon, a young and amiable man, who refused to marry her, commenced a suit against him for all his estate—The judges were ready at the beck of the court, and without a shadow of justice deprived him by law of every shilling he was worth; and drove from this country an unfortunate hero, whose mad revenge carried desolation into her bosom.—In Denmark a despicable minion, who came in rags to the court, after the establishment of their new government, which they solicited Frederick the IIId to make for them, acquired an immense fortune by plunder, sheltered by the favour of the Sovereign. At last he fixed his eyes on a most delightful estate, and offered to buy it—The owner did not want money, and could not think of selling the patrimony of an ancient family; this wretch then spirited up law-suits against him, and after the most cruel vexations obliged him to sell the estate for much less than he at first offered him. This unfortunate gentleman was driven from the country which gave him birth, and a once happy society of relations and friends.—Such would have been the fate of England, from those courts without juries, which took cognizance of causes arising in the revenues and imports in Charles the first's time, the court fortunately for the liberties of England, seized the bull by the horns, when they attacked that wonderful man John Hampden. He spent 20,000 l. rather than pay an illegal tax of twenty shillings, brought the cause before the Parliament, roused the spirit of the nation, and finally overturned courts, King, and even the constitution for many years. These dreadful examples may teach us the importance of juries in civil cases—they may recal to my countrymen a maxim which their ancestors, as wise, and more virtuous than their posterity, held ever in view—That if the people creep like tortoises, they will still find themselves too fast in giving away power.

5.1.68 I have been long since firmly persuaded, that there are no hidden sources of moral agency beyond the reach of investigation.—The all-wise and all-bountiful Author of Nature, could never have created human reason unequal to the happy regulation of human conduct.—The errors and misfortunes of mankind spring from obvious sources. Religious and political prejudices, formed by education, strengthened by habit, maintained by interest, and consecrated by fear, are forever arming the passions against the judgment.—The celebrated Blaise Pascal (the powers of whose understanding were rather miraculous than surprizing) closed his painful researches after religious truth, with this dogma, as pernicious as untrue,—"That a religion purely spiritual, was never intended for mankind."[44] There could be no judgment more unbiassed, for there was no mind so strong, no heart more pure; but bred in the bosom of the church, even her idolatry impressed him with veneration and awe. Notwithstanding his conclusion, the doctrines of Calvin maintain their ground in their primitive simplicity, divested of the aid of ceremony and form. The thunders of the Vatican, which for ages deluged Europe with blood, have dissipated their force, and reason has resumed her spiritual empire. Would to God, that the history of temporal despotism had terminated as favourably for the happiness of mankind!—In the political world, the chains of civil power, upheld by the numerous links of private interest, have proved more equal and permanent in their effects; they have, and I fear forever must, shackle the human understanding; and it is much to be questioned whether the full and free political opinion of any one great luminary of science, has been fairly disclosed to the world—Even when the great and amiable Montesquieu had hazarded a panegyric on the English constitution, he shrinks back with terror into this degrading apostrophe—"Think not that I mean to undervalue other governments—I who think an excess of liberty[,] an excess of all things, even of reason itself, a misfortune, and that the happiness of mankind is only to be found in a medium between two extremes."[45]—The author of the Persian letters, at that moment recollected the afflicting presure he had felt from the hand of Gallic government, and his pen trembled as he wrote.

Is it then possible that governments of simplicity and equal right, can have 5.1.69 been fairly dealt by in theory or practice? The votaries of tyranny and usurpation stand not alone—in bitter opposition; every man of enterprize, of superior talents and fortune, is interested to debase them; their banners have ever been deserted because they never can pay their troops.—The most amiable and sensible of mankind seem to have made a stand in favour of a mixed government founded on the permanent orders and objects of men.—Thither I suspect the American government is now tending. If it must be so—Let it go gently then—with slow and equal steps.—Let each gradation and experiment have a full and fair trial—Let there be no effect without a good, apparent and well considered cause—Let us live all the days of our lives, and as happily as circumstances will permit.—Finally, let moderation be our guide and the influence of manners will conduct us (I hope without injury) to some permanent, fixed establishment, where we may repose a while, unagitated by alteration or revolution—For in sudden and violent changes, how many of the most worthy of our fellow-citizens must get their bones crushed?

I cannot think that any able and virtuous citizen, would in his cool and 5.1.70
dispationate moments, wish to blend or risque the fundamental rights of men, with any organization of society that the Americans can or will make for fifty years to come.—Let us keep these rights of individuals—these unalienable blessings[—]reserved and separated from every constitution and form—If they are unmingled, the attentive eyes of every citizen will be kept fixed upon them. We shall watch them as a sacred deposit, and we may carry them uninjured and unimpaired through every vicissitude and change, from the government we have left, into some other that may be established on the fixed and solid principles of reason.— Nor can there be, I imagine, any prudent man, who would trust the whimsical inventions of the day, with that dangerous weapon a standing army, in our present unsettled circumstances—striving to substantiate inefficient and unnatural forms—it would wield us into despotism in a moment, and we have surely had throat-cutting enough in our day.

5.1.71 Throughout the world government by representation, seems only to have been established to disgrace itself and be abolished—its very principle is change, and it sets all system at defiance—it perishes by speedy corruption.—The few representatives can always corrupt themselves by legislative speculations, from the pockets of their numerous constituents—quick rotation, like a succession of terms tenants on a farm, only encreases the evil by rendering them more rapacious. If the executive is changeable, he can never oppose large decided majorities of influential individuals—or enforce on those powerful men, who may render his next election [ ] the rigor of equal law, which is the grand and only object of human society.—If the executive is to be rendered ineligible for a certain period, he will either not do his duty, or he will retire into the unprotected situation of a private individual, with all the sworn animosities of a powerful majority—aristocracy—junto—the cry of the populace, or perhaps the whole combined to pursue him to the grave, or a public execution.[46] The considerate and good, who adorn private life, and such only can be safely trusted in high public station, will never commit themselves to a situation where a consciencious discharge of duty may embitter the evening of life, if not draw down ruin and infamy on themselves and families.—There never was but one man who stepped from the top to the bottom, without breaking his neck, and that was Sylla; and although it is true that whilst he was up, he broke the hearts of the Romans, yet his dying undisturbed in private life, is one of those miracles that must remain forever unexplained. If the aristocracy, or representation of wealth, (the principle of wh[i]ch order is to keep all things as they are, for by confusion they may lose more than they can gain) is also changeable, there then is nothing fixed and permanent in government.—Legislative tyranny commences, and exhibits a perpetual scene of plunder and confusion, fearlessly practised under the sanction of authority and law. It is true that the influence of manners may and will resist for a time; yet that must give way to a general and prevalent corruption—Those who are respectable at home and have permanent [ ] in life, and such only can give stability to government, will not suffer themselves to be mounted up on the wheel of fortune, to be let down again as it turns, the mockery of children and fools.—Where representation has been admitted as a component part of government, it has always proved defective, if not destructive. What then must be the consequence where the whole government is founded on representation? Every American can now answer, it will be at best but—representation of government—with us the influence of manners has been great—it is indeed declining fast; but aided by the solidity of the judiciary establishments, and the wisest code of civil laws, that ever mankind were blessed with, it has hitherto supported the forms of society: But the people are now weary of their representatives and their governments.—We may trace the progress.—One candidate, to recommend his pretensions, discloses and descants on the errors of the preceding administration—The people believe him and are deceived—they change men; but measures are still the same, or injured by the sudden and violent alteration of system[47]—At least the next candidate asserts it is so—is again believed, and his constituents again deceived; a general disgust and sullen silence ensue; elections are deserted; government is first despised, and then cordially hated.

There can be no fixed and permanent government that does not rest on the fixed and permanent orders and objects of mankind.[48]—Government on paper may amuse, but we pay dear for the amusement, the only fixed and permanent order with us at present are the YEOMANRY, and they have no power whatever,—unless the right of changing masters at a certain period, and devolving on their changeable representatives their whole political existence—may be called power—The order of GENTRY, with us, is not a fixed and permanent order at all, and if they attempt to erect themselves into one at present, it is usurpation, and they will be pulled down; and yet, in my opinion, such an order is essential to a perfect government, founded on representation.—Every other mode of introducing wealth into power, has proved vicious and abominable.—With us delegates become by selection, themselves a species of subaltern aristocracy—they intrigue with the senates, who by a refined mode of election are a misbegotten, side blow, representation of wealth, and they both form an imperfect aristocracy, on the worst principles on which that order can be admitted into government—and the democratic influence which is thus amalgomated and not divided, but unformed becomes vicious from its impotence. 5.1.72

These defects spring from our attempting to erect republican fabrics on the ruined and imperfect pillars of an old corrupt monarchy—not less absurd, than to expect the limbs to perform the functions of life, after cutting off the head.—The opposition which brought Charles the first to the block, was composed of some of the ablest and most virtuous characters that ever adorned any age or clime—Hampden, Pym, Selden, Sir Harry Vane, Sydney, Marvell and many others.—They pursued their old model—attempted to form a government by representation which was at first steadied and restrained by the best senate in the world, (the English House of Lords)—the two houses soon disagreed, and there being no third power to interpose, the representatives, voted the House of Lords useless—new modelled the 5.1.73 government into a single branch, and then began to plunder most unmercifully—At last Cromwell kicked them all out of doors, and after his tyrannical usurpation and death, the nation were very happy to take shelter again under the regal government, and even restored an unworthy family (which they had irritated beyond forgiveness) to the throne.

5.1.74 After every consideration I can give this subject, I am satisfied, that government founded on representation, indispensibly requires, at least an executive for life, whose person must be sacred from impeachment, and only his ostensible ministers responsible—A senate for life, the vacancies to be filled up and the number occasionally encreased but under a limitation, by the executive—the hand that holds the balance must have the power of adding weight and influence to the lightest scale, and of frequently removing turbulent men into an higher and inoffensive situation:—I am inclined to think that an important portion of American opinion leans that way at this moment—My fear is, that our general government may ultimate in an hereditary authority—if not despotism—to avoid the former, great attention should be paid to the important office of Vice-President—at present but little understood:—A Vice-President to succeed on a vacancy prevents those evils which have ruined Poland and all the northern kingdoms—thus we see the King of the Romans has secured Germany from every evil of elective monarchy, and had the golden bull prevented one of the family or kindred of the reigning Emperor from filling the office of the King of the Romans, this part of the Germanic constitution would have been perfect, and the house of Austria would never have been enabled to usurp the imperial crown as a patrimony and desolate Europe with her ambitious views; she would have continued in that beggarly condition from which Rodolph of Hapsburg raised it—The American constitution is much better guarded but not by any means completely so.

5.1.75 If this is the best we can hope for—if this is the best reward we can expect for the sons of America slain, and the distresses we shall long continue to feel—is it not incumbent on us to examine minutely all its consequences?—Let us view government by representation in its favorite form—The constitution of England—its uncommon success and length of duration there, has drawn on it very unmerited encomiums from the enlightened Genevan[,] Delolme—the only great political writer who does not seem to hold representation in contempt,[49]—indeed the viewing it through this favorable medium has always animated our hopes, and led many sensible Americans to imagine, this old and universal experiment, to be peculiar to that isle—In pursuing my inquiry into the principles and effects of the British government, I shall first grant that it is a rational system, founded on solid, safe principles—and one of the best governments for the higher ranks of mankind in the world—but then I must insist that it was hardly a government at all, until it became simplified by the introduction and regular formation of the effective administration of responsible ministers, on its present system—which we cannot date higher up, than the appointment of Lord Strafford and others by Charles 1st.*—Moreover I do not know how far the system of bribery introduced by Sir Robert Walpole, and the influence of the numerous body of public creditors, are not now absolutely necessary to its present stability—and after all, I am not satisfied how such a simplification as would produce a responsibility, can be effected in a government, complicated by so many subordinate and powerful corporations as the American States will be—and yet responsibility must be attained and an easy and certain mode adopted, of changing measures and men without commotion, or liberty will be lost in the attempt—I am confused and bewildered when I arrive at this point of reflection, and despotism meets me at every turn.—There are but two modes of governing mankind, by just and equal law, enforced impartially on all ranks of society, or by the sword:—If such laws cannot be obtained, or the attainment is attended with too much difficulty, the sword will supply their place; et inter arma leges silent. When arms command the laws are disobeyed. Shall we have patience, with the disorders of our complicated machine? As Alexander dissolved the gordian knot with the sword—so I fear a standing army will simplify the governments of America—I have said that the government of England afforded firm protection of property—it certainly does so, comparatively speaking—yet the history of its frequent revolutions, will discover that even property is insecure there. During the civil wars, in which the Stuarts involved this nation, two-thirds of the property of the kingdom changed masters; and in those between Lancaster and York, and before the firm establishment of the line of Tuder, almost all the old families perished and their property became dissipated:—And yet its protection of property is its favorable side; turn your eyes to the lower order of citizens, and they are pressed into the earth by taxation and imposition—very rarely will industry enable the husbandman to rear a family—where the sons of agriculture are so poorly rewarded, government must be ulcerated to the heart—the miserable poor who pursue the dictates of nature and religion, in that connection which is destined to sweeten the bitter draught of life, are commonly handed from constable to constable, until their unfortunate birth compels some parish to own them.—The people of England have always and forever will emigrate—The people of England never repair to arms to repel foreign invasion—and they never will unless compelled—to conquer England, it would only seem necessary from past example, to escape their floating defences and land on the island; passing by former invasions and conquests. As late as the year 1745, Prince Charles Edward, at the head of an undisciplined rabble, belonging to some Highland clans attached to his family, marched undisturbed, through the most populous counties into the heart of the kingdom, and the capital containing 200,000 fighting men trembled for its safety at the approach of an unexperienced boy, followed by 4 or 5000 half armed peasants—scarcely a man in the kingdom shouldered a musquet until the danger disappeared, and government owed its safety to the protection of foreign mercenaries, or rather the weakness and irresolution of the assailant—The fact is, the people will never fight (if they can help it) for representatives, taxes and rags.

5.1.76 Let us now contrast this scene with one, where the people personally exercise the powers of government[50]—The three small democratic Cantons of Uri, Schuitz and Underwald, broke the chains of their former servitude, and laid the foundation of the Swiss confederacy—they effected the revolution, and in conjunction with the other democratic Cantons and their democratic allies the Grisons, have supported the grand fabric of Helvetic liberty to this day. Every Swiss farmer is by birth a legislator, and he becomes a voluntary soldier to defend his power and his property; their fathers have been so before them for near 500 years, without revolution, and almost without commotion—they have been the secure spectators of the constant and universal destruction of the human species, which the usurpations of the few have ever created, and must I fear forever perpetuate:—Whilst all Europe were butchering each other for the love of God, and defending the usurpations of the clergy, under the masque of religion, the malignant evil crept into this sacred asylum of liberty; (but where the government resides in the body of the people, they can never be corrupted by the artifice or the wealth of the few) they soon banished the daemon of discord, and Protestant and Papist sat down under the peaceful shade of the same tree, whilst in every surrounding State and kingdom, the son was dragging the father, and brothers, their brothers, to the scaffold, under the sanction of those distinctions:—Thus these happy Helvetians have in peace and security beheld all the rest of Europe become a common slaughterhouse.—A free Swiss acquires from his infancy, a knowledge of the fundamental laws of his country, and the leading principles of their national policy are handed down by tradition from father to son—the first of these is never to trust power to representatives, or a national government. A free Swiss pays no taxes, on the contrary he receives taxes; every male of 16 years, shares near ten shillings sterling annually, which the rich and powerful surrounding monarchies pay for the friendship of these manly farmers. Whenever their societies become too large, as government belongs to the citizens and the citizens are the property of no government, they divide amicably, and each separate part pursues the simple form, recommended by their ancestors and become venerable, by the glorious and happy experience of ages of prosperity—Their frugal establishments are chiefly supported by the pay which the officers of government receive for the services they render individuals. With a country the most unfriendly to industry in the world, they have become in a series of years, passed in uninterrupted but moderate labor, frugality, peace and happiness, the richest nation under the sun. I have seen a computation, by which it appeared, that the interest of the money they have before hand, and that which is due them from the rich nations of Europe, would support themselves and their posterity forever, without farther exertion; and this whilst every other government is actually as much or more in debt than it is worth.

An intelligent author has remarked, that passing from a democratic to an aristocratic Canton of Swisserland, you quit the society of men to contemplate the regular labor of brutes;[51] they are compelled indeed in the aristocratic Cantons to be extremely moderate in their government, and to lay few or no taxes, or they would drive their subjects into the neighboring free States—as it is, they are well cloathed, well fed and taken good care of—The same author remarks, that the line which separates all Swisserland, from the countries around (where men like cattle are the property of their proud Lords and kept chained to the soil) is the line of division between light and darkness—between happiness and horror. 5.1.77

The love of the Switzers for their country is altogether romantic and surpasses the bounds of credibility—those memorable relations authenticated by the common consent of all historians, of their beating on all occasions the flower of the Austrian and French troops (who have invaded them) with numbers so unequal and trifling as scarce to exceed their enemies out-guards; the instances of hundreds of citizens devoting their lives for the safety of their country; of their frequently disdaining life and refusing quarter when overpowered by numbers, have astonished and terrified the neighbouring powers, and seem incomprehensible to a people dispirited by taxes, overloaded with debts and disgusted with government. I cannot omit a striking characteristic, authenticated by Coxe and others, whose authority will not be questioned; they relate that there is a rustic tune familiar in the mountains of Swisserland—it is called the Rantz des vacques—it consists of a few simple notes of native wild melody. The French and Dutch governments have been compelled to forbid under very severe penalties, the playing this woodland music, to those Swiss troops, which they hire for a limited time; the well-known notes revive instantly all the fond images, which were impressed on their youthful bosoms, their friends, their parents, their relations and their beloved country, rush into their imaginations in a full tide 5.1.78 of affection—no persuasion can detain them, they desert home in regiments, or if retained by force, they pine away in the deepest melancholy—no instance has yet occurred of Swiss troops serving in any part of Europe, who have not returned, with the diligence and anxiety of affectionate children, on the first appearance of danger to their parent country:[52]—The same amor-patriae, the same divine love of their country, universally pervades the bosom of every citizen, who in right of his birth, legislates for himself:—Grosley relates that he saw in Rome a poor fellow (who had travelled through great part of Europe and Asia afoot) declaiming to a crowd with the most passionate zeal, in praise of his own country, boasting of her happiness and prefering San Marino to all the world besides[53]—This democratic republic, is a little bee-hive of free citizens, who have made a delicious garden of the top of a bleak barren mountain, situated in the midst of the finest and most fruitful plains of Italy, which tyranny has depopulated around them.—Look into the human breast—We love that power, which we exercise ourselves, but we detest that which others exercise over us, be they Representatives, Lords, or Kings; and to this source we may trace the abuse, which the Americans bestow on their country and their governments.

5.1.79 But we are told that Swisserland, should be no example for us—I am very sorry for it—they are the only, the only part of the human species that sustain the dignity of character, belonging to the divine resemblance we bear,—they are few in number it is said—This is not true—they are more numerous than we are—They cover a small spot of territory—this is also not true—they possess a large tract of country in the very heart of Europe—but this is not all—The Helvetic confederacy, including the three leagues of the Grisons comprehends one hundred perhaps two hundred, independent governments and States—nor is there any reason from their history or present state to doubt, that the same plan of confederation might not be extended with as lasting and happy effects to one thousand independent governments—But it is also said they are a poor, frugal people—As to their poverty that is likewise untrue—they have great sums of money before hand and owe not a six-pence—they indeed are a wise and consequently a frugal people—though they still have great estates and even luxury among them too—But should we despise their poverty or their frugality? We who are so many millions worse than nothing? But still we are told we must not take example from them—we must take example from Holland and Germany—They had better at once tell us, that we must desert the worship of God and follow that of the devil.

5.1.80 From the first dawn of light, that broke in upon my reason, I became devoted to governments of simplicity and equal right—The names of heroes, whose blood has bedewed the altars of freedom, vibrate like the shock of electricity, on my frame; and when I read the story of Brutus and of Cassius, the most noble and the last of the Romans, tears of admiration gush from my eyes.—Under these impressions which only the grave can erase, I feel unspeakable horror at every step, which removes power and rights, at a greater distance from the body of the people, to whom they belong, and confines them to the hands of the few. I have proposed to myself this question: If representatives cannot govern the people—If they abuse the power entrusted to them, shall they devolve this power on a still smaller number, who must be more liable to corruption from the encrease of temptation? Or should they restore it into the hands of the people, from whom they received it? who alone are incorruptible, because the wealth of the few can never bribe the many, against the duty they owe to themselves. If I am told that the people are incapable of governing themselves—I shall answer that they have never been tried in America, except among the native Indians, who are free and happy, and who prove that self-government is the growth of our soil—And I also answer that they are more fit for self-government, than they are at present for any of the safe and solid governments, founded on representation.—When I see all these principles established by the example of the Swiss, who have remained under the simplest of all forms of government for near five hundred years, in uninterrupted tranquility and happiness—whilst every other invention of genius, devise of art, or imposition of force, has been torn up by the roots, with every aggravated circumstance of horror—I can no longer doubt—All the mists of theory and speculation vanish before an experiment like this.

The greatest human discernment, ever concentrated in the mind of one man, was the portion of the celebrated Nicholas Machiavelli—a name loaded with abuse by tyrants, flatterers and the mushrooms of science, because he told the truth; because he was a republican and the friend of mankind in times of usurpation; or because, they have never read or do not understand his works. After every inquiry which the most unbounded information and reflection, with a long experience in high public office afforded, Machiavelli, delivers his deliberate opinion in favour of the body of the people, as the only safe depository of liberty and power—He prefers it to the aristocracy and the Prince; but he does not disgrace the inquiry by mentioning representation.[54] If this was the opinion of Machiavelli, a citizen of Florence, where a numerous populace confined and crowded within the walls of a city, formed the most turbulent republic, that ever disgraced the cause of freedom by cruelty and anarchy—How much more favourably must his decision apply to the yeomanry of America—Landholders and consequently the most independent of mankind, mild by nature, moderate by manners, and persevering in every honest pursuit:—Surely if ever men were worthy of being entrusted with their own rights, the freeholders of America are—Make them then and their posterity legislators by birth—I mean not the lowest populace—I mean that class of citizens to whom this country belongs:—Numbers unqualified by property, should have their influence—they should be protected—they might preserve the right of 5.1.81 election—But they who hold the property of the soil, are alone entitled to govern it:—To effect this there would need but little change in the present forms—They might all stand—But the laws which pass the legislature before they become binding, should be referred to the different counties and cities—printed reasons drawn by committees, might if necessary, accompany each, together with an annual estimate of public wants and a detail of the expenditures of the former sums granted. Let these laws then be submitted to the free deliberation of the freeholders of the counties and cities—the numbers of the yeas and nays be taken on each by the presiding magistrate, and transmitted to the executive, who may then upon comparing the returns from the several counties and corporations, declare what laws are the will of the people. On the appearance of any sudden danger the two houses or indeed a majority of one house, might invest the Executive with that authority, exigency might require for the safety of the republic, until remedy should be provided by law.

5.1.82 The number of representatives might be decreased and an expence saved—this would at one blow destroy all legislative speculations—the influence of demagogues, or oligarchic juntos must then cease—The assemblage of the freeholders, separate in different counties would prevent disturbance—As no new law could be made in them, little confusion could ensue—After some years, or even immediately if confined to future cases—the celebrated law of Geneva might be introduced, and no freeholder admitted to the assembly until he had paid his father's debts. Sumptuary laws, permitting the use, but prohibiting the abuse of wealth, might be interposed to guard the public manners.—The Governor and two members of the senate might constitute a council of censors, to punish offenders against the sumptuary laws and the laws of morality, by a removal from office, and even disfranchisement, if necessary, with an appeal to the people of the county where the offender resided, in the latter case, and to the people of the State in the former.—Seminaries of useful learning, with professorships of political and domestic œconomy might be established in every county, discarding the philosophy of the moon and skies, we might descend to teach our citizens what is useful in this world—the principles of free government, illustrated by the history of mankind—the sciences of morality, agriculture, commerce, the management of farms and household affairs—The light would then penetrate, where mental darkness now reigns.—Do these things and in a very few years, the people instead of abusing, would wade up to their knees in blood, to defend their governments.

5.1.83 For some years past this has been the darling object of my life—to which all my views have tended—And I now think that nothing intermediate would be lasting or worthy the pursuit—Whenever I fairly lose sight of this—As soon as I turn my back forever on these dear illusions, which will be as soon as the proposed fœderal government is adopted—I shall turn all my wishes to that social state, whither that government will lead us, and I both hope and expect that with those amendments and guards, which it seems to be the general disposition to provide—it will gradually maturate in a safe and reasonable government.—Until that adoption I speak to my fellow citizens in the words of the proverb—Do not that by others, which you can do yourselves.

Retired in the country the publication by Aristides did not reach the Farmer until this moment.[55] The object of the remarks by the Farmer was to draw the attention of the public to a question of the greatest magnitude to them and their posterity; and the cause in which he has ventured to publish his sentiments is a cause of the United States.—The great and manifest defects in the national government proposed for America,—the omission of a declaration to ascertain the rights of the several States, and the rights of individuals, the primary object of every good and free government, particularly the trial by jury on suit against a federal officer for abuse of authority;—the want of proper checks to prevent the abuse, or annihilation of those rights;—the manifest danger to public liberty from a standing army, without limitation of number, in time of peace;—and the pernicious doctrines of Aristides; alone induced the Farmer to lay his reflections before the tribunal of public opinion. 5.1.84

It would give the Farmer real pain to stain a public cause with private altercation, and he flatters himself that his candid and impartial readers will admit, that his first address, which has given so great offence to Aristides, and which he calls abuse, slander, calumny, and a wanton and unprovoked attack on his good name, was temperate, moderate, and decent, and even respectful to that writer. The Farmer took the liberty to condemn and to expose the doctrines and errors of Aristides; but with charity he imputed his opinions to defect of judgment, or want of information. A good and virtuous citizen may, from want of understanding, maintain principles incompatible with the public welfare. If his integrity is not accused he should bear admonition or reproof with temper and moderation. If his opinions are censured he should justify or explain them with candor and decency, and should treat his adversary with respect. If his motives of action are questioned, he should defend himself with dignity and manly firmness, without petulance or asperity, or as Aristides recommends, "he should behave like a gentleman." Personalities are always odious and can only be excused by 5.1.85

the imputation of political opinions to improper, unworthy or base motives. The Farmer could not possibly entertain any personal resentment against Aristides. A knowledge by sight and a very few occasional conversations comprehend all the acquaintance between them. The Farmer was disposed to think well of Aristides from the report of some few of his acquaintance, and not from his own declaration, however solemn, of his immaculate purity, and love of country; for in this degenerate age the integrity and the patriotism of men must be measured by their actions, and not their professions.

5.1.86 The Farmer disdains intentionally to misrepresent Aristides, he may have been so unfortunate as to have misunderstood him.[56] It seems that what the Farmer considered as the opinions of Aristides were only objections to a bill of rights by some eriel forms, which he has pleased to usher into his drama to close the catastrophe, when from the former character he had assumed, he could not so well appear with the sword himself. Why did Aristides put groundless objections in the mouths of any persons, which no persons had ever used? What sense is there in making objections of no weight (and which he himself despised) to a bill of rights, under the covert of persons of his own creating?—If the Farmer misunderstood Aristides, it might have arose from his combining with his general doctrine a report of a declaration by him of the respect and regard he would pay to the Maryland bill of rights in his judicial capacity.—The Farmer then firmly believed, and he still believes that Aristides thought that bills of rights were considered in Europe as grants of Kings. The Farmer knew that this had been the language and argument of a Judge of another State.[57] All the arguments of the Farmer went to prove that they were not so considered in Europe, attended with the observation that he never knew the doctrine advanced in print, but by Filmer and Aristides.

5.1.87 Aristides insinuates that the remarks of the Farmer on his opinions proceeded from his desire to pay COURT to a gentleman who lately held the highest office in the State.[58] This insinuation is as false as it is mean and illiberal. The Farmer can respect and esteem the public and private virtues of a citizen without degrading himself to the lowest servility of the lowest sycophant. The Farmer has never dealt in the fulsome language of modern dedications, and if inclined, he could not direct his flatteries to obtain any office civil or military, under the new government. The Farmer has no wish to conceal himself from the apprehension of censure from an impartial public; and from the resentment of Aristides it is impossible he can have any thing to fear. A fancied superiority, and insolence of office gave birth to this unwarrantable suggestion.

5.1.88 There may be other reasons why Aristides has thought proper to make known his real name to the public than those he has suggested. If his vanity prompted him to believe, that his character would carry respect and authority to his publication, never was any political writer more mistaken. His pamphlet will injure the cause he undertakes to defend wherever it appears. It might be expected that Aristides would be more competent to understand the part of the new constitution, that establishes the JUDICIARY, than any other. He approves the whole system, and yet he knows the least of what he ought to understand the most. He says the article erecting the judiciary has been generally misconceived, and the Farmer verily believes by no person more than by Aristides. That Farmers and Planters should not comprehend the jurisdiction of the federal judicial power might be expected; but that a great law character, like Aristides, should so egregiously blunder, is very astonishing. A man grossly mistaken in his profession may be justly suspected in other subjects.

Aristides asserts, "that the inferior federal courts, and the State courts will have concurrent original jurisdiction in all the enumerated cases, wherein an appeal lies to the supreme federal court, except only the cases created by, or under the proposed constitution."[59]—By the second section of the third article, "The judicial power is to extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under the constitution, or the LAWS of the United States; and to all controversies between citizens of different States, and the citizens of any of the United States, and the citizens, or subjects, of foreign States"; and by the eighth section of the first article, "The Congress are invested with power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; and to make such laws as shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution these powers." Aristides contends that a federal officer, say an excise officer, may be sued by a citizen in a State court (I suppose any county court as well as the supreme court) for an abuse of his authority; and with confidence he asserts, "That no sound lawyer, of a good moral reputation will maintain the contrary opinion"; and he treats with supercilious contempt the objection of want of remedy in a State court, and a trial by jury for the citizen against a federal officer, for an abuse of office, "as a ridiculous bugbear, fit only to alarm minds on which no science has ever dawned."[60] Is it not evident that the jurisdiction in the cases above-mentioned, is expressly given to the inferior federal courts, with an appeal, both as to law and fact, to the supreme federal court?—Is it not clear that it was intended to keep the federal and State jurisdictions entirely separate? Were not the subordinate federal courts established to protect the continental revenue officers from the State jurisdictions?—If an action would lie against a federal officer in the State courts would it not blend and confound the two jurisdictions, and that too without any appeal from the State courts?—Is not the supreme federal court superior to the State courts? Is it not superior to the bills of rights, and the constitutions, of the several States?—If the State courts have concurrent jurisdiction with the inferior federal courts, that is, if any suit of which the latter has cognizance by the new government, may notwithstanding be instituted in the former, is it not self-evident that there may be different adjudications on the SAME question; and if decided in the inferior federal court with an appeal, if decided in a State court without any appeal, to the supreme federal court? What would be the effect of opposite decisions by two courts having concurrent jurisdiction?—If an action is commenced in a State court, Aristides thinks, and justly too, that thence there is no appeal to the supreme federal court, but only to their own high court of appeals, as heretofore. With confidence he maintains that as the jurisdiction of the State courts is not taken away by an express clause, or necessary implication, that they will still have cognizance of those cases of which jurisdiction is given to the inferior federal courts. The Farmer believes there is not another lawyer, or Judge, of sound judgment in the law, in all America, that entertains a similar opinion.—The Farmer is so bold as to hazard his opinion, contrary to that of Aristides, that if a citizen of Georgia, or subject of Great-Britain, has any claim against a citizen of Maryland, or if he has any claim against them, that suits in such cases, after the establishment of the national government, can only be commenced and prosecuted in the inferior federal courts, because the State courts are ousted of their jurisdiction of those cases, by necessary implication, from the obvious motives for the establishment of the federal judiciary, and the evident absurdities that must flow from a concurrent jurisdiction in the SAME cases. Is it not absurd to suppose that the national government intended that the State courts should have jurisdiction to decide on the LAWS of the United States, whether consonant or repugnant to the national constitution; or whether the federal officers abuse their authority?—And yet the grave, the solemn, the didactic Aristides asserts, "That every State Judge will have a right to reject any act handed to him as a law of the United States, which HE may conceive repugnant to the constitution."[61] How perverted or confused must be the head of that man who can seriously entertain so ridiculous an opinion! He can never claim from his knowledge of the national, or any other government to be one of the Judges of the most inferior of the inferior federal courts—Risum teneatis. A puisne Judge of a petty State (of Delaware, or Rhode-Island) to have a right to declare a LAW of the United States VOID? Will any sound lawyer, his moral reputation out of the question, risk his legal character so far as to maintain his assertion?—If Aristides has not too much pride to be convinced, if he has the candour he professes, or the legal or political knowledge he wishes the world to believe, he would not obstinately continue in error, but confess, how greatly he has misunderstood the judiciary system of the national government

5.1.90 If Aristides shall determine to mix private resentment with a public cause, if he cannot discuss political questions without descending to offensive personalities, or if he wishes to examine into the motives or private reputation of his adversary, as he very improperly calls the Farmer, he is informed that the Farmer has left his real name with the Printer.—If Aristides can discover ought in the life or manners of the Farmer, the detection of which may serve the public cause, or gratify private malice, he has free liberty to publish, to expose it to the world, in the strongest colours;—he will for his own sake confine himself to fact.—Calumniating invective may rouse any temper. Aristides has too long held a licentious pen with impunity.

Aristides with a degree of confidence, which many will deem presumption, insinuates that his arguments can only be combated by sophistry:— Language expressly calculated to impose on the uninformed mind may be justly suspected; but remarks addressed to the reason of those who are happy in education and leisure for reflection, can never do injury:— Sophistry may blind or mislead the wavering and inconstant mind, of the humble and unenlightened individual; but to convince the understanding and rouse the spirit, of the intelligent part of mankind, is the sacred province of truth alone. 5.1.91

To examine and elucidate the great and leading principles of government, we must penetrate to the source of human action, and explore the heart and constitution of man;—a consciousness of the equal rights of nature, is a component part of that aetherial spirit, which we dignify with the appellation of soul; the ardent desire and unceasing pursuit of equality, can therefore be no more destroyed by human power, than the soul itself; the chains of terrestrial despotism may confine, afflict and bow down to the earth, this mould of flesh; but the soul more free than air, quits this mortal frame, surrounded by ills no longer supportable, and after witnessing the final overthrow of all its hopes in this world, retires with indignation, into a world unknown. 5.1.92

Let any people be personally and fairly consulted on the form of that government, which is to rule them and their children, and they will establish the law of equality as its basis;—the unequal division of property silently and gradually undermines this foundation, almost as soon as society is formed; or before a new compact is confirmed, this equality is materially injured if not destroyed.[62]—Montesquieu justly observes that men, in the advanced stages of government, quit the equality of nature, from the moment of their birth, never to re-enter it but by the force of equal law;[63]—the law then that is equally enforced on all ranks of society, to which the great and the humble, are compelled to submit, is the next state of equality, to which this ever active principle of the mind aspires; with this it would be content, as the most perfect state of liberty, which exists only, in a just 5.1.93

medium between two extremes; but in the attainment and preservation of this, the efforts of the human understanding never keep pace with the will.

Quicquid delirant reges, plectuntur achivi.

It is the poor people who suffer for the misrule of the great.[64]

5.1.94 Laws are cobwebs, catching only the flies and letting the wasps escape. The great and powerful can easily bring to justice, the poor and humble offender; but who is to lead to punishment the great? These lords of the earth, who have extensive and powerful connexions, who aim at no trifling larcenies; but who plunder a people of their liberties and put public revenues into their private purses, under the sanction of laws made by themselves:—These are the men who deprive their fellow mortals of their fondest hopes, and compel them to resort to the supreme aim of a monarch—to the authority of a single person—who exalted far above all may reduce them all, once more to that common level of equal law, of which mankind never lose sight:—Come we will choose one man to rule over us! is the cry of a people who are tired of the rule of the elders—the meaning of the word senate, is an assembly of elders; but this the last and most fatal step, is never retrieved, until government returns through blood into that original chaos—from the discordant elements of which, new and equal forms of society arise, created upon first principles.

5.1.95 The corruption of the rule of one man is also regular and perhaps like every other progressive step of mixed government—unavoidable.—He is at first limited and his hands tied; but as the powerful and strong are alone able to keep him confined—they are the checks which are necessarily imposed.—The elders, or the senate, are always joined in power to guard against his usurpations:—The people in this event, find that instead of a protector of their equal rights, they have elected a patron for the rich and powerful, who, under the sanction of his name and authority, plunder and oppress with still greater security.—If a weak Prince should attempt to curb their insolence, he generally becomes himself the sacrifice to his own temerity—the proud chiefs rebel—put new shackles on their principal;—until at length tired of his own uneasy and dependant situation—disgusted at sheltering evil and his incapacity to do good—Some able and politic chieftain breaks the bonds of restraint; perhaps with the manly boldness of a Gustavus Erickson, he may demand of the representatives of the nation, to take back that power which is only a cloak for vice and which is too weak to do good.—He may request them to deprive him of the authority he had received, or give him that which would enable him to secure the public prosperity and private happiness.—Let him leave the legislature with a stern firmness—retire to an army who adore him, the submission must follow;—or let such a chief pursue the more usual rout to power—let him profit of the discontents of the multitude and he will quickly fasten the cords of authority around the necks of the great.

5.1.96 The chief magistrate is now cloathed with full authority to do good.—If he does so, he confirms a solid tyranny for his degenerate successors—For if power does not corrupt him it certainly will those that follow:—In this view, the best elected magistrates have only entailed misery on mankind—the wise and moderate administration of Augustus, (who was appointed commander in chief of the established forces, and was annually elected consul during the whole period of his life) secured the power and gave full scope to the vices of Tiberious. Caligula and Nero in whom the Julian line ended:—A veneration for the memory of Titus enabled his brother Domitian to sink the spirit of the world, and the divine Marcus Aurelius found that the lustre of his own virtues would frustrate every endeavour of his disinterested and patriot head, to set aside the election of that monster, his son, or rather his wife's son Commodus; for Marcus Aurelius could never have been the father of such a son—and the latter end of this all-accomplished mortal, was embittered with the prospect, of the misery of his fellow citizens under the administration of a brute—As to hereditary chief magistrates, I perfectly agree with the Marquis Mirabeau, and what he says of France may be justly extended to the whole world—he says, if I recollect right, that in 1100 years there have been but four Princes on the French throne, that did not deserve the gallows.[65]—In England, an Henry IId. was succeeded by a brute, a coward and a fool.—Richard, John and Henry—the valiant and just Edward the Ist. made way for the mean and despicable Edward IId—the Great Edward the IIId and his adored son, the Black Prince, crowned the English throne with laurels to be lavished away by the profuse and injudicious hand of Richard IId—and the valiant Henry the Vth. transmitted his glory and authority to be tarnished by his weak son, Henry the sixth.—In fine, there is no general truth more fully established than, that human beings entrusted with power will abuse it—from the Prince who fills the throne, down to the degraded negro, who beats his poor plough-horses and oxen so unmercifully:—There is a humane and benevolent saying of an illustrious Prince, the Marshal Vendome, which deserves to be imprinted on our minds in indelible characters.—He said that in a long march he listened attentively to the quarrels between the muleteers and the mules, and that he found the mules always in the right—thus the possession and the abuse of power seem inseperably connected.[66]

The rule of any one man, who is elevated to a pre-eminence of power, is always surrounded by those vile minions and favorites, who bask in the sunshine of courts—deify the object of their adoration with the venal incense of flattery—intercept every avenue to truth, and who never can be satisfied until they reduce the people to the slavery of the ancient Persians—who, when their Prince ordered them to be well bastinadoed, were obliged to fall down upon their knees and say—We thank you most gracious Sovereign for deigning to recollect us.— 5.1.97

political enquiry—that in all governments, in which there is sown the smallest seed of the rule of one man, no checks—no bars, can prevent its growing into a monarchy, or a despotism if the empire is extensive—And that to attempt to form a virtuous republic on the unqualified principles of representation is as vain as to expect a carriage to run with wheels only on one side.—Wheels will be added on the other, and the machine once set in motion down hill will never stop until it carries us to the bottom—then let us not set off without every necessary check.

5.1.99 It is true the proposed national system guarantees to each State a republican form of government—Whoever will look into Coxe's Northern Travels, will find that in the treaty whereby the three arch-despots of Russia, Germany and Prussia, divided that poor distracted country, Poland—they solemnly guarantee (in express words) to the said Poland—a republican government forever.[67]

5.1.100 The chief who is thus liberated from constitutional restraints, is under no control but the licentiousness of the soldiery:—The praetorian bands of the Roman and the Janizaries of the Turkish empire, have frequently stained the imperial purple with blood, and applied the bow-string to the haughty descendants of Othman—yet they are always the willing instruments of the cruelty of the Prince against all ranks of his subjects.

5.1.101 Here then we arrive at the summit of imperfection in human legislation—the magistrate whose will is law, is no longer restrained by the influence of manners—a regard to reputation or the desire of glory—the three ruling principles that guide the heart to virtue;—his own inclinations become the manners of the empire—establish reputation and fix the standard of fame.—Caius Caesar, who was declared Imperator or Emperor of the Roman republic (a title in its most extensive signification meaning only a military commander in chief) was devoted to lust—A grave senate of Rome—that senate which twenty or indeed ten years before, had commanded the awe and veneration of mankind, solemnly proposed a law, as Suetonius informs us, to submit their wives and daughters to his embraces[68]—it was his regard for the public reputation that alone forbad this sacrifice of the honor of the empire—the first Caesar was a compound of the most exalted virtue and deepest vice—but the fact discovers what instantaneous change, the slightest alterations of government may create in the manners of a people—of a most enlightened and virtuous people—for the age of Julius Caesar, was the age of Cicero, Cato, Brutus, Cassius and of all that noble but unfortunate band of conspirators.—

But this furious passion which has celestial beauty for its object, soon 5.1.102 banishes philosophy and moderation—even the glowing idea that gives all that is beautiful and amiable to our arms, makes the senses drunk with passion—What effects then must spring from the idea realized—all history informs us—the minds of all men, even the best unrestrained by their own, or the constitution of the State become inebriated with lust, from the times of David, the second chief magistrate of Israel—a man after God's own heart—and his son Solomon—the wise, who had the moderate share of seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines—down to the amorous Charles, (who restored to the English throne, before the republican fever had cooled, or Presbyterian sanctity had relaxed) yet contrived to fill the English peerage with his bastards.—The nation made one jump from the cold pulpit of religion into the hot-bed of vice—This irresistible passion marked with celebrity the decemvirate of Rome—a tyranny established by the free suffrages of the people, in the infancy and most quiet and virtuous aera of the republic; because they took it into their heads that their old constitution and laws were not good enough, and therefore sent to Greece for new ones:—If in the six and twenty senators of America, some future Appius may be found, I yet trust from the high confidence I repose in my fair countrywomen, that for many years a Virginia will not be wanting to re-act the Roman tragedy;—but all human virtue is frail—What the senate intended by law for Julius Caesar, the influence of manners provided for Octavius and his successors—Matrons and the beauties of the first rank of Rome esteemed it the highest honor to prostitute themselves to the artful Augustus, and even to such an infamous villain as Caligula:—The amorous dispositions of a succession of Princes, have rendered the present of the handkerchief the highest honor, to which female beauty and merit could aspire in the seraglio of Constantinople, and in the courts of the two Lewises—who preceded the present amiable and virtuous monarch of France; yet they were rewarded with implicit obedience, and Lewis the 16th meets with turbulence and resistance in his most meritorious acts:—Virtue only breeds confusion in perverted government.—Whoever will read what the pens of Suetonius and Tacitus have described, will be lost in admiration at the original and surpassing wickedness to which Rome arrived in less than half a century—But can these things happen to the Americans? What distinguishes the Americans, from the French—the Germans—the Turks or the Persians?—America is in a great measure peopled by emigrants from the old countries, now enthralled in slavery—Does crossing the Atlantic alter the nature of these people?—Let our countrymen reflect on this awful truth, that nothing creates that wide distinction between them, and the white slaves of the old world, or indeed their black slaves here, but their government—Let them consider this well, and they will be rendered cautious how they change it—(bad as it is) for new imported constitutions—Amalgomated as we were with a corrupt old monarchy—with the combined corruptions of three armies—a constant communication with the luxurious and debauched capitals of the old world—we cannot be surprised, that some of our great cities are now ripe for any thing.—These remarks are intended for the thinking part of our citizens, and particularly those who are most active in promoting this revolution.—In the most important characters of this class of men, the author has great confidence:—America has more to dread from the want of information than the want of integrity in her rulers; and her own precipitation is the most dreadful of all. People should be liberal of every thing but power—but to give away an atom of their liberties is as criminal as dishonorable.

5.1.103 However degrading and disgraceful the state of society just described may be—worse as it is far than ten thousand deaths to a feeling and delicate mind—yet to the mass of the people it is not so afflicting as the loss of the other moral virtues, which in large governments, are exchanged for the fashionable vices of him who presides:—Under Caligula, the Roman legions were not ashamed to adorn their helmets with cockle-shells in triumph for their expedition against Britain, in which, they never ventured to leave the shores of Gaul—this Prince—the degenerate son of the adored Germanicus, happened to be a poltron.—During the reign of Nero, fiddling—dancing—singing—burning cities—plundering States—perfidy and assassination were the manners of the age, and discover the motley mind of this monster of levity and vice.—Domitian who like every man that from weakness—vicious heart—or the allurements of pleasure, deserts the paths of virtue—hated cordially those examples of merit which he could not imitate. Tacitus informs us, that during his life—virtue became a death warrant—Philosophy fled—Pliny sat himself down quietly to compose a grammar—the only work of science then safe—in short, nothing was honourable or profitable but assassinations, informations, and all sorts of corruptions and pollutions.

eyes, from a world which presents so frightful a prospect—to the world of hope,—the kingdom that is to come hereafter—the only solace and comfort of those who are miserable here;—there all the fond images of equality, which men are fated ever to retain, are once more revived—Scenes of never-ending bliss are painted in the most delightful colours—the imagination grows warm with the prospect—mad with the hopes of celestial happiness, the souls of all men seem anxious to take their flight, to their Omnipotent Author—the Sovereign Legislator of nature—who, peerless and above all, dispences equal law to willing minds:—The people flock in crouds to hear preachers—who, exalted by the presence of numerous and passionate audiences, are elevated into flights of native eloquence, surpassing the strains of the most studied oratory:—The people mind nothing but preaching; the things of this miserable world, are despised when put in competition with the joys of Paradise—agriculture is neglected—famine ensues—government is at length roused for want of plunder and a supply of luxuries—the sword of coercion is drawn—but it increases the phrenzy—One martyr makes fifty converts—such was the first rise of the Christian religion, as it is exactly and pathetically described by the historic pen of Ammianus Marcellinus:[69]—The empire torn by intestine convulsions becomes an easy prey to any bold invader.

Thus it is that barbarity—cruelty and blood which stain the history of religion, spring from the corruption of civil government, and from that never-dying hope and fondness for a state of equality, which constitutes an essential part of the soul of man:—A chaos of darkness obscures the downfal of empire, intermixed with gleams of light, which serve only to disclose scenes of desolation and horror—From the last confusion springs order:—The bold spirits who pull down the ancient fabric—erect a new one, founded on the natural liberties of mankind, and where civil government is preserved free, there can be no religious tyranny—the sparks of bigotry and enthusiasm may and will crackle, but can never light into a blaze.— 5.1.105

The truth of these remarks appear from the histories of those two great revolutions of European government, which seem to have convulsed this earth to the centre of its orb, and of which we have compleat record—The Roman and the Gothic, or as it is more commonly called the feudal constitution:—In the infancy of the Roman republic, when enterprizing and free, their conquests were rapid, because beneficial to the conquered (who were admitted to a participation of their liberty) their religion, although devoid, was not only unstained by persecution, but censurably liberal—they received without discrimination the Gods of the countries they subdued, into the list of their deities, until Olympus was covered with an army of demigods as numerous as the legions of Popish Saints; and we find the Grecian divinities adored with more sincere piety at Rome, than at Athens.—Rome was then in the zenith of her glory—in the days of her wretched decline—in the miserable reigns of Caracalla, Eliagabalus and Commodus.—Ammianus and others, inform us that the Christians were 5.1.106

butchered like sheep, for reviving the old exploded doctrine of a future state, in which Emperors and Senators were to be placed on a level with the poorest and most abject of mankind:—And in the succeeding despotisms when christianity became the established religion, it grew immediately as corrupt in its infancy, as ever it has proved at any period since—the most subtle disquisitions of a metaphysical nature became the universal rage—the more incomprehensible—the more obstinately were they maintained, and in fine, the canonized Austin or Ambrose, (I forget which) closed his laborious enquiries, with this holy position—that he believed, because it was impossible.[70] At length the great question, whether the three persons of the divinity, were three or one, became publickly agitated, and threw all mankind into a flame—Councils after councils, composed of all the wisdom of the divines, were assembled, and at length the doctrine that three were one prevailed, and such would have been the determination had it been proposed that three were sixteen—because misery is the foundation, upon which error erects her tyranny over the vulgar mind.—After this determination the arm of the Magistrate was called in, and those poor misled Arians who were still so wicked as to imagine that three must be three, were not only declared guilty of a most abominable and damnable heresy, but were thenceforth exterminated by fire and sword.

5.1.107 In the first age of the Gothic government, those free and hardy adventurers, deserted their Idols and embraced the doctrines of Christianity with ardent sincerity:—The King and a large majority of a nation, would be converted and baptized with as much celerity as the ceremony could be performed—but still liberty in the temporal, secured freedom in the spiritual administration: Christians and Pagan citizens lived together in the utmost harmony—Those bold and hardy conquerors would never listen to Bishops who advised persecution, and held in sovereign contempt all those metaphysical distinctions with which a pure religion has been disgraced, in order to cloak villainous designs and support artful usurpations of civil powers in feeble and turbulent governments. The Gothic institutions were however much sooner corrupted from internal vices than the Roman, and the undeniable reason was, that in the former, government by representation was admitted almost coeval with their first inundations;—whereas with the Romans, the democratic branch of power, exercised by the people personally, rendered them invinsible both in war and peace—the virtue of this internal institution could only be subdued by the greatness of its external acquisition—extensive empire ruined this mighty fabric—a superstructure, which overshadowed the then known world, was too mighty for the foundation confined within the walls of a city—the wealth imported by the Scipios from Spain and Afric, and by Flaminius, Lucullus, Sylla and Pompey, from the East, enabled the few to corrupt the many—a case that can never exist but where the legislative power resides exclusively in the citizens of the town—The Roman republic then became diseased at the heart, but as it was ages in forming, so it required ages of corruption to destroy a robust constitution where every atom was a nerve: It was not so with the Gothic constitution, mortal disease soon made its appearance there—Civil liberty was early destroyed by the insolence and oppressions of the great—The temporal power availed itself of that spiritual influence which nature has given religion over the hearts of men—A religion, the divinity of which is demonstrable by reason alone, unassisted by revelation became the corrupt instrument of usurpation.—Those who were the authors of the disorders which disgraced civil government, cut the reins of ecclesiastical persecution: And an universal and tyrannic confusion was mingled with absurdities that excite both ridicule and horror. We see a Duke of Gandia (who was betrayed and assassinated by that monster of perfidy Caesar Borgia, the bastard of the infamous Pope Alexander the VIth) in the last moments of his existence, begging the cut throat son, that he would intercede with his father, the Pope, in favour of his poor soul, that it might not be kept long in purgatory, but dispatched as soon as possible to Heaven, to dispute the infallibility of those vice-gerents of God, who generally patterned after the devil, was considered as an heresy more damnable than blaspheming the most high. Religious tyranny continued in this state, during those convulsions which broke the aristocracies of Europe, and settled their governments into mixed monarchies: A ray of light then beamed—but only for a moment—the turbulent state and quick corruption of mixed monarchy, opened a new scene of religious horror—Pardons for all crimes committed and to be committed, were regulated by ecclesiastical law, with a mercantile exactitude, and a Christian knew what he must pay for murdering another better than he now does the price of a pair of boots: At length some bold spirits began to doubt whether wheat flour, made into paste, could be actually human flesh, or whether the wine made in the last vintage could be the real blood of Christ, who had been crucified upwards of 1400 years—Such was the origin of the Protestant reformation—at the bare mention of such heretical and dangerous doctrine, striking (as they said) at the root of all religion, the sword of power leaped from its scabbard, the smoke that arose from the flames, to which the most virtuous of mankind, were without mercy committed, darkened all Europe for ages; tribunals, armed with frightful tortures, were every where erected, to make men confess opinions, and then they were solemnly burned for confessing, whilst priest and people sang hymns around them; and the fires of persecution are scarcely yet extinguished. Civil and religious liberty are inseparably interwoven–whilst government is pure and equal—religion will be uncontaminated:—The moment government becomes disordered, bigotry and fanaticism take root and grow—they are soon converted to serve the purpose of usurpation, and finally, religious persecution reciprocally supports and is supported by the tyranny of the temporal powers.

5.1.108 Although both civil and political liberty may be truly said no longer to exist in Europe—yet from one effect of the feudal institutions, that enlightened part of the globe, has in a great measure, recovered from the disorders occasioned by their irreparable loss:—What I allude to is the division of that quarter of the world into a multitude of separate States and sovereignties, and that extreme attention to the preservation of each and to the balance of power, which has become a fundamental law of the whole; this secures the influence of political moderation, or a species of fœderal liberty, which is the next blessing that government can afford; and certainly were wise men obliged to confine themselves to the choice of one alternative—fœderal or national liberty—they would prefer the former—whilst the influence of that exists, it must support the substance in a great measure of the latter, although the forms should no longer remain—But when that ceases, national liberty, which includes both civil and political freedom, must soon expire.—The history of mankind furnishes a series of invariable and frightful examples of this.—The Roman republic included a variety of other republics, States and Kingdoms living in a perfect liberty, and according to their own laws; this variety and contrariety of interests seemed to promise internal freedom, independant of external influence—But the time of their delirium had arrived—after the conquest of Hannibal and the peace which the first Scipio made with the Carthaginians—that immortal statesman and hero gave his countrymen this remarkable advice—to restore Carthage, as an enemy worthy of Rome—but the opinion of that stupid old fool Cato, the censor, prevailed as more consonant to the vulgar level of men's judgments, and delenda est Carthago—Carthage must be destroyed, became the motto of the day—the consequence of this political advice was, that Carthage being razed to the ground, and no enemy existing contiguous to Rome, which she could dread—not all her internal institutions—not all the variety of interests, which a multitude of almost independant States afforded, could prevent her speedy destruction—ruit mote sad—she fell by her own weight—and their liberty became such liberty as a Nero and the Praetorian bands thought fit to distribute. The Turkish empire is at this day extended over a multitude of kingdoms, States—even democratic and aristocratic republics, oligarchies, and every species of institution which the inventive genius of man has created—but I do not see that it has moderated its despotism.—Spain still contains in her bosom that very extensive and well formed republic Biscay—but the slavery of Spain has since the reign of Charles the Vth, nearly depopulated the finest part of Europe.—France contains an extensive free country, which would not submit to the general government but on conditions that have hitherto secured them a superior degree of happiness—I mean Britany, which was annexed to the crown by the marriage of Anne, of Bretagne, with Lewis the VIIth. There was a democracy until lately within the territory of France, Marseilles—A French gentleman once told me, we had one republic in France, which made one very great noise, at last the King he did build one little citadel in the middle of it, and then he teach them republicans how to behave themselves—The melancholy truth is, that the internal institutions of an extensive empire signify nought—the principle that the convenience, the rights and interests of a part must give way to what is called the good of the whole, unhinges every species of just and equal government, because it is a principle that has no limits.[71]

serves a degree of social happiness very different from what exists in other parts of the world—we find them injured by foreign war—but the moderation of a political influence exempts them from the desolations of those internal commotions which lay waste two extensive empires—Their wars too are becoming more mild and less frequent than formerly, and certainly if they could not be entirely prevented, they might be quickly suppressed by keeping up an annual Congress of diplomatique ministers, instead of their present imperfect mode of negociation, which defective as it is, has notwithstanding rendered peace more durable, and war less destructive; the only satisfactory reason their greatest patriots have given for neglecting, what at first view appears so important an improvement, is that terror with which they justly view, any thing in the shape of general government, which they universally admit to be the greatest curse that can befal mankind:—The enlightened statesmen of the old world, have imprinted on their minds the wisdom of the ancient fable, which I shall now repeat to the Americans—"The lion, the king of the beasts, gave out that he was sick—he confined himself to his den, and his friends did not stick out to say that he must die of that disorder—all the beasts went to pay their court and assist him but the fox—at length the lion appeared abroad and took Reynard roundly to task, why he had not come to see him, when he was so ill—the fox, who in fable is the emblem of wisdom, made this memorable reply—In truth I did intend to pay my respects to your majesty, but when I came near your den, I saw all the feet pointing in and none coming out"—So invariably have powers been travelling to the centre, never again to return to those who bestow them.

At present as a recompence for the evils of occasional broils, Europe has 5.1.110 the consolation to reflect, that she is secure from the terrible despotisms which reign over the other three quarters of the globe.—Those States who admit the sanction of the laws of nature and nations form as it were a great fœderal republic, and the balance of power, even under an imperfect system, has prevented those great revolutions and shocks which sweeping myriads of mortals at a blow, degrade mankind in the eye of philosophy, to a level with the ants and other insects of the earth—negociation unnerves the arm of conquest, and the genius of a Marlbrough, an Eugene, a Saxe and Turenne, is desplayed in harmless counter-marches, which in Asia, or even Europe, some centuries back, would have formed an Alexander, a Caesar, a Gengis Khan and a Tamerlane.

5.1.111 To this balance of power, France has long owed her safety, and that only can save her at this particular and awful crisis of turbulence; the despotism of Constantinople would soon reign at Paris, but that the territory of France is not sufficiently large for such a tyranny, and she is surrounded by numerous, warlike and independant sovereignties—the influence of manners, which their philosophers boast of, as one great security, if not ironically introduced, is certainly but an empty sound—their manners—reputation and every thing, have been long regulated by the capricious vices of the Prince who sat on the throne—but France is not sufficiently extensive to defend her empire by such immense deserts, as surround the despotisms of Turkey, Persia, China and Morocco, and secure them from foreign conquest—If the Prince, in France, was to destroy all their fundamental laws, which by what they now call their constitution, he evidently may do and subject his subjects to the caprice of a Turkish yoke, which 200,000 standing troops will accomplish for him whenever he pleases:—The inevitable consequence would be, that he would only subject himself and his slaves to instant conquest and partition among his neighbours.—No Prince of France will therefore ever be permitted to attempt this, whilst the present balance of power remains.

5.1.112 It remains to apply the foregoing principles to the American States—It is now evident, that they are not to be fixed as a constellation to give light to revolving ages—they have blazed for a moment like meteors in a troubled sky: Scarce has peace secured them the independance they sought, when a mighty revolution is to annihilate their separate and independant sovereignties, and to embrace them in the wide arms of one general government; it is impossible that the free citizens of these States could listen for a moment, to such a tremendous and awful change, but from some real defects which they have experienced in their separate constitutions—That there are such cannot be denied—but still the author has no hopes that the citizens of these States will ever be again so happy as they were under the government of Great-Britain and since the revolution—The state of society before the late war was remarkably mild and moderate, and what is uncommon, we rather combatted the theory of tyranny than the practice[72]—since the war we have been much embarrassed by a great encrease of private, and the creation of an enormous public debt, with its attendant paper securities, the corrupting influence of which would contaminate a society of angels; our new elevation among the nations of the earth has opened to our principal citizens unbounded prospects of national splendor and private preferment, which lay dormant in our former dependant situation—all these, and a variety of other causes have combined to disturb the public tranquility and vitiate our social happiness.—We have no opportunity of comparing our situation but with that which existed before the late revolution, and from this we conclude our forms of government are defective, without considering our change of situation, or without reflecting how few countries in the world are so happy as we are at this moment—notwithstanding we are in the most disturbed of all situations of society, that is on the eve of a great revolution; suppose such a change was now impending in any other country in the world—a change opening such unlimited views to some and so detrimental to other individuals, involving the interests and agitating the passions of every citizen—could so much moderation and candor be expected—the general abhorrence which we all entertain of the violences of the mad partizans of the new system, evinces the mild state of our present institutions.

Notwithstanding this, no man is more thoroughly convinced than the Farmer, that there is not a government in the confederacy perfect, or indeed founded on solid fixed principles.—Pennsylvania has the boldest direction to a happy theory of all the new contrivances—but still it is fundamentally defective, and it is said that they are daily weakening in practice the great virtue of their institution, instead of substantiating so glorious an idea—The four New-England States were practically the most solid in their formation, until two of them were spoiled by their nasty new ginger-bread work—and yet they originally required amendments—their town meetings, which were the essential pith and marrow of their constitution seem rather to have been regulated by manners, than substantiated by proper and legal powers; as for the others they were all begun in the middle and formed without materials necessary for the work—they remain and must remain governments on paper, substantiated by anarchy and misrule—New-York indeed, by an excess of inverted ingenuity, has contrived to make something like a real government, that would for a length of years secure their political freedom—On the other hand Georgia is utterly incomprehensible—it appears at first sight all body and no head or feet, and on nearer view it has no body either—it is in fact a lusus naturae in the political world—However, should they all escape the stroke that now impends, which is hardly to be expected, it is in my opinion utterly impossible for nine out of thirteen to prolong their feeble existence for twenty years without considerable alterations.—I see nothing that could greatly injure New-York, Connecticut or Rhode-Island. Were I to give a model of a perfect government, it would not vary greatly from the Connecticut charter—the amendments would be all in the town-meetings—Rhode-Island lays under a popular odium—all governments have their inconveniences, but I should be apt to ascribe those of Connecticut and Rhode-Island to their paper securities and other evils of the late war.—When parties run high, popular odium is a very uncertain test of truth, and audi et alteram partem—hear both sides, is the best maxim of political and moral justice. However the conduct of Rhode-Island with regard to paper money, as we hear it, is incomprehensible—What shall I say of Pennsylvania? When I view this bold effort of the human understanding, I am struck with admiration and surprize at the masterly hand of him that broke through the mounds of prejudice and education, guided by the glimmering of a distant light; he adventured boldly into the realms of truth, but the brilliant resplendence dazzled his sight—he found himself alone and unsupported, and he retired precipitately to his companions, who were groping in error and darkness[73]—Let Pennsylvania pursue with energy and propriety the ray of light, which beams through the mass of her constitution; let her establish county meetings of freeholders, to whom one third of her legislature may refer a contested law for the revision of the great body of the people by actual vote—establish county seminaries of learning and similar institutions to promote true patriotism and true knowledge, and she will last the envy of mankind until time shall be no more—As it is she is a child of nature, and strong convulsions must attend her destruction. As to all the other institutions of this continent, they are governments of the people, and yet the people are excluded from all share in the government.[74] They can only be supported by the few individuals who are objects of elections, maintaining a disinterested preference of the public good to their private convenience—for it must be ever held in view, that the interest of the few is opposed to the public interest, but the interest of the many, is the public interest—on which great distinction the weakness of representative government depends—The elected few are tempted to corruption by all the emoluments of government, and by that plunder which public disorder affords—they are screened from punishment by making legislation subservient to their interested purposes, and there is no control but public manners and the propinquity of our independant States, which enforces moderation by interest, emulation and example[75]—Public manners are daily corrupting by a fell avarice, which is the canker worm of public and private virtue—the facility of gratifying avaricious views, by prostituting legislative authority, renders intrigue the only profitable quality in an age of venality. Profit, honor and distinction are all inseparably interwoven, and a man of deep intrigue must be necessarily, the most respected character in perverted governments—if virtue gets into office, rotation wheels it out, hated and despised.—This view which I believe to be in a great measure just, although the principles are but develloping, discover our systems to be fundamentally wrong, did not the proposed revolution bear a more fatal testimony; the truth is that we aimed at, and still aim at premature public splendor and private luxury, forgetting that bodies politic, like natural bodies have their duration of manly vigor and the decline of age, prolonged and regulated by the length of years in which they have been arriving at maturity.—We wanted to be every thing at once—that is what we now wish, and in the event we shall be nothing or worse than nothing; we strived to patch up the ruined fabric of the British constitution for our use, and rushing headlong to our object, we did not discover the precipices that lay in our road—we never reflected, that we had none of those distinctions of ranks which preserve that government—that the state of our society was altogether different—and that we had only the wishes, but none of the means.

A Farmer.

1. This essay was written in reply to a pamphlet by Aristides, the pseudonym of Alexander Contee Hanson, a Maryland legislator and judge. The pamphlet is reprinted in Ford, Pamphlets 217–57.

2. Aristides had argued, near the end of his pamphlet: "The characters of the principal advocates and opponents are well known. To him who declines not a public avowal of his sentiments, some credit is due, for his candour; and he is entitled to your patient attention. But he that prefers a secret corner, for dealing forth his objections, and expositions, should be heard with caution and distrust. It is in a land of slavery alone, where truth shuns the open day." Ford, Pamphlets 254. Later, Aristides explained that his signature is equivalent to "a public avowal of the author." Maryland Journal and Baltimore Advertiser 4 March 1788. This controversy is continued in subsequent exchanges, with A Farmer finally leaving his name with the printer and both writers expressing their determination to resist personal attacks. See VI, 5.1.90. For a similar controversy see Philadelphiensis I, 3.9.1.–6.

3. Turning, as he said, "to attack the whole body of anti-federalists in their strong hold," Aristides had made the common Federalist argument that the reservations of individual rights that are appropriate where a government is given a general grant of power to do what it thinks necessary are not necessary or appropriate where the powers of government are so defined that such government cannot, "without manifest usurpation, exert any power not expressly, or by necessary implication, conferred by the compact." He went on to the argument that the insertion of a bill of rights would, at least, have done no harm. Among other things, "the very appearance of it might raise more clamour than its omission,—I mean from those who study pretexts for condemning the whole fabric of the constitution.—'What! (might they say) did these exalted spirits imagine, that the natural rights of mankind depend on their gracious confession. . . .' " Ford, Pamphlets 241–43. Aristides defends his argument against what he contends to be A Farmer's misrepresentation, in the Maryland Journal and Baltimore Advertiser 4 March, 1788. (This reply is not reprinted by Ford; A Farmer makes a somewhat feeble defense in his sixth essay, 5.1.84–87). Later in this reply, however, Aristides makes this interesting (if dubious) argument. "It is indeed impossible to divine, what laws it may frame, in pursuance of its particular powers. It is also impossible to say, what laws may, at all times, be 'necessary and proper.' But this we may say,—that, in exercising those powers, the Congress cannot legally violate the natural rights of an individual. And this again is all you could say, were there an express constitutional avowal of those rights." See Mason 2.2.1 n. 1.

4. Filmer does assert this doctrine in his Patriarcha passim., but Aristides does not. One of Aristides' defenders, A Plebeian, writing in the Maryland Journal on 14 March, presents a good statement of several elements of the Federalist view of the bill of rights question: "To alarm the apprehensions of the croud with an intended destruction of their bill of rights, when, by the constitution, the executive power is not only liable to impeachment, but so circumscribed, checked and limited, that it is scarce reasonable to imagine it can err, can be supposed to be nothing better than the last resource of a disappointed incendiary. In governments like Britain, where the executive is hereditary, and may probably fall into the hands of a person in every respect disqualified, a bill of rights is considered as necessary to guard the people against the encroachments of the crown. Our constitution hath, in this respect, freed us from the necessity of such a security. Should we hereafter be obliged to have recourse thereto, how does it appear beyond our reach? So long as we are sensible of being the origin of all power; so long as we resolve to be a free, virtuous and independent people; so long shall such principles be the best bill of rights for our security; and so long shall we be able to command it from any delegated administration whatever."

8. Aristides replies that "An act to authorize general warrants would be agreeable to no power conferred by the constitution" and "the party injured will most clearly have redress in a state court." The Maryland Journal and Baltimore Advertiser 4 March 1788. See VI, 5.1.86. On a bill of rights as a standard of governmental action, see Agrippa VI, 4.6.23 n. 14; on the relevance of state bills of rights, see above Brutus II, 2.9.32 n. 23.

For an explicit statement to the contrary, see below Impartial Examiner 5.14.5, 10.

11. Thus A Farmer accepts a fundamental Federalist proposition, the overriding danger of majority tyranny, and makes it the basis for a contra-Federalist argument on a bill of rights. 12. "For want of some plain and obvious distinctions, there has been vented so much senseless clamour against standing armies, that they are become a political bugbear." "In fine, I consider this grand objection, as a mere pretext for terrifying you, like children, with spectres and hobgoblins." Ford, Pamphlets 234–35.

13. In a footnote dealing with Montesquieu's views of representation in a confederation, Aristides said: "Could the immortal spirit of Montesquieu revisit the earth, and behold the model now offerred to America, how quickly would his favorite republic [Lycia] sink in his estimation. In a new quarter of the globe scarcely heard of by the greater part of Europeans in his day, and since the commencement of the present century, he would see men who have obtained a perfection in the science most conducive to human happiness, in that study which was the principal occupation of his life, in which his predecessors had acquired only a few glimmering lights, and of which it was reserved for him to develope most of the true first principles." "There is one universal division in all states, which is between the innocent and the criminals; and another between such as are, in some measure, contented with what they possess by inheritance, or what they expect from their own abilities, industry, or parsimony; and others, who, dissatisfied with what they have, and not trusting to those innocent ways of acquiring more, must fall to others, and pass from just to unjust, from peaceable to violent. The first desire safety, and to keep what they have; the second are content with dangers, in hope to get what others legally possess: one loves the present state and government, and endeavors to secure it; the other desires to end this game, and shuffle for a new: one loves fixed laws and the other arbitrary power; yet the last, when they have gained enough by factions and disorders, by rapine and violence, come then to change their principles with their fortunes, and grow friends to established orders and fixed laws." If so, Aristides will freely forgive the injury.")

See I, 5.1.12. Aristides was right in expecting that the state and federal courts would have concurrent jurisdiction in many areas, but he was wrong in expecting that actions begun in state courts could not be transferred to a federal inferior or supreme court. (Ford, Pamphlets 237–38.) Given this latter view, the notion of concurrent jurisdiction is, of course, much more open to the criticism of A Farmer than the present system of concurrent jurisdiction subject to final determination by the federal Supreme Court.

60. The full remark is: "Suppose now a federal officer under colour of his legal authority, to commit a daring outrage; may not the party injured obtain redress in a state court?—With submission to all Farmers, and antifederalists, I think, he may.—If a suit be brought, and the defendant attempt to justify, there will be two points for decision.—Did the officer act agreeably to law? Is such law agreeable to the constitution?—In Like manner, were there a federal bill of rights, the question before the court would be, is such law agreeable to the bill of rights?—I am under no fear, that any sound lawyer, of a good moral reputation, will say, that, on the defendant's barely producing a federal commission, the action in a state court must of course be dismissed. Away then with this ridiculous bugbear, fit only to alarm minds, on which no science has ever dawned." Maryland Journal 4 March 1788.

A Farmer and Planter

MARYLAND JOURNAL
1 April 1788

This essay,[1] written shortly before the election of delegates to the state ratifying convention, attacks the Constitution as a scheme for aristocracy fostered by the rich men. A Farmer and Planter is particularly fearful of the oppressive consequences of the powers to tax and to use the militia to enforce the laws. He sums up a great deal of Anti-Federal sentiment in his call, "Be wise, be virtuous, and catch the precious moment as it passes, to refuse this new-fangled government, and extricate yourselves and posterity from tyranny, oppression, aristocratical or monarchical government." (5.2.3).

1. Bernard Steiner suggests that there were several articles by A Farmer and Planter, but all of his references are to the article here, and I have found no others. "Maryland's Adoption of the Federal Constitution," The American Historical Review October 1899, p. 38 n.5.

To the Farmers and Planters of Maryland

Fellow-Citizens,

5.2.1 The time is nearly at hand, when you are called upon to render up that glorious liberty you obtained, by resisting the tyranny and oppression of George the Third, King of England, and his ministers.—The first Monday in April is the day appointed by our assembly, for you to meet and choose delegates in each county, to take into consideration the new Federal Government, and either adopt or refuse it. Let me entreat you, my fellows, to consider well what you are about—Read the said Constitution, and consider it well before you act—I have done so, and can find that we are to receive but little good, and a great deal of evil—Aristocracy, or government in the hands of a very few nobles, or RICH MEN, is therein concealed in the most artful wrote plan that ever was formed to entrap a free people. The contrivers of it have so completely entrapped you, and laid their plan so sure and secretly, that they have only left you to do one of two things; that is either to receive or refuse it. And in order to bring you into their snare, you may daily read new pieces published in the News-Papers, in favour of this new government; and should a writer dare to publish any piece against it, he is immediately abused and vilified.

Look around you and observe well the RICH MEN, who are to be your only rulers, lords and masters in future! Are they not all for it? Yes! Ought not this to put you on your guard? Does not riches beget power, and power, oppression and tyranny? 5.2.2

I am told that four of the richest men in Ann-Arundel County, have offered themselves candidates to serve in the Convention, who are all in favour of the new Federal Government;[1] let me beg of you to reflect a moment on the danger you run—If you choose these men, or others like them, they certainly will do every thing in their power to adopt the new government—Should they succeed, your liberty is gone for ever; and you will then be nothing better than a strong ass crouching down between two burthens—The new form of government gives Congress liberty at any time, by their laws, to alter the state laws, and the time, places and manner of holding elections for representatives; by this clause they may command, by their laws, the people of Maryland to go to Georgia, and the people of Georgia to go to Boston, to choose their representatives—Congress, or our future lords and masters, are to have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises—Excise is a new thing in America, and few country farmers and planters know the meaning of it; but it is not so in Old England, where I have seen the effects of it, and felt the smart. It is there a duty, or tax, laid upon almost every necessary of life and convenience, and a great number of other articles. The excise on salt in the year 1762, to the best of my recollection, in England, was 4s. sterling per bushel, for all that was made use of in families, and the price of salt per bushel about 6s. sterling, and the excise 4s. 6d. on every gallon of rum made use of. If a private family make their own soap, candles, beer, cider, &c. &c. they pay an excise-duty on them; and if they neglect calling in an excise-officer at the time of making these things, they are liable to grievous fines and forfeitures, besides a long train of evils and inconveniencies attending this detestable excise; to enumerate particularly would fill a volume—The excise-officers have power to enter your houses at all times, by night or day, and if you refuse them entrance, they can, under pretence of searching for exciseable goods, that the duty has not been paid on, break open your doors, chests, trunks, desks, boxes, and rummage your houses from bottom to top; nay, they often search the cloaths, petticoats and pockets of ladies or gentlemen, (particularly when they are coming from on board an East-India ship) and if they find any the least article that you cannot prove the duty to be paid on, seize it and carry it away with them; who are the very scurf and refuse of mankind, who value not their oaths, and will break them for a shilling. This is their true character in England, and I speak from experience, for I have had the opportunity of putting their virtue to the test; and saw two of them break their oath for one guinea, and a third for one shilling's worth of punch. What do you think of a law to let loose such a set of vile officers among you! Do you expect the Congress excise-officers will be any better, if God, in his anger, should think it proper to punish us for our ignorance, and sins of ingratitude to him, after carrying us through the late war, and giving us liberty, and now so tamely to give it up by adopting this aristocratical government?

5.2.3 Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several states, which may be included within this union, according to their respective numbers. This seems to imply, that we shall be taxed by the poll again, which is contrary to our bill of rights; but it is possible that the rich men, who are the great landholders, will tax us in this manner, which will exempt them from paying assessments on their great bodies of land in the old and new parts of the United States; many of them having but few taxable by the poll.—Our great Lords and Masters are to lay taxes, raise and support armies, provide a navy, and may appropriate money for two years, call forth the militia to execute their laws, suppress insurrections, and the President is to have the command of the militia.—Now, my countrymen, I would ask you, why are all these things directed and put into their power?—Why; I conceive, they are to keep you in a good humour; and if you should, at any time, think you are imposed upon by Congress and your great Lords and Masters, and refuse or delay to pay your taxes, or do any thing that they shall think proper to order you to do, they can, and I have not a doubt but they will, send the militia of Pennsylvania, Boston, or any other state or place, to cut your throats, ravage and destroy your plantations, drive away your cattle and horses, abuse your wives, kill your infants, and ravish your daughters, and live in free quarters, until you get into a good humour, and pay all that they may think proper to ask of you, and you become good and faithful servants and slaves.*[2]—Such things have been done, and I have no doubt will be done again, if you consent to the adoption of this new federal government. You laboured under many hardships whilst the British tyrannized over you!—you fought, conquered and gained your liberty—then keep it, I pray you, as a precious jewel—trust it not out of your own hands—be assured, if you do, you will never more regain it—the train is laid, the match is on fire, and they only wait for yourselves to put it to the train, to blow up all your liberty and commonwealth governments, and introduce aristocracy and monarchy, and despotism will follow of course, in a few years; for a four-years President will be, in time, a King for life, and after him, his son, or he that has the greatest power among them, will be King also.—View your danger, and find out good men to represent you in convention—men of your own profession and station in life—men who will not adopt this destructive and diabolical form of a federal government:—There are many among you that will not be led by the nose by rich men, and would scorn a bribe.—Rich men can live easy under any government, be it ever so tyrannical—they come in for a great share of the tyranny, because they are the ministers of tyrants, and always engross the places of honour and profit, whilst the greater part of the common people are led by the nose, and played about by these very men, for the destruction of themselves and their class.—Be wise, be virtuous, and catch the precious moment as it passes, to refuse this new-fangled federal government, and extricate yourselves and posterity from tyranny, oppression, aristocratical or monarchical government.

*See the history of the confederate Grecian States—Also the history of England, for the massacre of the people in the valley of Glenco, in the time of William the Third.

You, who have an opportunity of getting the news-papers, no doubt have 5.2.4
seen the farce and parade at Boston!—they adopted the federal government, and afterwards proposed amendments—let us be wiser—let us not adopt it until it is amended.—I revere the characters of some of the gentlemen that composed the convention at Philadelphia, yet I think they were human, and subject to imposition and error, as well as the rest of mankind.—You lost eight or ten years of your lives and labour by the last war, and were left at last with your debts and incumbrances on you, and numbers of you were soon after the close of it, sued and harrassed for them—your persons have been put into a loathsome prison, and others of you have had your property sold for taxes, and by your rapacious creditors, for one fourth, and sometimes for one tenth of its former and actual value; and you now pay very grievous and heavy taxes, double and treble what you paid before the war; and should you adopt this new government, your taxes will be greatly increased to support them, their officers, servants, and retainers, who will be multiplied upon you to keep you in obedience, and collect their duties, taxes, impositions, and excises. Some of you may say the rich men were virtuous in the last war; yes, my countrymen, they had reason then to be so! our liberty then was in dispute with a mighty and powerful tyrant, and it was for their interest to promote and carry on the opposition, as long as they could stay at home and send the common people into the field to fight their battles—After the war began, they could not with decency recede, for the sword and enemy were at the very entrance of their gates. The case is greatly altered now; you conquered the enemy, and the rich men now think to subdue you by their wiles and arts, or make you, or persuade you, to do it yourselves. Their aim, I perceive, is now to destroy that liberty which you set up as a reward for the blood and treasure you expended in the pursuit of and establishment of it. They well know that open force will not succeed at this time, and have chosen a safer method, by offering you a plan of a new Federal Government, contrived with great art, and shaded with obscurity, and recommended to you to adopt; which if you do, their scheme is compleated, the yoke is fixed on your necks, and you will be undone, perhaps for ever, and your boasted liberty is but a sound. Farewell!—be wise, be watchful, guard yourselves against the dangers that are concealed in this plan of a new Federal Government.

A Farmer and Planter.

1. The Federalist candidates were Charles Carroll, James Carroll, Brice Worthington, and John Hall. The election in Ann Arundel County was won by the Anti-Federalist slate consisting of Jeremiah T. Chase, John Francis Mercer, Benjamin Harrison, and Samuel Chase. See Steiner, American Historical Review October 1899, pp. 38, 42. See generally Philip A. Samuel Chase
Notes of Speeches Delivered to the Maryland Ratifying Convention

April 1788

The notes that follow were taken from the George Bancroft papers at the New York Public Library. They were copied in February 1877, from originals lent to Bancroft by Mrs. C. Chase Oldfield, granddaughter of Samuel Chase, and are thought to be notes of speeches delivered by Chase to the Maryland Convention in April 1788. Chase was an active revolutionary and signer of the Declaration of Independence. He was also a member of the Maryland ruling group and was instrumental in framing the state's high-toned constitution. He has had no full-length biography and remains a paradoxical figure who tended to combine distinguished public service and more or less disreputable behavior. Edward S. Corwin concluded, "His intellectual grasp is fully attested by his judicial opinions; his turbulent disposition appears at every turn in his career."[1] Upon receipt of the Constitution in Maryland, Chase temporized, apparently in recognition of strong Federalist opinion in Baltimore. He favored calling a convention but left his own opinion ambiguous. His only significant written contribution, a piece published in October and appropriately signed "Caution," argues against precipitation but not explicitly against the Constitution.[2]

The notes here are brief and give little indication of how Chase developed his arguments, but they are the only substantial reflection of the views of this important Anti-Federalist leader. In addition, the most interesting portion of the notes is a well developed argument on representation.

The notes are made up of distinct fragments, each of which is left intact here.[3] As there is no way of knowing how Chase used them, the fragments have been arranged here in what seems to be the overall order of the argument. The designations at the head of each fragment have been supplied by the editor.

I
The Constitutional Convention

5.3.1 Authority of Delegates to Convention.

Act of appointment.

No authority from legislature to annihilate Confederation and form a Constitution for the United States. Legislature could not grant such power. Deputies acted as mere individuals and not in official or delegated capacity. Express object of delegates to revise Confederacy.

5.3.2 Act done—a general or national government is formed—the separate sovereignty and independence of each state, and their union by a confederate league is destroyed and they are melted down and consolidated into one National Government. In Confederation—We the States—in Proposed Constitution—We the People—the first is a true federal government of states and has no power over the individual citizens of any of the states—the latter a national one by express compact of all the people; it establishes a supreme power over the individuals of the states.

It annuls the confederacy. See Art. 13.

It swallows up the state governments and state legislatures—it alters our Constitution and annuls our Bill of Rights in many of its most essential parts—How justify this Convention on the principles of Aristides—People no right to interfere, etc.

5.3.3 Aristides p. 9. Amendent in parliamentary language means striking out the whole. Convention has only advised—and so might an individual.[1]

Wilson—Convention did not act upon the powers given them by the States but they proceeded upon original principles—Independent Gazetteer, 29 Nov.[2]

McKean—State Convention no right to inquire into power of late convention, or to alter or amend their work. Sole question whether to ratify or reject the whole system.[3] Could convention lessen the rights of the people? their right to lessen never surrendered to Convention. People must have a right to judge of the Government proposed. No man can controvert the right of proposing amendments. Whether proper and necessary the only question. Aristides 30.[4]

1st. Question. Whether a federal or national government proper for America. S.C. [i.e. Samuel Chase] for the former. Because an extensive country (like United States) on democratical principles only by a Confederation of small republics exercising all the powers of internal government, but united by league as to their external foreign concerns.—A national or general government however constructed over so extensive a country as America must end in despotism.—If instituted on principles of freedom, not competent to the local wants and concerns of the remote parts of the empire. Montesquieu Vol. I. [Bk. VIII] ch. 16. Brutus No. 1. Cato No. 3.[5] 5.3.4

2nd Question—If national whether the one proposed ought to be ratified without any previous amendments. 1. The question is the most important that ever came before an assembly for decision. It involves the happiness or misery of millions yet unborn. The decision requires all the consideration that the utmost exertion of the powers of the mind can bestow. 5.3.5

The present and future generations will bless or execrate us. We [are] at a solemn crisis—and the magnitude of the subject requires that it should be deliberately considered and fully considered with temper and moderation.—[6] 5.3.6

II A
The Present Government of the U.S.: Excellence of State Governments[7]

I am a friend to our present state government because it is wisely calculated to secure all the civil and religious rights of the people and fully adequate for all internal state purposes, and our state Constitution and laws afford security to property and ample protection to the poor from abuse by the officers of our state government and from any oppression of the poor by the rich and powerful. There is no injury for which our present laws do not provide a remedy.—There are some few, and not very capital, defects in our form of Government and they may at any time be amended with prudence and sense without any division or commotion—in a word; We might be happy under our present state government, if we knew our own good, and would be contented. I am opposed—averse from the proposed national government, because it immediately takes away the power from our state legislature to 5.3.7

protect the personal liberty of the citizen, and I am convinced in my judgment that it will in a few years entirely absorb and swallow up the state legislature.

5.3.8 Our Bill of Rights which is part of our Constitution provides[8]—

Sect. 2. That the people of this state ought to have the sole and exclusive right of regulating the internal government and police thereof.

Sect. 3. That the inhabitants are entitled to the Trial by Jury according to the course of common law, not only in criminal cases but in all cases between Government and its officers—cause etc.

Sect. 17. Every freeman for any injury to person or property ought to have remedy by the law of the land.

Sect. 18. Trial of facts where they arise is one of the greatest securities of the lives, liberties and estate of the people.

Sect. 23. All warrants without oath to search, etc.

Sect. 13.—Laying taxes by the poll is grievous and oppressive and ought to be abolished.

Sect. 25. Militia proper and natural defence of a free government.

Sect. 26. Standing armies.—27.—28. No soldier to be quartered in any house in time of peace without the consent of the owner, and in time of war in such manner only as the legislature shall direct.

Sect. 38. The liberty of the press ought to be inviolably preserved.

Sect. 33. Securing religious rights of conscience.

By our present form of government, the legislature is not supreme but bound by the Constitution.

II B

The Present Government of the U.S.: Reform of the Articles of Confederation

5.3.9 The greatest happiness of a people is to govern themselves. Their greatest misery to be governed by others;—Our state government is fully competent to all internal state purposes.

For the safety and happiness of the people of this and the other states, external objects, or such for which the state governments are not competent are to be provided for.

5.3.10 1. To provide a form to regulate commerce among the states and to preserve peace between the states—resort against domestic enemies, with Indian tribes, and to coin money and to regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin and to fix the standard of weights and measures—to establish post offices and post roads—may be called a general internal or continental object.

2. To preserve all the states from injury or violence from the foreign powers of Europe and to shield them against foreign hostility may be called a general external or foreign object.

3. To regulate the trade of the States with foreigners, by Acts of Navigation and by treaties of Commerce with the powers of Europe may be also called a general external or foreign object.

I am for the establishment of power in Congress for all the above or similar purposes. 5.3.11

The 1st—to preserve peace between the states, etc. may be provided for without much difficulty (and about which there never has been nor can be much difference in opinion) by establishing a supreme power to decide all controversies between the states, to coin money, etc., etc. and by a Bill of Rights declaring what the states shall not do—as, e.g. not to enter into any treaty, keep troops, coin money, or do any of the above or other acts which the supreme power of all the states are authorized to do.

The 2nd—to preserve all the states etc.—This necessarily includes the power of war;—and the means to carry it on—i.e. to raise money, to maintain troops and to provide a navy.—and it includes the jurisdiction of piracies and felonies on the high seas and of all offences against the law of nations. This also includes the payment of the debt contracted by the United States.

This power is necessary, not immediately pressing—consider the situation of Confederation—but attended with some difficulty. It requires a legislative, an executive and a judicial authority. 5.3.12

Every legislative power should be vested in two, if not three Branches, and they ought to be the real, and not the fictitious representative of the people. Their numbers ought to be sufficient to know the wants and the wishes of those they represent—too numerous to be corrupted and not so great as to be a mob.

The Executive of the States ought to be in a Supreme Magistrate or president—ineligible after a limited time with a Council of short duration and responsible for their advice. 5.3.13

The Judicial should be confined to the decision of cases arising on treaties. [The clause "on treaties" is substituted for—"under the Constitution and laws"—erased] The great question is in what manner the legislative of the states shall raise taxes on the people of the several states.

I would not give this power only on default of a state to raise its quota as required. If neglected, I would authorise the legislative to lay and collect imposts and duties on tonnage without limitation, provided they be uniform in all the states; also taxes not exceeding limited sums on enumerated Articles of Exports, and stamp and post office duties. If they [be] not sufficient, an excise. Provided they be the same in all the states and that Congress officers be held to account for abuse of authority in the states. And if all [be] not sufficient, a tax on land not exceeding ½ d. per acre. 5.3.14

I would give the above power of taxation without requisition being first made to the states. It is difficult to say what taxes the legislative may lay, but some limitation is necessary.

5.3.15 The Third—to regulate trade—

I am against giving this power—but if it is given let it be to ⅔ of the Senate.

[Earlier in the original Ms. we find erased—"The 3d—to regulate trade, etc.—This I would agree to"—the sentence being left unfinished.]

III

The Tendency of the Constitution to Annihilate State Governments

5.3.16 The National Government will in its operation and effects annihilate the State Governments.

1. National Government has unlimited power, legislative, executive and judicial, as to every object to which it extends by the Constitution.

2. The powers of the National legislature extend to every case of the least consequence—it may make laws to affect the lives, liberty and property of every citizen in America, nor can the Constitution of any State prevent the Execution of any power given to the National legislature.

3. The National legislature may impose every species of taxes external and internal (except only on Exports) excise, land tax, poll tax, stamps etc. to any extent, and may raise and collect them as they please, without any previous requisition to the State legislatures who have nothing to say to the laws for imposing or collecting taxes—

4. The power to impose and collect taxes is the most important of all powers a people can grant—it absorbs all other powers—Maxim—Money finds Men (Troops) and Troops will find money—The power of taxation is the highest object of legislation—it is the necessary means of protection and safety to the people in a good government and it ever has been and will be the instrument of oppression and tyranny in a bad government.

5. No state can emit paper money—nor without consent of Congress lay any duties on Imports or Exports or Tonnage except for executing its inspection laws, and in such cases the net produce is for the use of the United States—Therefore no state can pay its debts—or support its government but only by direct taxes on Property—Congress can lay all indirect taxes, and also direct taxes when they exercise this power in all its extent. The state legislatures will find it impossible to raise money by direct taxes to pay their debts and support their governments—the consequence is certain—without money they will be as Congress is now,—without power, or respect and despised—they will sink to nothing, and be absorbed in the general government.—The people will not bear the expense of two governments. The state government may come in for some time to carry into execution the National Government—even this may be taken away. Art. 1. Sect. 4. See Aristides 37.[9] Impost 38.[10] Farmer's Letters 9. p. 37.[11] Will impost pay interest of national foreign and domestic debt and expenses of new government?

6. The power of the national legislature to raise troops in peace (as well as war) without any limitation as to number, or with consent of more than a Majority in Congress [I say not less than 9 of 13 and in same proportion] or a Majority of the state legislatures and to levy money for their support for two years—to control the Militia will also [? tend] to swallow up the state governments—

7. The supreme and inferior federal courts will have the same effect by absorbing the state courts—One must be in each state.

8. The power to make laws [Art. 1. Sect. 8]—e.g. The state lays a direct tax to pay its debts or to support its government—Congress thinks proper to lay tax on same property and as both cannot be paid cannot Congress repeal the State law, or will not their judges declare it void. Will not this conduct deprive the state of all support?

9. [8 repeated in orig.] The little power reserved to the states will be an object of jealousy to Congress. The whole Constitution breathes a jealousy of the states—its judges and juries. Truth confirmed by experience of ages that every individual, and all bodies of men invested with power, always attempt to increase it, and never part with any of it but by force. It is the very nature of man. The National government will possess this desire and having the means it will in time carry it into execution. I think the people themselves will assent and may be persuaded to call for the abolition of the state governments. It is at this moment the wish of many men in America and some in this state.

IV A
Objections to the New Government: General

I am opposed to the new Government;— 5.3.17

1. Because it gives Congress a power without any limitation to lay any kind of taxes that the invention of Man can suggest—indirect and direct. I particularly object to the power to lay taxes on our lands without any limitation and according to our numbers including 3/5 of our slaves. Also to an Excise and the power to excise officers to enter and search and no remedy by such in state courts—and Verdict by a Jury; as under the British government. Clayton's Rep. 44. Woman's shift.[12] Also to a poll tax which Congress is expressly authorized—Art. 1. Sect. 9.—to lay on all our whites and 3/5 of our slaves—the most fatal and oppressive of all taxes. N.B. A favorite tax with Congress and R.M. [i.e. Robt. Morris.]

2. Because Congress will have a right to keep any army in time of peace without number.

3. Because Congress will have a right to quarter soldiers in our private houses, not only in time of war, but also in time of peace. Bill of Rights 28.

4. Because Congress will have authority over our Militia, and may if they please, march any of them without regard to scruples of conscience against bearing arms, to any part of the United States.

5. Because the inferior federal courts will have the exclusive jurisdiction—Art. 3. Sect. 2 of every controversy between the citizens of the different States—and no trial by Jury. Blackstone 3. c. 33.

6. Because these courts will have the same jurisdiction in controversies between our citizens and subjects of Great Britain or any other foreign state—Tobacco shipped. N.B. An appeal in both cases.

7. Because the Senators or Representatives may be appointed to civil offices under the United States not created or the emoluments increased during the time for which he was elected.

8. Because Congress are to ascertain their own salaries. Art. 1. Sect. 6.

9. Because the Senate are too few in number—only two from each state. 26 at present—a Majority, a Quorum—14—ergo 8 may make a law—liable to corruption—France, Great Britain.

10. Because the Senate are a perpetual body and never die a civil death, although 1/3 is to be chosen every second year—because after first six years there will always be 2/3 of the body in existence—1/3 of which 2/3 will always have served two years and other four years and after first rotation every Senator may serve 6 years.

11. Because 2/3 of the Senate present and the president may make treaties of commerce, and the treaties are to be the supreme laws of the land.

12. Because the Representatives are too few in number—1 for 30,000—whites and 3/5 slaves—65 at present—a majority, a quorum 33.—ergo 17 may make a law—liable to corruption.

13. The House of Representatives will not be chosen by the people. Art. 1. Sect. 2.

Maryland is to choose 6 representatives—Every person qualified to elect members to our House of Delegates to be entitled to vote—our legislature is to prescribe the time, place and manner of electing representatives. Art. 1. Sect. 4—Either the people at large of the whole state must choose the six representatives—or the state must be divided into six districts—say 2 on Eastern and 4 on Western shore.

14. Because Congress may alter the time, place and manner of choosing representatives. Art. 1. Sect. 4. proceedings Boston 47–51.[13]

15. Because Congress may alter the time and manner of choosing Senators—the place where is not to be altered.

N.B. Treaties supreme law—Sect. 6.

See Aristides p. 11.[14]

Massachusetts propose to restrict this power to cases expressed.

16. Because the president will not be chosen by the people immediately—that is by electors chosen by the people—as pretended. Art. 2. Sect. 2. The legislature are to direct who are to be electors, but the number is fixed to be equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives—e.g. in this state 8—in all 91. Congress are to determine the time of choosing electors and the day on which they shall elect the president which shall be the same day in all the states.

The electors are to choose by ballot two persons. The person having a majority of all the electors to be president and if no person has a majority—which is most improbable, except in first instance then from the five highest on the list the House of Representatives to choose the President—each State to have a vote.

17. Because the powers of the President are dangerous. Power of nominating to office. Of pardoning before conviction.

18. Because he is eligible for life and he ought to be ineligible after a given number of years.

19. Because the Judicial Power extends to controversies between citizens of different states and between citizens of the states and subjects of foreign states and in such cases the trial by Jury is taken away.

20. It is said by the advocates for the new government that we are without a government. Ans. They mean a general or national government—not a state government. The former is wanted to make the states do their duty, and pay their Quota to discharge the debt contracted during the war—and to protect the states against the Powers of Europe [There is a power to decide differences between the States in the Federal Congress] and to regulate trade—If admitted—yet no necessity much less wisdom to do more than is necessary to answer these objects—powers for these purposes can be given without surrendering up our liberties.

21. The new government will take the burthen from the farmer and planter, and the poor people and place it on trade—because duties on imports and tax on Excise will be adopted. Ans. Why cannot state governments do the same?—In truth it is only changing in part the mode of taxation—Explain it. Why poll tax is not for the benefit of the poor.

22. Regulations of trade and treaties of commerce will bring in money—employ our Merchants—shipbuilders. Ans. if true, give those powers but not those granted.

23. The people can't be worse. Ans. Why are they distressed?—many from their private debts—some from taxes—all from the scarcity of money. Will new government pay private debts? Will it lessen taxes? It will make our Continental debt specie—it is now at 8 for 1. £200,000 would pay the proportion of this state—it was proposed by an emission—Consider the Expenses of National government.

24. The government is calculated for a few rich and ambitious men—and speculators in certificates—

25. Merchants are for it. Ans. consider them. Birds of passage.

26. General Washington et al. for it.

27. May amend afterwards. Ans. The amendments proposed prove that these are capital defects. Should amend before adoption—1. because it is easy to grant and very difficult to recall power which from its nature is ever encroaching. 2. No wise people ever gave power over their liberties with a view of getting back the power. 3. It is now in the power of five states to obtain amendments—afterwards there must be nine.—4. a bad government becomes more feared every day by its officers. 5. why not another convention? Who is violent for it—Ans. Rich Men and speculators and office hunters.

Call on friends to give reasons for new government.

[On the margin of this paper the following:]—why call on people at large? Haste—no delay—Senate for Jany.—

IV B

Objections to the New Government: Expense

5.3.18 Expense of National Government.

Civil List—President—Vice-President—Senators—Representatives—Ambassadors—Judicial Department—Judges, Justices, Chanellor, Clerks, Sheriffs, Excise officers, Naval officers—Locusts—Policy to institute a number of lucrative new offices to increase their influence in the States—Army will provide for many expectants.

IV C

Objections to the New Government: Libery of the Press

Liberty of Conscience—Old Whig No 5-4.[15] Brutus No 2[16]

Bill or Declaration of Rights.

Liberty of Press.

5.3.19 1. The Constitution gives no power to Congress express or implied to abridge or take away the liberty of the press.

2. Art. 1. Sect. 8. Congress have power to promote Science and it is impossible to promote Science and at same time destroy the liberty of the press—under this clause may write what they please about Government. There is no Bill or Declaration of Rights to restrain Congress—They will have the power and it remains in their discretion when they will exercise it.

V
Representation

Representation. 5.3.20

1. A fact—the continent will be governed by 65. Six northern states—35-seven southern states—30.

2. I do not object that the states have not an equal representation in the second branch or House of Representatives.

3. I object because the representatives will not be the representatives of the people at large but really of a few rich men in each state.[17] A representative should be the image of those he represents. He should know their sentiments and their wants and desires—he should possess their feelings—he should be governed by their interests with which his own should be inseparably connected. The representatives of so extensive a country—consequently such numbers should be numerous.—A few men cannot possibly represent the opinions, wishes, and interests of great numbers. It is impossible for a few men to be acquainted with the sentiments and interests of the United States, which contains many different classes or orders of people—Merchants, farmers, planters, mechanics and gentry or wealthy men. To form a proper and true representation each order ought to have an opportunity of choosing from each a person as their representative; this is impossible from the smallness of the number—65. Can six men be found in Maryland who understand the interests of the several orders of men in this state and are acquainted with their situation, wants and would act with a proper sense and zeal to promote their prosperity—If such could be found will they be chosen by the people? No—but few of the Merchants and those only of the opulent and ambitious will stand any chance. The great body of farmers and planters cannot expect any of their order—the station is too elevated for them to aspire to—the distance between the people and their representatives will be so very great that there is no probability of a farmer or planter being chosen.—Mechanics of every branch will be excluded by a general voice from a seat—only the gentry, the rich and well born will be elected. Wealth creates power—the wealthy always have a number of dependents—they always favor each other—it is their interest to combine and they will consequently always unite their efforts to procure those of their own order or rank to be elected and they will generally succeed. The station is too high and elevated to be filled but by the first men in the state in point of fortune and influence. In fact no order or class of the people will be represented in the House of Representatives—called the Democratic branch—but the rich and wealthy. They will be ignorant of the sentiments of the middling [and much more of the lower] class of citizens, strangers to their ability, unacquainted with their wants, difficulties and distress and need of sympathy and fellow feeling.

4. The numbers are too few. It is to consist at first of 65—and cannot exceed 1 for 30,000 inhabitants—whites and 3/5 slaves—a majority, a quorum 33—ergo 17 may make a law—liable to bribery and corruption. G.B. and F. [i.e. Great Britain and France] will endeavor to obtain an influence to procure treaties of commerce, and alliances offensive and defensive—they will practice the means—Holland is a proof.

This objection applies to the Senate—at first 26—14 a majority—8 may make a law—liable to same bribery and corruption. Madness to vest 25 men with absolute power—no free people ever reposed power in so small a number. The Executive will corrupt them—they are not excluded from office.

The last House of Commons above 500 members. Number of inhabitants about 8 millions—1 for little above 14,000—The numbers in the Democratic branches in 13 states amount to 2,000. The numbers should be too great to be corrupted and not so great as to be a mob.

[5.] The House of Representatives will not be chosen by the people.

Art. 1. Sect. 2.

Maryland is to choose 6 representatives—every person qualified to elect members of our House of Delegates is to be entitled to vote. Our legislature is to prescribe the time, place and manner of electing representatives. Art. 1. Sect. 4. Aristides 9.[18] Either the people at large of the whole state must choose the six representatives, or the state must be divided into six Districts for each to elect one man.—Say 2 on Eastern and 4 on Western shore.

If the whole people choose they will meet in their counties on the same day; this is proposed by some—consider such an election.

If in districts the inconvenience—and the last who vote will elect—and choice like as if all chose. Suppose our delegates chosen in this manner. On the whole I am convinced, 1st That the representation will be merely nominal from the persons and the numbers elected; 2nd That the right of electing is nugatory and cannot be effectually exercised—it is only a fallacious participation by the people at large in the national legislature.

6. There is no security even for this nugatory right.

7. I have said the Senate are too few in number.

8. The Senate are a perpetual body and never die a civil death (as in this State) although 1/3 is to be chosen every second year, because after the first six years there will always be 2/3 of the body in existence—1/3 of which 2/3 will always have served 2 years; and the other 1/3 will have served 4 years and after the first rotation every Senator may serve six years.—The body is permanent—will act by system—1/3 at end of every second year may be different men if legislature pleases.

9. In classing, the Senator who pleases will not be put in the class to go out before six years. Vide Boston Debates. 73.[19]

   1. People will not choose representatives.
   2. Congress to alter place!
   Senate—never heard of the resolve of Senate. Resolves of Senate adopted before those of House of Delegates.
   3rd Wednesday of January—Election
   1st Monday in March—proposed an earlier day of meeting.

Address of a Minority of the Maryland Ratifying Convention

(BALTIMORE) MARYLAND GAZETTE
6 May 1788

The following address of a minority of the Maryland Convention contains, in addition to an account of the Maryland ratifying proceedings, two lists of proposed amendments. The first group, agreed to by a committee appointed for the purpose of considering amendments, was aimed at preserving the trial by jury, explicitly giving state courts concurrent jurisdiction and limiting the jurisdiction of federal courts, forbidding the use of general warrants, limiting the power of the federal government over the army and militia, and preserving the liberty of the press. The second group contained more stringent restrictions, for example, on the military and taxing powers of the federal government, and these were rejected by a majority of the committee. An attempt by the minority to get majority support for certain of the rejected amendments in return for a promise to support the Constitution was brushed aside, the majority deciding finally to recommend no amendments to the convention. A reply on behalf of the majority was prepared by Alexander C. Hanson, but it was not published.[1]

1. See Steiner, American Historical Review January 1900, p. 207 n.1; the report, enclosed with a letter to Madison, can be found in Documentary History of the Constitution IV. 645–64.

To the People of Maryland.

5.4.1 The following facts, disclosing the conduct of the late convention of Maryland, is submitted to the serious consideration of the citizens of the state.[1]

On Monday, the 21st of April, the convention met in Annapolis, and elected the Hon. George Plater, Esq. president. On Tuesday they established rules for the conduct of the business; and on the same day the following question was propounded to the convention:—

"When a motion is made and seconded, the matter of the motion shall receive a determination by the question, or be postponed by general consent, or the previous question, before any other motion shall be received."

And the following question, viz.

"Every question shall be entered on the journal, and the yeas and nays may be called for by any member on any question, and the name of the member requiring them shall be entered on the journal."

Which two questions the convention determined in the negative.

On Wednesday, the proposed plan of government was read the first time, and thereupon it was resolved, "That this convention will not enter into any resolution upon any particular part of the proposed plan of federal government, for the United States, but that the whole thereof shall be read through a second time, after which the subject may be fully debated and considered, and then the president shall put the question, That this convention do assent to and ratify the same constitution? On which question the yeas and nays shall be taken." 5.4.2

On Thursday, the members who were opposed to the ratification of the constitution, without such previous amendments could be obtained as they thought essentially necessary to secure the liberty and happiness of the people (being confined by the last resolution to consider in one view the whole of the plan of government) stated some of their objections to the constitution.—The convention met in the evening, when Mr. Paca, member from Harford, having just taken his seat, rose and informed the president, that he had great objection to the constitution proposed, in its present form, and meant to propose a variety of amendments, not to prevent, but to accompany, the ratification, but, having just arrived, he was not ready to lay them before the house, and requested indulgence until the morning for that purpose.—The proposal being seconded, and the house asked if they would give the indulgence, it was granted without a division, and they adjourned for that purpose.[2]—On Friday, at the meeting of the house, Mr. Paca rose and informed the president, that, in consequence of the permission of the house given him the preceding evening, he had prepared certain amendments, which he would read in his place and then lay on the table, when he was interrupted, and one member from each of the following counties, viz Frederick, Talbot, Charles, Kent, Somerset, Prince-George's, Worcester, Queen-Anne's, Corchester, Calvert and Caroline, and one member from the *city of Annapolis, and one from Baltimore-Town, arose in their places, and declared for themselves and their colleagues, "that they were elected and INSTRUCTED by the people they represented, to ratify the proposed constitution, and that as speedily as possible, and to do no other act; that after the ratification their power ceased, and they did not consider themselves as authorised by their constituents to consider any amendments."—After this 5.4.3

*The member from the city of Annapolis, did not give it as his opinion that he was not at liberty to consider amendments, but said he had consulted his colleague, and that his colleague had informed him, the citizens were against amendments.[3]

Mr. Paca was not permitted even to read his amendments.—The opponents continued to make their objections to the constitution until Saturday noon. The advocates of the government, although repeatedly called on, and earnestly requested, to answer the objections, if not just, remained inflexibly silent,[4] and called for the question, that "the convention assent to and ratify the proposed plan of federal government for the United States?" Which was carried in the affirmative by 63 to 11.

5.4.4 The vote of ratification having thus passed, Mr. Paca again arose and laid before the convention his propositions for amending the constitution thus adopted; which he had prepared by leave of the house, declaring that he had only given his assent to the government under the firm persuasion, and in full confidence, that such amendments would be peaceably obtained, as to enable the people to live happy under the government;—that the people of the county he represented, and that he himself, would support the government with such amendments, but without them, not a man in the State, and no people, would be more firmly opposed to it than himself and those he represented. Sentiments highly favourable to amendments were expressed, and a general murmur of approbation seemed to arise from all parts of the house, expressive of a desire to consider amendments, either in their characters as members of convention, or in their individual capacities as citizens;[5] and the question was put on the following motion:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take into consideration and report to this house on Monday morning next, a draught of such amendments and alterations as may be thought necessary, in the proposed constitution for the United States, if approved of by this convention; and Mr. Paca, Mr. Johnson, Mr. S. Chase, Mr. Potts, Mr. Mercer, Mr. Goldsborough, Mr. J. Tilghman, Mr. Hanson, Mr. J. T. Chase, Mr. Lee, Mr. W. Tilghman, Mr. McHenry and Mr. G. Gale, were appointed a committee for that purpose."

A division was called for on this resolution, when there appeared 66 members for, and not more than 7 against, it.

5.4.5 And then it was resolved, "That the amendments proposed to the constitution by the delegate from Harford-county, should be referred to the above committee."

The committee thus appointed, and the convention adjourned to give them time to prepare their propositions; they proceeded with every appearance of unanimity to execute the trust reposed in them.

5.4.6 The following amendments for the proposed constitution were separately agreed to by the committee, most of them by an unanimous vote, and all of them by a great majority:[6]

1. That Congress shall exercise no power but what is expressly delegated by this constitution.

By this amendment, the general powers given to Congress, by the first and last paragraphs of the 8th sect. of art. 1, and the second paragraph of the 6th article, would be in a great measure restrained: those dangerous expressions by which the bills of rights and constitutions of the several states may be repealed by the laws of Congress, in some degree moderated, and the exercise of constructive powers wholly prevented.

2. That there shall be a trial by jury in all criminal cases, according to the course of proceeding in the state where the offence is committed; and that there be no appeal from matter of fact, or second trial after acquittal; but this provision shall not extend to such cases as may arise in the government of the land or naval forces.

3. That in all actions on debts or contracts, and in all other controversies respecting property, of which the inferior federal courts have jurisdiction, the trial of facts shall be by jury, if required by either party; and that it be expressly declared, that the State courts, in such cases, have a concurrent jurisdiction with the federal courts, with an appeal from either, only as to matter of law, to the supreme federal court, if the matter in dispute be of the value of dollars.

4. That the inferior federal courts shall not have jurisdiction of less than dollars; and there may be an appeal in all cases of revenue, as well to matter of fact as law, and Congress may give the State courts jurisdiction of revenue cases, for such sums, and in such manner, as they may think proper.

5. That in all cases of trespasses done within the body of a county, and within the inferior federal jurisdiction, the party injured shall be entitled to trial by jury in the State where the injury shall be committed; and that it be expressly declared, that the State courts, in such cases, shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the federal courts; and there shall be no appeal from either, except on matter of law; and that no person be exempt from such jurisdiction and trial but ambassadors and ministers privileged by the law of nations.

6. That the federal courts shall not be entitled to jurisdiction by fictions or collusion.

7. That the federal judges do not hold any other office of profit, or receive the profits of any other office under Congress, during the time they hold their commission.

The great objects of these amendments were, 1st. To secure the trial by jury in all cases, the boasted birth-right of Englishmen, and their descendants, and the palladium of civil liberty; and to prevent the appeal from fact, which not only destroys that trial in civil cases, but by construction, may also exclude it in criminal cases; a mode of proceeding both expensive and burthensome; and also by blending law with fact, will destroy all check on the judiciary authority, render it almost impossible to convict judges of corruption, and may lay the foundation of that gradual and silent attack on individuals, by which the approaches of tyranny become irresistable. 2d. To give a concurrent jurisdiction to the State courts, in order that Congress may not be compelled, as they will be under the present form, to establish inferior federal courts, which if not numerous will be inconvenient, and if numerous very expensive; the circumstances of the people being unequal to the increased expence of double courts, and double officers; an arrangement that will render the law so complicated and confused, that few men can know how to conduct themselves with safety to their persons or property, the great and only security of freemen. 3dly, To give such jurisdiction to the State courts, that transient foreigners, and persons from other States, committing injuries in this State, may be amenable to the State, whose laws they violate, and whose citizens they injure. 4thly, To prevent an extension of the federal jurisdiction, which may, and in all probability will, swallow up the State jurisdictions, and consequently sap those rules of descent and regulations of personal property, by which men now hold their estates; and lastly, To secure the independence of the federal judges, to whom the happiness of the people of this great continent will be so greatly committed by the extensive powers assigned them.

8. That all warrants without oath, or affirmation of a person conscientiously scrupulous of taking an oath, to search suspected places, or to seize any person or his property, are grievous and oppressive; and all general warrants to search suspected places, or to apprehend any person suspected, without naming or describing the place or person in special, are dangerous, and ought not to be granted.

This amendment was considered indispensible by many of the committee, for Congress having the power of laying excises, the horror of a free people, by which our dwelling-houses, those castles considered so sacred by the English law, will be laid open to the insolence and oppression of office, there could be no constitutional check provided, that would prove so effectual a safeguard to our citizens. General warrants too, the great engine by which power may destroy those individuals who resist usurpation, are also hereby forbid to those magistrates who are to administer the general government.

9. That no soldier be enlisted for a longer time than four years except in time of war, and then only during the war.

10. That soldiers be not quartered in time of peace upon private houses, without the consent of the owners.

11. That no mutiny bill continue in force longer than two years.

These were the only checks that could be obtained against the unlimited power of raising and regulating standing armies, the natural enemies to freedom, and even with these restrictions, the new Congress will not be under such constitutional restraints as the parliament of Great-Britain; restraints which our ancestors have bled to establish, and which have hitherto preserved the liberty of their posterity.

12. That the freedom of the press be inviolably preserved.

In prosecutions in the federal courts for libels, the constitutional preservation of this great and fundamental right, may prove invaluable.

13. That the militia shall not be subject to martial law, except in time of war, invasion or rebellion.

This provision to restrain the powers of Congress over the militia, although by no means so ample as that provided by magna charta, and the other fundamental constitutional laws of Great-Britain, (it being contrary to magna charta to punish a freeman by martial law in time of peace, and murder to execute him,) yet it may prove an inestimable check; for all other provisions in favour of the rights of men, would be vain and nugatory, if the power of subjecting all men able to bear arms to martial law at any moment, should remain vested in Congress.

Thus far the amendments were agreed to.

The following amendments were laid before the committee, and negatived by a majority. 5.4.7

1. That the militia, unless selected by lot, or voluntarily enlisted, shall not be marched beyond the limits of an adjoining State, without the consent of their legislature or executive.

2. That Congress shall have no power to alter or change the time, place or manner, of holding elections for senators or representatives, unless a State shall neglect to make regulations, or to execute its regulations, or shall be prevented by invasion or rebellion; in which cases only Congress may interfere, until the cause be removed.

3. That, in every law of Congress imposing direct taxes, the collection thereof shall be suspended for a reasonable certain time therein limited, and on payment of the sum by any State, by the time appointed, such taxes shall not be collected.

4. That no standing army shall be kept up in time of peace, unless with the consent of two thirds of the members present of each branch of Congress.

5. That the president shall not command the army in person, without the consent of Congress.

6. That no treaty shall be effectual to repeal or abrogate the constitutions or bills of rights of the States, or any part of them.

7. That no regulation of commerce, or navigation act, shall be made, unless with the consent of two thirds of the members of each branch of Congress.

8. That no member of Congress shall be eligible to any office of profit under Congress during the time for which he shall be appointed.

9. That Congress shall have no power to lay a poll-tax.

10. That no person, conscientiously scrupulous of bearing arms in any case, shall be compelled personally to serve as a soldier.

11. That there be a responsible council to the president.

12. That there be no national religion established by law, but that all persons be equally entitled to protection in their religious liberty.

13. That all imposts and duties laid by Congress shall be placed to the credit of the State in which the same be collected, and shall be deducted out of such State's quota of the common or general expences of government.

14. That every man hath a right to petition the legislature for the redress of grievances in a peaceable and orderly manner.

15. That it be declared, that all persons intrusted with the legislative or executive powers of government are the trustees and servants of the public, and as such accountable for their conduct. Wherefore, whenever the ends of government are perverted, and public liberty manifestly endangered, and all other means of redress are ineffectual, the people may, and of right ought, to reform the old, or establish a new government; the doctrine of non-resistance against arbitrary power and oppression, is absurd, slavish, and destructive of the good and happiness of mankind.

5.4.8 The committee having proceeded thus far, all the members who voted for the ratification declared, that they would engage themselves under every tie of honour to support the amendments they had agreed to, both in their public and private characters, until they should become a part of the general government; but a great majority of them insisted on this express condition, that none of the propositions rejected, or any others, should be laid before the convention for their consideration, except those the committee had so agreed to.[7]

5.4.9 The gentlemen of the minority, who had made the propositions which had been rejected, reduced to the necessity of accommodating their sentiments to the majority, through fear of obtaining no security whatever for the people—notwithstanding they considered all the amendments as highly important to the welfare and happiness of the citizens of the States, yet to conciliate, they agreed to confine themselves to the first three of those propositions, and solemnly declared and pledged themselves, that if these were added, and supported by the other gentlemen, they would not only cease to oppose the government, but give all their assistance to carry it into execution so amended. Finally, they only required liberty to take the sense of the convention on the three first propositions, agreeing that they would hold themselves bound by the decision of a majority of that body.

5.4.10 The first of these objections concerning the militia they considered as essential, for to march beyond the limits of a neighbouring State, the general militia, who consist of so many poor people that can illy be spared from their families and domestic concerns, by power of Congress, who could know nothing of their circumstances, without consent of their own legislature or executive, ought to be restrained.

The second objection respecting the power of Congress to alter elections, they thought indispensible. Montesquieu says, that the rights of election should be established unalterably by fundamental laws in a free government.[8]

The third objection concerning previous requisition, they conceived highly important; they thought if money required by direct taxation could be paid with certainty and in due time to Congress, that every good consequence would be secured to the union, and the people of the State thereby relieved from the great inconvenience and expence of a double collection and a double set of tax-gatherers, and they might also get rid of those odious taxes by exise and poll, without injury to the general government.

They were, however, again proposed and rejected.

AFFIRMATIVE, Mr. Paca, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Mercer, Mr. J. T. Chase, Mr. S. Chase.

NEGATIVE, Mr. Lee, Mr. Potts, Mr. Goldsborough, Mr. J. Tilghman, Mr. W. Tilghman, Mr. Hanson, Mr. G. Gale, Mr. McHenry.

Previous to this, a motion was made on Monday the twenty-eighth, in the convention, while the committee were sitting, in the following words, to wit:

"Resolved, that this convention will consider of no propositions for amendment of the federal government, except such as shall be submitted to them by the committee of thirteen."

The committee being sent for by the convention, the gentlemen of the majority in committee then determined, that they would make no report of any amendments whatever, not even of those which they had almost unanimously agreed to, and the committee, under these circumstances, attended the house. Mr. Paca, as chairman, stated to the convention what had passed in the committee, read the amendments which had there been agreed to, and assigned the reason why no report had been formally made. A member then rose and proposed a vote of thanks to the president, which had been once read before the attendance of the committee, should have a second reading; and upon the second reading thereof, the previous question was called for by the members, who wished to consider the amendments agreed to by the committee, and such other amendments as might be proposed. The house thereupon divided, and the yeas and nays were called for by the minority, the sense of the convention was taken thereon, and a majority determined that the yeas and nays should not be taken, nor would they permit the vote to be entered on the journal, by which the yeas and nays were prohibited: 5.4.11

To preclude the consideration of any amendments.

A motion was then made "that the convention adjourn without delay," on which the yeas and nays were taken and appeared as follow:

AFFIRMATIVE. The Honorable the President, Messrs. Barnes, Chilton, Sewell, W. Tilghman, Yates, Granger, Chesley, Smith, Brown, Turner, Stone, Goldborough, Stevens, G. Gale, Waggaman, Stewart, J. Gale, Sulivane, Shaw, Gilpin, Hollingsworth, Heron, Evans, O. Sprigg, Hall, Digges, Hanson, J. Tilghman, Hollyday, Hemsley, Morris, Lee, Potts, Faw, J. Richardson, Edmondson, M'Henry, Coulter, T. Sprigg, Stull, Rawlings, Shyrock, Cramphin, Thomas, Deakins, Edwards. 47

NEGATIVE. Messrs. Perkins, J. T. Chase, S. Chase, Mercer, Harrison, Wilkinson, Grahame, Parnham, Ridgely, Cockey, Cromwell, Lloyd, Hammond, Bowie, Carroll, Seney, Chaille, Martin, Done, Johnson, Paca, Love, Pinkney, L. Martin, W. Richardson and Driver. 27

We consider the proposed form of national government as very defective, and that the liberty and happiness of the people will be endangered if the system be not greatly changed and altered. The amendments agreed to by 5.4.12

the committee, and those proposed by the minority, are now laid before you for your consideration, that you may express your sense as to such alterations as you may think proper to be made in the new constitution.

We remain persuaded, that the importance of the alterations proposed, calculated to preserve public liberty, by those checks on power which the experience of ages has rendered venerable, and to promote the happiness of the people by a due attention to their ease and convenience, will justify the steps we have taken to obtain them, to our constituents, and the world.

5.4.13 Having no interest that can distinguish us from the rest of the community, we neither fear censure, nor wish applause. Having thus discharged the duty of citizens and trustees of the public, we shall now submit to the people those precautions and securities which, after mature reflection on this momentous subject, we deem necessary for their safety and happiness.

May that all-wise and omnipotent Being, who made us masters of a fair and fruitful empire, inspire us with wisdom and fortitude to perpetuate to posterity that freedom which we received from our fathers!

Address by John Francis Mercer

April or May 1788

This address was intended to explain to the New York and the Virginia conventions the reason for the action of the Maryland convention in ratifying the Constitution without proposing amendments.[1] The Address was never printed and may not have been finished or sent. It is printed here from manuscripts, in Mercer's hand, in the Etting Collection of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania.[2] The two portions appear to have been written at different times, and they may have been parts of a larger piece. They were probably written in late April or early May 1788, shortly after the conclusion of the Maryland ratifying convention proceedings.

Mercer argues that the initial enthusiasm for the Constitution made it seem prudent to postpone agitation for amendments to a more favorable season but that the citizens of Maryland now definitely favor amendments. The widespread uncritical acceptance of the Constitution shows how difficult it is to preserve mild and free governments in the face of usurpations by the few. The first portion of the Address concludes with an interesting discussion of representation, which, in so large an area, leads either to the representatives pursuing (or pretending to pursue) the general interest and thus masking their responsibility to their constituents, or pursuing the interests of their districts and thus tending to throw the burdens of government on the minority (5.5.5–6).

The second portion of the Address draws a contrast between the stable mixed government of Britain and its weak imitation in the Constitution. Mercer criticizes the great powers of the proposed general government and the weakness of the states. Nor is it sufficient to reply that the government represents the people. Except when closely checked by the people or by a hereditary nobility, representative government "is really only a scene of perpetual rapine and confusion—and even with the best checks it has failed in all the Governments of Europe, of which it was once the basis, except that of England" (5.5.11). The argument here is similar to that presented by A [Maryland] Farmer (5.1 above), which Mercer probably wrote and with which it should be compared.[3]

1. There is some confusion over the attribution of these pieces to John Francis Mercer. They are filed in the Pennsylvania Historical Society with the papers of John Francis Mercer, and the hand appears to be his. The confusion arises from the subsequent attempt of someone (clearly not the original writer) to identify the writer(s). The first segment carries the endorsement, "James Mercer?" but this half-brother of John Francis Mercer, a Virginia judge, does not appear to have taken part in the ratification controversy. The second segment is endorsed at one place, "John Fenton Mercer" at another, "Mercer, Jo Francis." The former is clearly in error, this half-brother of John Francis Mercer having died in 1756. Both Jackson Turner Main and Morton Borden, who prints the second segment of the address, accept without question John Francis Mercer's authorship. Main, Antifederalists 158, 175; Borden, The Antifederalist Papers 175–77.

2. Lines and words crossed out by the writer have not been included. An attempt has been made to follow Mercer's punctuation and capitalization, but there is little consistency and the manuscript is often unclear.

To the Members of the Conventions of New York and Virginia—

Gentlemen

5.5.1 The galling Chains of Despotizm under the oppressive weight of which nine tenths of our Fellow Mortals groan—the Tortures which unfeeling Tyranny has invented and fearlessly practized in every Age and every Clime, are melancholy and terrifying proofs of the Incapacity of the many to defend those rights, which God and Nature gave them, from the artful and unceasing usurpations of the Few:—and they are frightful Lessons to teach us a watchful Jealousy of great and unnecessary Grants of Power and of Changes in a State of Society which we know to be mild and free—Still there are moments of national Languor and Lethargy which the Ambitious [,] ever enterprizing [,] mark with Alacrity and use with Success.—The People long unaccustomed in a good and guarded Government, to bold and selfish Designs in their Rulers, look up with an unsuspicious Confidence, to any alteration, which those entrusted with Power may propose—however unconstitutional the changes, if recommended by Men used to govern them, they seem to come forward under the Sanction of legal authority—if prepared in Secrecy—the public mind taken by surprize, and every Engine previously set in Motion—the unconcerted and unconnected Defence of Individuals is branded with the opprobrious Epithet of Opposition and overwhelmed in the directed Tide of popular Clamour—a clamour which a Number of wealthy Men may at all Times command at a small Expence from the most indigent of the Populace.[1]

5.5.2 We forbear to remark on the Manner in which the Constitution proposed for the United States came forward—as the Circumstances are known to you, your own Feelings will render any Observations unnecessary.

The Object of our present Address is to prevent your forming unjust Conclusions from the Adoption of the Constitution in the State of Maryland by so large a Majority of the Convention and the subsequent dissolution of that Body, without proposing any Amendments.[2]—

Permit us to assure You that the Torrent which burst forth at the Birth of 5.5.3
the Constitution had but little Effect on the Minds of many of us—and altho' it might prevent our having that weight with our Countrymen, in the first Paroxisms of Phrenzy which forever accompany great and sudden Revolutions in Government—we were yet determined not to be wanting in our Duty to the Republic, at that Moment when Reason should resume her Empire over the unagitated Minds of our fellow Citizens—from many Circumstances we despaired of this in Maryland untill the adoption of the Constitution—At that Period, when our Efforts could not be subjected to Calumniating Misrepresentation,—we expected that an Appeal to the reflection of our Countrymen, would be listened to with attention and produce those Effects which unanswered and unanswerable Reasons ought to command—All opposition being thus postponed and every necessary Step to inform the minds of our Citizens on one Side neglected—while unremitting Exertions by a Number of wealthy and respectable Characters were continued on the other—it cannot be surprizing that the Elections were generally favorable to the Constitution—In a very few of the Counties did any Candidates propose themselves against it—very few voted and even in those Counties where the Opposition succeeded by such a decided Majority—those Gentlemen's offering was merely accidental. They had refused every Solicitation of the People and had actually determined not to serve in Convention until within 6 Days before the Election—

That the People of the State would have made alterations and amend- 5.5.4
ments a Condition of Adoption, is a Question which from the above Circumstances it is impossible to decide—but that four fifths of the people of Maryland are now in favor of considerable Alterations and Amendments, and will insist on them,—we dont hesitate to declare (as our Opinion) to You and the world.—The difference between amending before or after adoption (provided it is amended) is certainly not worth a Distinction.—

We are persuaded that the People of so large a Continent, so different in 5.5.5
Interests, so distinct in Habits, cannot in all cases legislate in one Body by themselves or their Representatives—By themselves it is obviously impracticable—By their Representatives it will be found on Investigation equally so—for if these representatives are to pursue the general Interest without Constitutional checks and restraints—it must be done by a mutual Sacrifice of the Interests, wishes and prejudices of the parts they represent—and then they cannot be said to represent those Parts, but to misrepresent them.[3]—Besides as their Constituents cannot judge of their Conduct by their own Sense of what is right and proper—and as a representative can always in this view screen his abuse of Trust under the Cloak of Compromize, we do not see what check can remain in the Hands of the Constituents—for they cannot Know how far the Compromise was necessary, and the representative wrong—and to turn out and disgrace a Man when they cannot prove him wrong, and when he will have of Course the voice of the Body he is a Member of in his Favor, would in the Event be found subversive of the Principles of good Government.—

5.5.6 Thus then the pursuit of the general Interest produces an unchecked Misrepresentation—but if Representatives are to pursue the partial Interests of the Districts they represent (which to recommend themselves to their Constituents it is most probable they will do) then the Majority must ruin the Minority, for the Majority will be found interested to throw the Burthens of Government upon that Minority which in these States present a fair Opening by difference of Cultivation—Importation and property—In such extensive Territories governed by one Legislature, the Experience of Mankind tells us that if not by Preference the People will at least be led gradually to confide the legislative Power to the Hands of one Man and his Family—who alone can represent the whole, without partial Interests[—]and this is or leads to unlimited Despotizm—

5.5.7 We have not that permanent and fixed distinction of ranks or orders of Men among us, which unalterably seperating the interests and views, produces that division in pursuits, which is the great security of the mixed Government we seperated from, and which we now seem so anxiously to copy;[4]—[I]f the New Senate of the United States will be really opposite in their pursuits and views from the Representatives, have they not a most dangerous power, of interesting foreign Nations by Treaty to support their views?—for instance the relinquishment of the navigation of Missisippi—And yet these Treaties are expressly declared paramount to the Constitutions of the several States and being the Supreme Law, must of course control the national legislature, if not supercede the Constitution of the United States itself—[T]he check of the President over a Body, with which he must act in concert, or his influence and power be almost annihilated, can prove no great Constitutional security; And even the Representative body itself—and much more the Senate—are not sufficiently numerous to secure them from corruption—for all Governments tend to corruption, in proportion as power concentrating in the hands of the few, renders them objects of corruption to Foreign Nations and among themselves—

5.5.8 For these and many other reasons we are for preserving the Rights of the State Governments, where they must not be necessarily relinquished for the welfare of the Union—and where so relinquished the line should be definitely drawn[.][5] [I]f under the proposed Constitution the States exercise any Power, it would seem to be at the mercy of the General Government—for it is remarkable that the clause securing to them those rights not expressly relinquished in the old Confoederation, is left out in the new Constitution; And we conceive that there is not Power which Congress may think necessary to exercise for the general welfare, which they may not assume under this Constitution—and this Constitution and the Laws made under it are declared paramount even to the unalienable rights, which have heretofore been assured to the Citizens of these States by their Constitutional compacts.—

5.5.9 Altho' this new Constitution can boast indeed of a Bill of Rights of seven Articles—yet of what nature is that Bill of Rights? to hold out such a security to the rights of property as might lead very wealthy and influential Men and Families into a blind compliance and adoption—whilst the Rights that are essential to the great body of Yeomanry of America are entirely disregarded.—

5.5.10 Moreover those very powers, which are to be expressly vested in the new Congress, are of a nature most liable to abuse—They are those which tempt the avarice and ambition of Men to a violation of the rights of their fellow Citizens, and they will be screend under the sanction of an undefined and unlimited authority—Against the abuse and improper exercise of these special powers, the People have a right to be secured by a sacred Declaration, defining the rights of the Individual and limiting by them, the extent of the exercise—The People were secured against the abuse of those Powers by fundamental Laws and a Bill of Rights, under the Government of Britain and under their own Constitutions—That Government which permits the abuse of Power, recommends it; and will deservedly experience the tyranny which it authorizes; for the history of Mankind establishes the truth of this political adage—that in Government what may be done will be done.[6]

5.5.11 The most blind admirer of this Constitution must in his heart confess that it is as far inferior to the British Constitution, of which it is an imperfect imitation [,] as darkness is to light—In the British Constitution, the rights of Men, the primary objects of the social Compact—are fixed on an immoveable foundation and clearly defined and ascertained by their Magna Charta, their Petition of Rights and Bill of Rights[;] and their Effective administration by ostensible Ministers, secures Responsibility—In this new Constitution—a complicated System sets responsibility at defiance and the Rights of Men, neglected and undefined[,] are left at the mercy of events; We vainly plume ourselves on the safeguard alone of Representation, forgetting that it will be a Representation on principles inconsistent with true and just Representation—that it is but a delusive shadow of Representation proffering in theory what can never be fairly reduced to practice;—And after all Government by Representation (unless confirmed in its views and conduct by the constant inspection, immediate superintendance, and frequent interference and control of the People themselves on one side, or an hereditary nobility on the other, both of which orders have fixed and permanent views) is really only a scene of perpetual rapine and confusion.—and even with the best checks it has failed in all the Governments of Europe, of which it was once the basis, except that of England.[7]—

5.5.12 When We turn our Eyes back to the scenes of blood and desolation which we have waded through to separate from Great Britain—we behold with manly indignation that our blood and treasure have been wasted to establish a Government in which the Interest of the few is preferred to the Rights of the Many—When We see a Government so every way inferior to that we were born under, proposed as the reward of our sufferings in an eight years calamitous war—our astonishment is only equalled by our resentment—On the conduct of Virginia and New York, two important States [,] the preservation of Liberty in a great measure depends—the chief security of a Confoederacy of Republics was boldly disregarded and the old Confoederation violated by requiring Nine instead of 13 voices to alter the Constitution.—[B]ut still the resistance of either of these States, in the present temper of America (for the late conduct of the Party here must open the eyes of the People in Massachusetts with respect to the fate of their amendments) will secure all that we mean to contend for—The natural and unalienable Rights of Men in a constitutional manner—At the distant appearance of danger to these, We took up arms in the late Revolution—and may we never have cause to look back with regret on that period when connected with the Empire of Great Britain, We were happy, secure, and free.

PART 2

Virginia and the South

Introduction

Following the ratification on 23 May of South Carolina, where the opposition of Anti-Federalists like Rawlins Lowndes, Aedanus Burke, and Thomas Sumpter was easily brushed aside, the debate over the Constitution came to a focus in Virginia. The Federalists still feared concerted Southern action under the leadership of Patrick Henry, and they distrusted Henry's motives and aims. Despite Henry's denials, many Federalists believed that he desired a separate Southern confederacy. "You are better acquainted with Mr. Henry's politics than I can be," Madison wrote to Edmund Randolph in January 1788, "but I have for some time considered him as driving at a Southern Confederacy and not further concurring in the plan of amendments than as he hopes to render it subservient to his real designs."[1] Madison was probably wrong about Henry's real design, and the Federalists unquestionably found a rhetorical advantage in accusing their opponents of wanting to break up the Union;[2] but a separate Southern confederacy was surely considered by the Southern Anti-Federalists as a possible outcome, as well as a bargaining point, and it was objectively a genuine possibility.

Still aristocratic in significant respects, Southern politics tended to be based on established and respected individual leaders, rather than on economic interests or on the political parties developing elsewhere in the country.[3] This was particularly true in Virginia which George Ticknor Curtis aptly described as being "filled with the spirit of republican freedom, although its polity and manners were marked by several aristocratic features."[4] This combination of qualities helped to make the Virginia ratifying convention debates the best and most thorough of all the states. As nowhere else on the continent, the political elite in Virginia was divided. The Virginia Anti-Federalists led by such men as Patrick Henry, George Mason, and Richard Henry Lee were more capable and commanded more respect than any other group of Anti-Federalists in the country. A searching debate in convention lasted more than three weeks; and when the vote was finally taken on 25 June, Virginia ratified the Constitution by a vote of 89 to 79, submitting a list of recommendatory amendments.[5]

1. Madison, Writings (ed. Hunt) V, 80–81. Six months later John R. Smith wrote to Madison that "the idea of Virginia standing independent of other States, or forming a partial confederacy or a foreign alliance is more openly avowed by some people in this quarter, than anywhere else, and I am certain the sentiment originates with the old Governor." Documentary History of the Constitution IV, 703. On the question of separate confederacies see above, vol. 1, ch. 4, n. 2.

2. This is of course basic to the rhetorical design of The Federalist. See Observer 6.4.3.

3. Thus Anti-Federalist Henrico county elected John Marshall, a known Federalist, to represent it in the state ratifying convention. John Marshall, An Autobiographical Sketch, ed. John Stokes Adams (Ann Arbor 1937) 7.

4. Curtis, Constitutional History of the United States I, 632.

5. In the meantime, however, and unknown to the Virginians, New Hampshire had ratified the Constitution on 21 June by a vote of 57–47; New Hampshire was thus the ninth state to ratify, and Virginia the tenth.

Letter of Richard Henry Lee to Governor Edmund Randolph

16 October 1787

In this letter Lee urges that another convention be held to remedy defects in the Constitution.[1] He is particularly critical of the combination of powers in the Executive and Senate; the absence of any genuine responsibility in the government, either through impeachment or an effective control by constituents; the very broad powers of Congress; the absence of a bill of rights; and the danger to the South of the congressional power to pass commercial laws by a simple majority vote. In a postscript, Lee suggests the amendments he thinks necessary.

The mover of the resolution for independence, Lee was always a strong supporter of Union whose views transcended the localism of some Anti-Federalists.[2] He was a continental man, who thought that the Articles of Confederation, in the adoption and operation of which he had taken an active part, were fundamentally sound if only the states would do their duty under them. He only reluctantly conceded that some modest increases in the powers of Congress might be appropriate.[3] Declining a seat in the Constitutional Convention on grounds of ill health and the alleged impropriety of helping to form a document he would have to pass on as a member of Congress,[4] Lee helped to block Congressional approval of the proposed Constitution. While declining to serve in the Virginia ratifying convention,[5] Lee took an active part in the ratification controversy and was reputed to have assisted Elbridge Gerry in drafting his objections and to have helped other Anti-Federalist writers in Pennsylvania and Delaware.[6] The recipient of much virulent criticism, Lee gave a reasonable and moderate response. Writing to Mason in the spring of 1788 of the kind of example Virginia should set to the yet undecided states, Lee urged a "circumspect and careful" course. "[A]s, on the one hand, every possible exertion of wisdom and firmness should be employed to prevent danger to civil liberty, so, on the other hand, the most watchful precaution should take place to prevent the foes of union, order, and good government, from succeeding so far as to prevent our acceptance of the good part of the plan proposed."[7]

Lee's letter was, according to Washington, "circulated with great industry in manascript, four Weeks before it went to press."[8] It was first published in the Virginia Gazette, and seems also to have been published as a pamphlet, though it is not listed in Evans' Early American Imprints, and no copy of the pamphlet has been found.[9] The letter was very widely reprinted and discussed. In Virginia it was vehemently attacked by A State Soldier in the Virginia Independent Chronicle on 12 March 1788 and was taken up and challenged, point by point, and with a good deal of personal abuse, by Cassius in the same newspaper on 2, 9, and 23 April 1788; Cassius was, in turn, rebutted by Brutus, whose essay is printed below.[10]

New-York, Oct. 16, 1787.

Dear Sir,

5.6.1 I was duly honored with your favor of Sept. 17, from Philadelphia,[1] which should have been acknowledged long before now, if the nature of the business that it related to had not required time.

The establishment of the new plan of government, in its present form, is a question that involves such immense consequences to the present times, and to posterity, that it calls for the deepest attention of the best and wisest friends of their country and of mankind; if it be found good after mature deliberation, adopt it; if wrong, amend it at all events, for to say (as many do) that a bad government must be established for fear of anarchy, is really saying, that we must kill ourselves for fear of dying. Experience and the actual state of things, shew that there is no difficulty in procuring a general convention; the late one being collected without any obstruction. Nor does external war or internal discord prevent the most cool, collected, full, and fair discussion of this all-important subject. If with infinite ease a convention was obtained to prepare a system, why may not another with equal ease be procured to make proper and necessary amendments? Good government is not the work of a short time, or of sudden thought. From Moses to Montesquieu the greatest geniuses have been employed on this difficult subject, and yet experience has shewn capital defects in the system produced for the government of mankind.—But since it is neither prudent or easy to make frequent changes in government, and as bad governments have been generally found the most fixed; so it becomes of the last consequence to frame the first establishment upon ground the most unexceptionable, and such as the best theories with experience justify; not trusting as our new constitution does, and as many approve of doing, to time and future events to correct evils, that both reason and experience in similar cases, point out in the new system. It has hitherto been supposed a fundamental maxim that in governments rightly balanced, the different branches of legislature should be unconnected, and that the legislative and executive powers should be separate: In the new constitution, the president and senate have all the executive and two thirds of the legislative power. In some weighty instances (as making all kinds of treaties which are to be the laws of the land) they have the whole legislative and executive powers. They jointly, appoint all officers civil and military, and they (the senate) try all impeachments either of their own members, or of the officers appointed by themselves.

Is there not a most formidable combination of power thus created in a few, and can the most critic eye, if a candid one, discover responsibility in this potent corps? Or will any sensible man say, that great power without responsibility can be given to rulers with safety to liberty? It is most clear that the parade of impeachment is nothing to them, or any of them; as little restraint is to be found. I presume, from the fear of offending constituents. The president is for four years duration (and Virginia for example) has one vote of thirteen in the choice of him, and this thirteenth vote not of the people, but electors, two removes from the people. The senate is a body of six years duration, and as in choice of president, the largest state has but a thirteenth vote, so is it in the choice of senators.—This latter statement is adduced to shew that responsibility is as little to be apprehended from amenability to constituents, as from the terror of impeachment. You are therefore, sir, well warranted in saying, either a monarchy, or aristocracy will be generated, perhaps the most grievous system of government may arise.—It cannot be denied with truth that this new constitution is, in its first principles, highly and dangerously oligarchic; and it is a point agreed that a government of the few, is, of all governments, the worst. The only check to be found in favour of the democratic principle in this system is, the house of representatives; which I believe may justly be called a mere shread or rag of representation: It being obvious to the least examination that smallness of number and great comparative disparity of power, renders that house of little effect to promote good, or restrain bad government.[2] But what is the power given to this ill-constructed body? To judge of what may be for the general welfare, and such judgments when made, the acts of congress become supreme laws of the land. This seems a power co-extensive with every possible object of human legislation. Yet there is no restraint in form of a bill of rights, to secure (what doctor Blackstone calls) that residuum of human rights, which is not intended to be given up to society, and which indeed is not necessary to be given for any good social purpose.[3] The rights of conscience, the freedom of the press, and the trial by jury are at mercy. It is there stated that in criminal cases, the trial shall be by jury. But how? In the state. What then becomes of the jury of the vicinage or at least from the county in the first instance, the states being from 50 to 700 miles in extent? This mode of trial even in criminal cases may be greatly impaired, and in civil cases the inference is strong, that it may be altogether omitted as the constitution positively assumes it in criminal, and is silent about it in civil causes. Nay it is more strongly discountenanced in civil cases by giving the supreme court in appeals, jurisdiction both as to law and fact.

5.6.3 Judge Blackstone in his learned commentaries (Art. Jury Trial) says, ["it] is the most transcendant privilege which any subject can enjoy or wish for, that he cannot be affected either in his property, his liberty, his person, but by the unanimous consent of twelve of his neighbours and equals. A constitution, that I may venture to affirm, has under providence, secured the just liberties of this nation for a long succession of ages. The impartial administration of justice, which secures both our persons and our properties, is the great end of civil society. But if that be entirely entrusted to the magistracy, a select body of men, and those generally selected by the prince, or such as enjoy the highest offices of the state, these decisions, in spite of their own natural integrity, will have frequently an involuntary bias towards those of their own rank and dignity. It is not to be expected from human nature, that the few should always be attentive to the good of the many.["] The learned judge further says, that ["]every tribunal selected for the decision of facts is a step towards establishing aristocracy; the most oppressive of all governments.["][4] The answer to these objections is, that the new legislature may provide remedies! but as they may, so they may not, and if they did, a succeeding assembly may repeal the provisions. The evil is found resting upon constitutional bottom, and the remedy upon the mutable ground of legislation, revocable at any annual meeting. It is the more unfortunate that this great security of human rights, the trial by jury, should be weakened in this system, as power is unnecessarily given in the second section of the third article, to call people from their own country in all cases of controversy about property between citizens of different states and foreigners, with citizens of the United States, to be tried in a distant court where the congress meets. For although inferior congressional courts may for the above parties be instituted in the different states, yet this is a matter altogether in the pleasure of the new legislature, so that if they please not to institute them, or if they do not regulate the right of appeal reasonably, the people will be exposed to endless oppression, and the necessity of submitting in multitudes of cases, to pay unjust demands, rather than follow suitors, through great expence, to far distant tribunals, and to be determined upon there, as it may be, without a jury. In this congressional legislature a bare majority of votes, can enact commercial laws, so that the representatives of the seven northern states, as they will have a majority, can by law create the most oppressive monopoly upon the five southern states, whose circumstances and productions are essentially different from theirs, although not a single man of these voters are the representatives of, or amenable to the people of the southern states. Can such a set of men be, with the least colour of truth, called a representative of those they make laws for? It is supposed that the policy of the northern states, will prevent such abuses.

But how feeble, sir, is policy when opposed to interest among trading people. And what is the restraint arising from policy? Why, that we may be forced by abuse to become ship builders!—But how long will it be before a people of agriculture can produce ships sufficient to export such bulky commodities as ours and of such extent; and if we had the ships, from whence are the seamen to come? 4000 of whom at lest will be necessary in Virginia. In questions so liable to abuse, why was not the necessary vote put to two thirds of the members of the legislature? With the constitution, came from the convention so many members of that body to congress, and of those too, who were among the most fiery zealots for their system, that the votes of three states being of them, two states divided by them, and many others mixed with them, it is easy to see that Congress could have little opinion upon the subject. Some denied our right to make amendments, whilst others more moderate agreed to the right, but denied the expediency 5.6.4

of amending; but it was plain that a majority was ready to send it on in terms of approbation—my judgment and conscience forbid the last, and therefore I moved the amendments that I have the honor to send you enclosed herewith and demanded the yeas and nays that they might appear on the journal. This seemed to alarm, and to prevent such appearance on the journal, it was agreed to transmit the constitution without a syllable of approbation or disapprobation, so that the term unanimously only applied to the transmission, as you will observe by attending to the terms of the resolve for transmitting. Upon the whole, sir, my opinion is, that as this constitution abounds with useful regulations, at the same time that it is liable to strong and fundamental objections, the plan for us to pursue, will be to propose the necessary amendment, and express our willingness to adopt it with the amendments, and to suggest the calling of a new convention for the purpose of considering them. To this I see no well founded objection, but great safety and much good to be the probable result. I am perfectly satisfied that you make such use of this letter as you shall think to be for the public good; and now, after begging your pardon for so great a trespass on your patience, and representing my best respects to your lady, I will conclude with assuring you, that I am with the sincerest esteem and regard, dear sir, your most affectionate and obedient servant.

Richard Henry Lee.

POSTSCRIPT.

5.6.5 It having been found from universal experience, that the most exprest declarations and reservations are necessary to protect the just rights and liberty of mankind from the silent powerful and ever active conspiracy of those who govern; and it appearing to be the sense of the good people of America, by the various bills or declarations of rights whereon the government of the greater number of states are founded. That such precautions are necessary to restrain and regulate the exercise of the great powers given to rulers. In conformity with these principles, and from respect for the public sentiment on this subject, it is submitted,—That the new constitution proposed for the government of the United States be bottomed upon a declaration or bill of rights, clearly and precisely stating the principles upon which this social compact is founded, to wit: That the rights of conscience in matters of religion ought not to be violated—That the freedom of the press shall be secured—That the trial by jury in criminal and civil cases, and the modes prescribed by the commonlaw for the safety of life in criminal prosecutions shall be held sacred—That standing armies in times of peace are dangerous to liberty, and ought not to be permitted unless assented to by two thirds of the members composing each house of the legislature under the new constitution—That the elections should be free and frequent—That the right administration of justice should be secured by the independency of the judges—that excessive bail, excessive fines, or cruel and unusual punishments should not be demanded or inflicted—That the right of the people to assemble peaceably for the purpose of petitioning the legislature shall not be prevented—That the citizens shall not be exposed to unreasonable searches, seizure of their persons, houses, papers or property; and it is necessary for the good of society, that the administration of government be conducted with all possible maturity of judgment, for which reason it hath been the practice of civilized nations and so determined by every state in the Union.—That a council of state or privy council should be appointed to advise and assist in the arduous business assigned to the executive power. Therefore let the new constitution be so amended as to admit the appointment of a privy council to consist of eleven members chosen by the president, but responsible for the advice they may give. For which purpose the advice given shall be entered in a council book, and signed by the giver in all affairs of great moment, and that the counsellors act under an oath of office. In order to prevent the dangerous blending of the legislative and executive powers, and to secure responsibility—The privy, and not the senate, shall be joined with the president in the appointment of all officers civil and military under the new constitution—That the constitution be so altered as not to admit the creation of a vice president, when duties as assigned may be discharged by the privy council, except in the instance of proceding [presiding?] in the senate, which may be supplied by a speaker chosen from the body of senators by themselves as usual, that so may be avoided the establishment of a great officer of state, who is sometimes to be joined with the legislature, and sometimes administer the government, rendering responsibility difficult, besides giving unjust and needless pre-eminence to that state from whence this officer may have come.—That such parts of the new constitution be amended as provide imperfectly for the trial of criminals by a jury of the vicinage, and so supply the omission of a jury trial in civil causes or disputes about property between individuals, whereby the common law is directed, and as generally it is secured by the several state constitutions. That such parts of the new constitution be amended as permit the vexatious and oppressive callings of citizens from their own country, and all controversies between citizens of different states and between citizens and foreigners, to be tried in a far distant court, and as it may be without a jury, whereby in a multitude of cases, the circumstances of distance and expence, may compel numbers to submit to the most unjust and ill founded demand. That in order to secure the rights of the people more effectually from violation, the power and respectability of the house of representatives be increased, by increasing the number of delegates to that house where the popular interest must chiefly depend for protection—That the constitution be so amended as to increase the number of votes necessary to determine questions in cases where a bare majority may be seduced by strong motives of interest to injure and oppress the minority of the community as in commercial regulations, where advantage may be taken of circumstances to ordain rigid and premature laws that will in effect amount to monopolies, to the great impoverishment of those states whose peculiar situation expose them to such injuries.

VIRGINIA INDEPENDENT CHRONICLE
17 October 1787

This essay, while not deep, is lively and well crafted; it presents a series of moderate, practical objections to the Constitution. Printed first in the Virginia Independent Chronicle, the essay was reprinted in Pennsylvania and New York. The author admits that the Articles of Confederation require amendment to give the Congress ample power to regulate commerce and to lay and collect impost duties. He recalls, however, "the well known difficulty of governing large republics with harmony and ease," and suggests that the "blaze of liberty" will be kept alive better "when watched on thirteen altars, than when reunited into one." He emphasizes that in giving the federal government the power of direct taxation, the Constitution opens the prospect of the hated excise, administered by officers from out of state ("Are we not to expect, that New England will now send us revenue officers, instead of onions and apples?"), and backed up by distant federal courts.

To the Freemen of Virginia:

Adventuring, this day, to call your attention to one of the most serious and awful subjects, that ever was agitated by a free people, I must, in the most unfeigned manner, supplicate your kindest indulgence. I must, (it would be presumption to deny it) own that the head which dictates these words, and the hand which guides this pen, trembles at this moment with reverential awe, and, if I mistake not, there are few among thee, whose own feelings will leave any room to doubt it, when you are informed, that I am summing up the courage to question the merits of the Fœderal Constitution, proposed to your consideration by the late General Convention. 5.7.1

In the hour of distress, in the moment of confusion and perilous danger, after separately declaring themselves sovereign and independent, the Thirteen States of America associated together in a Fœderal league, for their 5.7.2

common defence, an affair of such magnitude, formed under the influence of such unfavorable circumstances, could not fail of receiving a tinge from them; consequently, when the war, that link, which supplied each defect was over, the yawnings and the chasms of the building began to give evident marks of the hastiness of the workmen: America saw, that without the help of a better cement, the different members were likely to fall asunder, and that, though we may find a lodging in some of the separated pavilions, we must bid adieu to the grandeur and dignity of being inhabitants of a stately palace.

5.7.3 The State of Virginia had the honor of taking the lead in this business, and well aware of its magnitude and import, she delegated some of her choicest sons to it, as did the other States, the result has been anxiously waited for, and in the confidence of its being the offspring of the combined abilities and integrity of America, nobody doubted discovering in it the characteristic features of the parents. The reverence, which every man must feel for them, made me, on examining it, guard against my own opinion with the utmost severity. But, as it is not in the power of man to give up, in any single instance, the dictates of his reason, when he has once been convinced of the propriety of allowing his judgment to be swayed by no other motive, I thought it beneath the dignity of a free agent, with strength of conviction on my mind, to sacrifice it to any authority or predilection whatsoever. To acquire this conviction, 'tis true, I had no small difficulty to bring myself to examine the Fœderal Constitution abstracting from its authors; I hope, nevertheless, that every freeman in Virginia will, in this momentous matter, take the same method, will nobly dare to think for himself, and will not be lulled, perhaps into a fatal stupor, by the whistling of any names whatsoever; this, I am sure, is the wish of the most exalted characters, that formed the Fœderal Convention; and, believe me, when you will not use this priviledge, you are no longer worthy to bear the name of freemen. I would wish to find it sunk deep into your recollection, and be early impressed upon the minds of your children, that all the republics, which were, and are not, in the world, owed their loss of liberty and their dissolution, to an overweaning reverence for men and their measures. This consideration is not thrown out to you, with the impious arrogance of insinuating the least doubt of the upright and patriotic views, of the delegates who formed the late General Convention; a vain and presumptuous attempt of that kind would, undoubtedly, have no other effect with you, than that of branding the man, who could be guilty of it, with the most deserved infamy and contempt. The intention of it is, to induce you, as it behoves freemen, to meet the consideration of this matter with minds purged of all kinds of prejudice, and ready to yield to the conviction of your reason.—Humanum est errare. The lot of human nature renders it liable to error, and, if we discover it here, it will be a great practical lesson, to humble ourselves before the fountain of ALL WISDOM. Though I have not the fondness to think, that any remarks of mine shall influence the political conduct of any one, I may, perhaps without incurring the imputation of self-sufficiency, indulge myself with the hopes that they may call forth some abler pens to agitate this matter. It is surely to be wished, that the attention of the citizens of the different States should be fixed, in a cool dispassionate manner, to a subject, which is to have so direct an influence on the future prosperity of them and their posterity.

It has been the language, since the peace, of the most virtuous and discerning men in America, that the powers vested in Congress were inadequate to the procuring of the benefits, that should result from the union: It was found, that our national character was sinking in the opinion of foreign nations, and that the selfish views of some of the States were likely to become the source of dangerous jealousy; the requisitions of Congress were set at naught; the Government, that represented the Union, had not a shilling in its Treasury to enable it to pay off the Fœderal debts, nor had it any method within its power to alter its situation; it could make treaties of commerce, but could not enforce the observance of them, and it was felt, that we were suffering from the restrictions of foreign nations, who seeing the want of energy in our Fœderal Constitution, and the unlikelihood of co-operation in thirteen separate Legislatures, had shackled our commerce, without any dread of recrimination on our part: To obviate these grievances, it was, I believe, the general opinion, that new powers should be vested in Congress, to enable it, in the amplest manner, to regulate the commerce, to lay and collect duties on the imports, of the United States. Delegates were appointed by most of them, for these purposes, to a Convention to be held at Annapolis in the September before last; a few of them met, and without waiting for the others, who were coming on, they dissolved the Convention, after resolving among themselves, that the powers vested in them were not sufficiently extensive, and that they would apply to the Legislatures of the several States, which they represented, to appoint members to another Convention, with powers to new model the Fœderal Constitution. This, indeed, it has now done in the most unequivocal manner, nor has it stopped here, for it has fairly annihilated the Constitution of each individual state. It has proposed to you a high prerogative government, which, like Aaron's serpent, it to swallow up the rest: this is what the thinking people in America were apprehensive of; they knew how difficult it is to hit the golden mean, how natural the transition is from one extreme to the other; from anarchy to tyranny; from the inconvenient laxity of thirteen separate Governments to the too sharp and grinding one, before which our sovereignty, as a state, was to vanish. 5.7.4

In Art I, Sect. 8. of the proposed Fœderal Constitution, it is said, "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises."—Are you then, Virginians, about to abandon your country to the depredations of exisemen, and the pressure of excise laws? Did it ever enter the mind of any one of you, that you could live to see the day, that any other 5.7.5

government, but the General Assembly of Virginia, should have power of direct taxation in this state? How few of you ever expected to see excise laws, them instruments of tyranny, in force in your country? But, who could imagine, that any man but a Virginian, were they found to be necessary, would ever have a voice towards enacting them? That any tribunal, but the Courts of Virginia, would be allowed to take cognizance of disputes between her citizens and their tax gatherers and excise men? And that, if it should ever be found necessary, to curse this land with these hateful excisemen, any one, but a fellow citizen, should be intrusted with that office?

5.7.6 For my part, I cannot discover the necessity there was of allowing Congress to subject us to excise laws, unless, that considering the extensiveness of the single republic into which this Constitution would collect all the others, and the well known difficulty of governing large republics with harmony and ease, it was thought expedient to bit our mouths with massive curbs, to break us, bridled with excise laws, and managed by excisemen, into an uniform, sober pace, and thus, gradually, tame the troublesome mettle of the freeman. This necessity could not, surely, arise from the desire of furnishing Congress with a sufficient revenue, to enable it to exercise the prerogatives, which every friend to America would wish to see vested in it; as it would, by unanimous consent, have the management of the impost, it could increase it to any amount, and this would fall sufficiently uniform on every one, according to his ability; or, were this not found sufficient, could not the deficiency be made up by requisitions to the states? Could it not have been made an article of the Fœderal Constitution, that, if any of them refused their quota, Congress may be allowed to make it up by an increase of the impost, on that particular state so refusing. This would, surely, be a sufficient security to Congress, that their requisitions would be punctually complied with.

5.7.7 In any dispute between you and the revenue officers and excisemen of Congress, it is true, that it is provided, the trial shall be, in the first instance, within the state, though before a Foederal tribunal: It is said in par. 3. sect. 2. art. 3. "The trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachments shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the state where the crime shall be committed"; but what does this avail, when an appeal will lie against you to the Supreme Foederal Court.—In the paragraph preceeding the one just now quoted, it is said, "In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. *In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make." But, where is this Supreme Court to sit? Will it not be, where Congress shall fix its residence? Thither then you will be carried for trial. Who are to be your jury? Is there any provision made, that you shall have a Venire from your county, or even from your state, as they please to call it? No! you are to be tried within the territory of Congress, and Congress itself is to be a party; you are to be deprived of the benefit of a jury from your vicinage, that boast and birthright of a freeman.

Should it not, at least, have been provided, that those revenue officers and excisemen, against whom free governments have, always, justly entertained a jealousy, should be citizens of the state? Was it inadmissible, that, they should be endued with the bowels of fellow citizens? Are we not to expect, that New England will now send us revenue officers, instead of their onions and their apples? When you observe, that the few places, already, under Congress in this state are in the hands of strangers, you will own, that my suspicion is not without some foundation: and if the first cause of it be required, those, who have served in Congress, can tell you, that, the New England Delegates to that Assembly have always stood by each other, and have formed a firm phalanx, which the southern Delegates have not; that, on the contrary, the manœuvres of the former have been commonly engaged, with success, in dividing the latter, against each other. The force of names and of habits is well known, though Scotland and England go now under the general name of Great Britain, the distinction of Scotsman and Englishman still subsists, and, how often has the latter complained, that, that northern hive was continually swarming its hungry instruments of undue prerogative over his country. 5.7.8

The ingenious Lord Shaftsbury has said, that a wheel within a wheel was an absurdity in politics;[1] but, where was this ever so manifest, as in this Foederal Constitution. The phantom of sovereignty, which is left the state, enables it to legislate in many instances, and lay taxes; to have its tax-gatherers and excisemen too. Unhappy situation where the natural jealousy, and the pride inherent in two separate governments, presiding over the same people, will induce them to vie in the race of taxation to snatch the prize, the spoils of the citizen, that is to glut the vanity of their respective consequence! he, who has meditated on man, and the secret springs, which move him, must expect this. Unhappy situation where two rival excisemen battle at your doors for precedence in seizing these spoils!—In the name of God look well before you leap, consider, that the question is, whether, you would rather be a sovereign or a sharer in sovereignty: whether, as only a few from their abilities and consequence can expect to be delegated, in rotation, to Congress, you are not about to lay the foundation of a dangerous aristocracy. Whether, it is, not more likely that the blaze of LIBERTY will be kept alive among us, when watched on thirteen separate Altars, than when re-united into one, be it ever so refulgent. Consider, whether you are willing to see the state of Virginia dwindle into the insignificance of a town corporate: and as the Mayor Court of aldermen and common-council in this make by-laws for its own government, you are satisfied with a Governor, Senate 5.7.9 and Assembly, which will have the same authority as "the United States shall guarantee to every state in this Union a republican FORM of government." Consider that if you pass the Fœderal Constitution in toto, you subject yourselves to see the doors of your houses, them impenetrable castles of freemen, fly open before the magic wand of an exciseman, and, that, if you should resent and punish the insolence of office, the daring brutality of the publican, perhaps offered to the wife of thy bosom, you will be dragged for trial before a distant tribunal, and there, perhaps, condemned without enjoying the benefit of a jury from your vicinage, your unalienable birthright as a freeman.

A Proposal for Reviving Christian Conviction

VIRGINIA INDEPENDENT CHRONICLE
31 October 1787

This is an essay soliciting support of a plan of certain vestries of the Episcopal Church in Virginia to appoint lay clerks in an effort to revitalize religious conviction. Although unconcerned with the new proposed Constitution, the author argues with particular clarity and coherence the dependence of civil institutions on religious sanction, an important concern of many Anti-Federalists and one that is rejected by James Madison in The Federalist no. 10 and elsewhere.[1]

1. See Turner 4.18.2 n. 2.

Mr. Davis,

The following paper was transmitted to me by a friend zealous in the true interests of his country: The matter it contains is, in my opinion, of such importance as to justify my requesting the insertion of it in your very useful as well as Independent Chronicle.

I am, sincerely, yours,
A.B.

The unpromising situation of national affairs has of late, induced many well meaning people to submit to the public their sentiments, however unpolished, respecting the proper means of effecting a reform. Several have, and very justly, pointed out the want of virtue, public and private, as one principal source of our distresses, and have recommended the practice thereof with the most plausible arguments. To such writers the community is certainly much indebted for their well meant endeavours. But alas! the experience of every age evinces that arguments drawn from the native charms of moral rectitude, and its necessary connection with the happiness and welfare of states, are too feeble to ensure the requisite practice of virtue when opposed to the allurements of self-interest and self-gratification. 5.8.1

5.8.2 While mankind consider the obligations to the exercise of virtue as derived from no higher source than the advantages accruing therefrom to society, it is no difficult matter for every individual to satisfy himself, that, provided he can persuade others to the disinterested practice, his dispensing with it in his own case will be a thing of little moment. Hence declamations on the advantages and necessity of public and private virtue fall from the lips of every one, while their lives are stained with the most sordid and selfish practices. Though the different states into which mankind are formed, have, generally speaking, enacted laws to restrain and punish enormities, to countenance virtue and discourage vice; yet the most approved and wisest legislators in all ages, in order to give efficacy to their civil institutions, have found it necessary to call in the aid of religion; and in no form of government whatever has the influence of religious principles been found so requisite as in that of a republic. It requires but a slight degree of observation to be convinced that mankind require the awe of some power to confine them within the line of their duty. The dread of a rapacious tyrant ready to take advantage of the smallest misdemeanor (in order to fill his coffers or gratify a cruel disposition) may preserve quiet and order among the subjects, or rather slaves, of a despotic prince. Even in limited monarchies the security of the sovereign as well as the privileges of the people, depending on a strict attention to the laws, in a great measure, secures their being duly administered. But what is there to correct the injustice and irregularities of the member of a republic, even where the most salutary laws exist, while he can associate numbers in his interest; or supposing the administration of the laws in the hands of such as have a fellow-feeling, or are unwilling to risk their popularity by punctually enforcing them.

5.8.3 Whatever influence speculative vanity may ascribe to the indefinite principle termed honor, or political refinement, to an artful collusion of interests, sound reason as well as experience proves that a due sense of responsibility to the Deity, as the author of those moral laws, an observance of which constitutes the happiness and welfare of societies as well as individuals, is the mean most likely to give a right direction to the conduct of mankind.[1] The man who carries his prospects forward to futurity, and considers himself a candidate for the favor of omnipotence, will be actuated, in the general tenor of his life, by motives that elevate him above the little interests and passions which disturb the peace of society, and will discharge the relative duties of his station, unawed by the fear of man, with a consistence and steadiness correspondent to the principle from which he acts.

5.8.4 It has been the misfortune of our infant legislature that in the multiplicity of business which has come before them, they have not had leisure to attend sufficiently to the importance of religious concerns to the welfare of the state. In consequence of this a cold indifference towards religion has crept upon the minds of the elderly; our illiterate youth have been raised in almost total ignorance thereof; and those of liberal education, forming their opinions of it from the absurd notions and practices of a few ignorant and presumptuous enthusiasts, have contracted a hearty contempt for every thing sacred.

The pernicious effects of this general disregard of religion on the morals and manners of the people, are but too obvious, and point it out as the duty of every wellwisher to his country to contribute his utmost towards a remedy. A deep sense of this has induced the members of some of the vestries of the Episcopal Church to take the matter into serious consideration. Sensible that while such a general indifference prevails, salaries, sufficient to engage pastors of character and abilities, cannot be obtained by voluntary subscription, and desirous to revive among the people a personal concern for religion that may supply the place of a legal establishment, they have resolved to appoint clerks of irreproachable morals, who are to attend only on Sundays, and devoutly to go through the church service. A selection of (instructive?) and practical discourses suited to the [ ] of the audience being made by [ ] one of these immediately after service is to be read by them from the desk. The allowance usually made to clerks being inconsiderable, it is expected little difficulty will be found in raising a sufficiency for the purpose; and it is hoped the habit of regularly attending divine worship will create a desire to have it accompanied with the greatest solemnity, and consequently a willingness to contribute to the support of able ministers. It is apparent however that this plan must fail unless countenanced by people of rank and influence. The limits of your paper will not admit of enumerating the many inducements to this which naturally present themselves. Indeed were the Christian religion considered in its genuine character, as delivered by its Divine Author, not merely as a revelation of certain articles of faith and duty respecting the Deity and a future state; but also as comprehending the most complete system of ethics, calculated to harmonize society by laying a restraint on the passions and regulating the affections of its votaries; few arguments would be requisite to persuade persons of every denomination to give it their countenance, even from motives of policy alone. Parents would find a small advantage in having an opportunity weekly of carrying their children to a place whose sacredness would give, at least a temporary check to that levity of mind, so conspicuous in the rising generation, and where they would receive repeated lessons of integrity, candour, sobriety, and every amiable virtue. The community at large would benefit by the introduction of a body of men qualified to instruct its youth in every useful branch of literature. Those seeds of personal prejudice and dislike which shoot up among mankind, when kept at a distance and estranged from one another, would die away when people came to associate cordially in the exercises of a religion whose spirit breathes nought but universal love and benevolence, and an intercourse of friendly offices, highly conducive to the prosperity of the whole, a love of order and respect to the laws would most probably be the consequence. Those who doubt of the good effects arising from the operation of religious principles, need only turn their thoughts to the state of Pennsylvania, and contemplate the happy and flourishing condition of that province from its first settlement.

5.8.6 It shall only be added further that it must give every well disposed person pleasure to reflect, that while men of rank and abilities are employed in forming the numerous and complicated wheels of the political machine; the most obscure have it in their power, in this case, to render essential service to their country, by promising that spirit which alone can give the necessary spring and regulations to its different movements.

Essay by A Georgian

GAZETTE OF THE STATE OF GEORGIA
15 November 1787

Although professing a liking for the plan of the new Constitution, A Georgian criticizes its essential principles. He argues, for example, that the system of requisitions by quotas should be maintained; that voting in the national legislature should be by states; and that the Constitution should provide specifically for the salaries of members of the federal legislature and executive, the size of the civil list, the relief of the President as commander-in-chief when incapacitated, etc. This unknown author covers most of the ground common in Anti-Federalist essays, but his proposals are more than usually concrete and restrictive. His objections are well summarized in the next-to-last paragraph. Of interest are his arguments that the constitution is an apostacy from the free, democratic principles of the Declaration of Independence (5.9.16) and that the Southern interest is inadequately represented and protected (5.9.4). The essay produced a good deal of discussion, pro and con, in the Gazette, in which A Georgian took some further brief part but wrote nothing more of substance.

Mr. Printer,

Through the channel of your paper we have lately been favoured with the new Federal Constitution, the plan of which I must confess I like, and it is my heart's wish to see a federal constitution established agreeable to the principles of republican liberty and independence, and on the basis of a democratical government, meaning that of the people, being that very government intended by our glorious Declaration of Independence. 5.9.1

Though this new federal constitution, I believe, was framed and intended for the good of the United States, and, as we are well aware, was assented to by the political saviours of our country, to whom all deference and respect is due, yet the sacredness of these illustrious characters has not been sufficient nor able to prevent several articles from creeping into the said constitution, which, by their different constructions and great latitude given them, an American Sylla or Augustus Octavianus, might one day or other make ser- 5.9.2

viceable to his ambition, interest, and to the utter subversion of our SACRED FREEDOM. And as mankind, upon the whole, is so depraved as, with pleasure, to trample upon the sacred rights and privileges of their fellow creatures, it is certainly one of our greatest cares, both for ourselves and our offspring, to frame such constitutional laws, thereby to prevent such designing tyrants (if ever they be) from grasping at a power, to our destruction, in the said federal constitution, within their reach; as also to guard with the safest care against all encroachments, and to bar them forever from paving the way to what is worse yet, an ARISTOCRATICAL government, whereby about 70 nabobs would lord over three millions of people as slaves; as also to establish power, harmony, equality, and justice, for and among the whole of the United States.

5-9-3 I agree, as it may be said, that the Articles of the Confederation are defective; and, to make it answer effectually the purpose of a federal government, it is to be observed, delegates from all the states, except Rhode Island, were appointed by the legislatures, with this power only, "to meet in Convention, to join in devising and discussing all such ALTERATIONS and farther provisions as may be necessary to render the articles of the confederation adequate to the exigencies of the Union."[1] This was the only power in them vested, and, in conformity to it, had they added to the articles of the confederation a power to Congress, viz. To regulate foreign and internal trade—to lay and collect duties and imposts, uniform throughout the United States—to have the sole legislative power in maritime matters—to have a coercive power to enforce the payment of the quota of each delinquent state—but to leave internal taxation and excise to the management of each individual state, the legislature thereof being certainly best acquainted with that important business [—had they done this, a]ll would have been well, and our federal government as good and fully adequate to its exigencies, as could have been wished. But as this Convention has thought fit to destroy such an useful fabrick, as the articles of the confederation, with the before mentioned amendment and addition, would have been, and, on the ruins of that, raised a new structure, rather favourable to aristocratical and destructive to democratical government[;] and as it seems not to have that equality and justice for its basis, [as] it certainly ought to have, among confederated, free, and independent states, I wish to point out the few articles inconsistent with such a constitution, and also to try the remedies thereof, hoping, by that means, that my fellow citizens will, by a candid second reading of said constitution, agree with me in the impropriety of such articles, and their united wisdom, in a Convention guided by the love of their country, and answering the benefit of the whole, will improve the remedies, and so establish a federal constitution capable of deterring any ambitious men from making an use of it to our destruction; as also to keep alive and in due harmony the confederation among the United Independent States, lately so dearly purchased from the government of Great Britain, because that meant "TO BIND US IN ALL CASES WHATSOEVER."[2] But now to the point itself:

Article I, section 2. This section mentions that, within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, an enumeration shall take place, the number of representatives not to exceed one member for every 30,000. This article I believe to be inadmissible: 1st, it affording too small a representation (supposing 48 at the highest calculation) and especially in the southern states; their climate, soil, and produce, to a large extent back, not being capable of that population as in the northern states. Would it not therefore be better to increase the number of representatives, say one member for every 20,000 for the states north of Virginia, and one for every 15,000 south of the said state, itself included? Or, 2dly, divide the states into districts, which shall choose the representatives, by which every part of a state will have an equal chance, without being liable to parties or factions? Should it be said it will increase the expence, it will be money well laid out, and the more so if we retain the paying them out of our own hands; and, supposing the voting in the house of representatives was continued as heretofore by states, would it not be more equal still? At any rate I would strenuously recommend to vote by states, and not individually, as it will be accommodating the idea of equality, which should ever be observed in a republican form of government. Or, 3dly, if it was in proportion to the quotas of the states, as rated in taxation, then the number of members would increase with the proportion of tax, and at that rate there would always be an equality in the quota of tax as well as representation; for what chance of equality, according to the constitution in question, can a state have that has only one or two votes, when others have eight or ten, (for it is evident that each representative, as well as senator, is meant to have a vote, as it mentions no other mode but in choosing the president) and as it is generally allowed that the United States are divided into two natural divisions, the northern as far as Virginia, the latter included forms the southern? This produces a wide difference in climate, soil, customs, manner of living, and the produce of the land; as well as trade, also in population, to which it is well observed the latter is not so favourable as the former, and never can nor will be, nature itself being the great obstacle. And when taxation is in agitation, as also many other points, it must produce difference in sentiments, and, in such a dispute; how is it likely to be decided, according to the mode of voting, the number of members north of Virginia the first three years is 42, and the southern, Virginia included, 23; and, when the enumeration takes place, the odds is somewhat more, say 32 north, and 16 south? Is human nature above self interest? if the northern states do not burthen the southern in taxation, it would appear then really that they are more disinterested men than we know of. 5.9.4

Out of these observations I shall leave my fellow citizens to join in an amendment necessary in this section.

5.9.5 Art. I, sect. 4. What advantage can accrue to Congress to have the power to order where, or in what part of the state, the senators or representatives, agreeable to this and the second section, are to be chosen in each state? And, for fear they should convene the state of Georgia at Bourbon or Shoulderbone, I would advise that the words, "but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing senators," be erased.

5.9.6 Art. I, sect. 6. What advantage can it be to Congress to have the power to pay themselves? and yet it may be very detrimental to the states. May they not do as the members of a certain state assembly did, spend most of the money raised by the taxes in paying themselves? And why is their salary not fixed? for who can say how the senators or representatives may incline to live? perhaps much better than we can afford to pay. Also, is it meant by this section that a member, either of the senate or representatives, is not to account for his acts to his constituents? If so, this is contrary to the idea entertained by freemen who delegate their power for a limited time. That the representative should be called on by his constituents to answer and give his reasons for his measures is one of the firmest barriers to liberty. Therefore I would propose this section to read thus:

"Art. I, sect. 6. The senators and representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, not exceeding five dollars per day, during their attendance and going to and coming from Congress, to be paid out of the treasury of their respective states. They shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest, during their attendance at the sessions of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same. And for any speech or debate in either house they shall not be questionable in any other place, except when they shall be called upon for that purpose by their constituents."

5.9.7 Art. I, sect. 8. The words TAXES and EXCISES are inadmissible, and I would recommend them to be expunged; for, by this section, as it stands, there is no limited taxation, and no check. Should not rather the civil list, and other arrangements suitable for a peace establishment, together with debts and interests due, have been made out, and laid before the house? Let this sum then be the tax in times of peace, assess each state with its quota, call it in by a certain day, and, if not paid, let Congress by all means have the necessary compulsory powers. And in case an unlimited taxation in actual war is to be given, let it cease positively immediately on the return of peace. Remember the civil list of England was, not many years ago, but a few hundreds of pounds, and now it is far above a million, and yet there in times of peace, nay even in war, the sums and the uses must be ascertained before it is granted by parliament. Upon the whole, it can never be allowed that we can suffer ourselves to be individually taxed by Congress, they being unacquainted with our private circumstances; but our own legislature is the only body politick to whose management it can be trusted.

That part of the 8th section respecting tribunals is utterly inadmissible; its extent being not known and without bounds, and threatening to annihilate all state jurisdictions, it ought therefore to be entirely expunged.

Also that part respecting the army I would recommend to read thus: "To raise and support armies only in times of war, invasion, insurrection, or rebellion; and no appropriation of money to be for a longer term than one year to that use. No standing armies to be kept on foot during times of peace within the United States, except what may be necessary to garrison frontier posts."

Further, that part of said 8th section respecting territorial legislation for the district where Congress resides, confine it only to five miles square; a larger extent might be made a nursery out of which legions may be dragged to subject us to unlimited slavery, like antient Rome.

Art. I, sect. 9. That part of this section respecting our home trade should have this addition, in order to prevent smuggling and a contraband trade, "but they shall be obliged to produce sealed customhouse certificates from the ports they last cleared or sailed from." 5.9.8

That part of the same section respecting the Writs of Habeas Corpus, let it, by your leave, read thus: "The privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall remain, without any exceptions whatever, inviolate forever."

Art. 2, sect. 1. Would it not be necessary to say, "that the president shall hold his office during the term of four years out of eight?" Query, What number of men choose a president for the important and almost unlimited trust in the United States? There are no more than 93 for the first three years, and Georgia's quota is five; and, after three years, the number of electors will be but 76, for, I say again, 30,000 people are not so easily acquired; then the right of Georgia lies in three only for so great a trust. If a majority of 558 members have as yet been bought into the court interest in Great Britain, Query, How many offices, and how much money, will it take to buy the majority of 76 members, if ambitious men should attempt to set about it? and who can set bounds to the depravity of human nature, if not restrained by wholesome constitutional laws? Therefore let us guard against such an accident by having more electors. 5.9.9

Query, Would it not be necessary to fix the day unalterably forever for choosing of electors, and for them to give their votes for a president?

Also, Would it not be well done to fix the president's salary at once, by saying he shall have 4000 dollars per annum?

Art. 2, sect. 2. If the president should at any time be incompetent for military command in war, etc. (for he cannot be prevented from taking the chief command when it is his right) and should choose to take the command notwithstanding, what ill consequences may not result? for we know there are many wise and good men, and very fit for civil rulers, but are quite unfit for the command of armies and navies. Would it not be better said, "That the president, with the advice of both Houses of Congress, shall be com- 5.9.10 mander in chief, etc. etc. etc." By this clause, ought we not to look into the troubles in Holland, and see how the Stadtholder (laying aside his hereditary claims) behaved, contrary to the positive orders of the States General, his masters, during our late glorious revolution? and has he not accumulated powers destructive to their commonwealth, and which are now the sole cause of their present troubles? and should we not avoid the like by making the president ineligible to the office as many years as you allow him to hold it? and that he only be commander in chief, and nominate and appoint all officers, civil and military, by and with the advice of the senate, etc. only? Therefore I would advise the clause, "But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the president alone," etc. be struck out.

5.9.11 Art. 2, sect. 3. It will certainly be no harm, but of infinite benefit, if all continental commissions have the clause, "By and with the advice of the senate of the United States." This will prevent the officers from looking up to the president alone as their master and benefactor. This is another observation which has come to us from Holland, where several great officers refused to serve the state of Holland against the Stadtholder, saying expressly they had their commission only from him, and considered themselves under his command, and no other.

5.9.12 And now we come to the point which at once teems with numberless enormous innovations, by introducing strange and new courts, of almost any denomination, into any of the states, whereby our own courts will soon be annihilated, and abolishing the only pledge of liberty, the trial by jury, to tyrants only formidable, in all civil cases, countenancing the greatest injustice to be lawfully, nay constitutionally, committed by the rich against their brave fellow citizens, whose only misfortune is, to be, perhaps, not so rich as they, by dragging their lawsuits of any denomination, and of any sum, however small, if they choose, before the GRAND TRIBUNAL OF APPEAL, to which the poor will be unable to follow, with their evidences and witnesses, and on account of the great expences. Therefore, fellow citizens, pray restrain this encroachment, so destructive to the inestimable rights the more numerous part of middle circumstanced citizens now enjoy. With horror beware of the precipice before you; and, if you will, please join me in amending the third article in the federal constitution thus:

5.9.13 "Art. 3, sect. 1. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court only, which shall be resident wheresoever Congress resides, the judges and officers whereof shall hold their offices, by and with the advice of both Houses of Congress, during good behaviour, and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished nor increased during their continuance in office. The expences attending a suit in this supreme court shall not exceed 60 dollars."

5.9.14 "Art. 3, sect. 2. The judicial power of this supreme court shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other publick ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and respecting foreign trade; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more states, between a state and citizens of another state, between citizens of the same state claiming land under grants of different states, and foreign states, foreign citizens, or subjects."

"In all cases affecting ambassadors, other publick ministers, or consuls, and where the United States shall be a party, and between two or more states, the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction; but, in all the other before enumerated cases, it shall have appellate jurisdiction only, as well of law as fact."

"The trial of all civil and criminal causes, except in cases of impeachment, (as provided for in article I, section 3) shall be by jury, drawn by lot out of a box from among the freeholders of that state where Congress shall reside, and within five miles thereof; and, when a crime against the United States has been committed within no state, the Supreme Court of Congress shall have the trial of the same where Congress then resides."

"The state's attorney in each and every state shall prosecute all criminals who have committed crimes against the United States. Such trial shall be held where the crime has been committed, by such state court as has jurisdiction of the vicinity."

Art. 4, sect. 5. At the conclusion of the fourth article, add, "The freedom of the press, and trial by jury, shall be held sacred and inviolate throughout the United States forever." 5.9.15

Thus, fellow citizens, have I pointed out what I thought necessary to be amended in our federal constitution. I beg you to call to mind our glorious declaration of independence, read it, and compare it with the federal constitution; what a degree of apostacy will you not then discover: Therefore, guard against all encroachments upon your liberties so dearly purchased with the costly expence of blood and treasure. Show that you have yet that noble spirit, and provide remedies against the numberless evils of an unlimitted taxation,—against the fatal effects of a standing army in times of peace,—against an unfair and too small representation. Let your suffrages at elections never be suffered to be regulated by laws at pleasure, but let it be stated and fixed. Let the trial by jury in civil and criminal causes, and the liberty of the press, be forever sacred and inviolable. Let Congress, for God's sake, not have that power of jurisdiction sought after to our destruction, but confine them to a territory of five miles only, and to only one supreme court, and allow them none extraordinary. Neither appeals in cases between citizens, whereby the rich may fly from justice, and the poor unable to follow them. And, at this rate, I am confident you will establish a government which will be lasting, and a blessing to ourselves and generations hereafter. 5.9.16

Having now discharged my duty, which as a citizen I owe to God, to my country, and myself, I leave you to judge for yourselves, and I hope you will act as becoming freemen and the guardians for your offspring.

A Georgian

1. The language is a somewhat abbreviated version of the Georgia ordinance of 10 February 1787 appointing delegates to the constitutional convention, which was patterned on the original Virginia resolution of 16 October 1786. The delegates were charged, however, to make revisions to render the "Federal Constitution" (not, as A Georgian has it, "the articles of confederation") adequate to the exigencies of the Union. See Farrand III, 576–77; cf. 559–60.

2. This is of course the language of the Declaratory Act of 1766.

Essays by Cato

STATE GAZETTE OF SOUTH CAROLINA
November–December 1787

A rather unusual Anti-Federalist, Cato (unrelated to the well-known New York Cato, 2.6) views the Constitution with pleasure and regards it as well calculated "to direct the movements of our rising empire" (5.10.2). He approves its subordination of the states to the general government and its protections against the mutability of laws and the excesses of parties and factions. He urges the country to "shake off our libertinism, and wish only to be free so far, as well regulated laws will permit and defend" (5.10.2). Cato's criticism of the Constitution concerns the proposed presidency, where he makes a substantial argument in favor of frequent rotation. The presidency will be, in fact, a royal office. Examining the examples of republican Rome and Cromwellian England, Cato argues specifically that the president should serve for four years and be ineligible for a second term. America is not so poor in qualified men as to need to rely on one or a few to fill this office. Indeed, the presidency should be accessible to the numerous citizens of ability and integrity. Such a rotation would moreover avoid the tumult that inevitably arises when a long-term executive finally ends his career.

The first essay appeared on 26 November 1787. It was answered by Maecenas in the same journal on 6 December, with a rebuttal by Cato on 10 December in which he shows rather convincingly that his main argument has been missed by his opponent's shafts.

26 November 1787

. . . in discrimen extremum venimus; nihil est jam ante nos reficiamus, aut ubi lapsi resistamus[1] . . .

Countrymen and Fellow-Citizens,

With you have I shared the dangers of a civil war, where humanity on the 5.10.1

side of our invaders was disregarded, and the heart grew callous to the ties of nature. With you have I seen the enemy repelled from our lands, and where oppression formerly waved her iron wand; now does liberty expand her wings in peace. But is your happiness complete for having conquered an[2] enemy, and delivered yourselves from the oppressions of a tyrant? Liberty in all climes is pleasing, and not easily gained: but more hard to be defended, and rendered serviceable to us. Rouse then yourselves to act towards the noble end, of carrying into execution what has been so happily conceived; fix on a sure basis, the constitution of America, and give to your posterity a vigorous and well digested government. Then shall you live in history revered by nations, and blessed by those, who participate the good effects of your counsels. For as the day on which we attain the knowledge of virtue is no less pleasing than when we put her precepts in execution: so those who preserve our liberties and laws, are no less regarded, than those who prepared them for us.

5.10.2 A constitution is at length framed by the federal convention, by men whose names alone give us the ideas of wisdom and integrity. By this constitution if it be approved, is America to be guided, and her sons protected. By it will she either flourish in commerce, or sink in bankruptcy. Be respected by foreign powers, or despised by them. At this momentuous crisis when so much is at stake, surely does it become every one, to act towards the general good; but more especially those whose abilities are great, and whose time is unappropriated. 'Till now have I been waiting for others to step forth, comment upon the resolves of the convention, and explain our situation and dependencies. For every subject the greater the lights be in which it may be viewed, the better will it be elucidated. Hence the reason, why I take upon me to touch upon political principles. With pleasure do I view the plan of government offered by the federal convention; as teeming with many blessings; and as being the only one calculated to direct the movements of our rising empire. But let us not be hurried away so much with transport, as to be blind to what our interests commands us to perceive. Let us not approve of laws until we have well considered them, nor ratify hastily what we may never undo! How long have we rioting in liberty cultivated the ideas that each state should be a sovereign power, and that its laws should not be controuled? How long have we seen a succeeding law abrogating a former one, as the prevalence of party, or the gust of passion influenced our assemblies? How long I say have we seen treaties unattended to, recommendations from congress unavailing, and their laws contracted by the operations of the state legislatures? And after these sad events shall we still foster the wild ideas of liberty, which teach us to give up as little as possible of our power, to influence the spring of our confederated government? No: with a generous effort let us shake off our libertinism, and wish only to be free so far, as well regulated laws will permit and defend. Inconsistent is it to have one sovereignty within an other, or that more power should be vested in a part, than is consistent with the union and welfare of the whole. Hence the excellence of our new plan of government shews itself, as taking away the ensigns of royalty from every state, and leaving them only powers which are useful and beneficial.[3] But even in this way of thinking let us not be too generous, for by giving to others too much, we shall make them haughty and overbearing. With a jealous eye are we to observe the proposed president in the resolves of the convention; as one who will be possessed of power, royalty, and interest. The name of king, to be sure he will not have; but many of his qualities will be inherent in him. As commander of the army and navy of the United States, we see him invested with great power. Power which in the hands of a good man will be respected, but in those of a bad one will be feared.—During the recess of the senate he is allowed to fill up all vacancies, by granting commissions. This is what if perverted may be attended with serious consequences. And in particular cases he is allowed to adjourn both houses to an indefinite time.[4] After this, is it to be doubted, whether he shall be eligible when his term of four years shall be expired? Reason and experience forbid it, then let your determinations be fixed accordingly. It may be objected by some, that the resolves of the federal convention, do not say that he may be eligible again. But do they say that he shall never enjoy the office but once? This is not mentioned: he may enjoy it for his life, he may transmit it to his children—when I take a view of past transactions, and adapt them to our present times, my mind informs me that the present crisis demands our most serious consideration. When I consider what is now agitated in Europe, I am to believe that my fears are not badly founded. Thrice happy people if your government be regulated by reason and experience, by rectitude and patriotism! If no ambition be admitted into your councils, but a laudable emulation acting towards the general good—Then shall we see each day productive of some good, and each year strengthen the sinews of the commonwealth. Then shall we see America rise triumphant, and shine with unborrowed splendour—When Rome was so governed, when merit was the guide to offices, and a jealous patriotism reigned throughout each breast; then conscious of her own importance, she was happy; and respected around, she was proclaimed the mistress of the world. We see at that time, no offices of importance (except the dictatorship) were made; but what were restricted in time. The consulship and the tribuneship, those bulwarks of Roman liberty, and springs of Roman actions were confined in duration: and the highest Roman office (the consulship) which was amenable to the laws, was allowed to be possessed only for one year. That jealousy which we should have, and which then the Romans had, would not suffer them to put it in a man's power to be dishonest; would not lull them so much, as to permit their country to be ruined. For many reasons they would only have consuls, from year to year. Should they continue them longer, they feared that their interest and power encreasing with their duration of office, would in the end be subversive of their own liberty. On the other hand, should, they be eligible only for a small time; they imagined the consuls could not have leisure to act against their country: but their desires would be to excell each other, and thereby act for the general good. And as long as Rome was governed by Consuls, so long did she continue to rise in power and reputation. So long did dictators who were even superior to the laws, not forfeit the trust reposed in them. For they were actuated by honor, and restricted by shame. But as soon as a decree of the Senate suffered a Dictator to be perpetual, we see a Caesar arise; enslave his country, and trample upon those whose credulity he had imposed upon. Suffer me now to return to our present situation; suffer yourselves to think unprejudiced of the matter before you. And surely you will conclude that the office of President should not continue longer than four years—but then shall he not be eligible again? By no means—It has been urged already, and it may be so again; that if he be re-eligible, it will be an incitement to good behaviour.[5] Futile is that reasoning which tends to advance that only one, or a few, are fit for the office. America indeed would be poor, if for every year in a century, she had not a different citizen deserving of the presidentship. Should he be eligible for life, or during good behaviour; what room is there left for men equal to him in abilities or integrity, to hope they may arrive at that office? And certainly in a republic, there should be a free access to every high station. It is a right each individual has to exact, because he supports and defends the constitution by which he is governed. Ungenerous is it in that mind which wishes to grasp every honor, impolitic in those who wish to confine them to a few. If a President by the constitution which we are about to make, should be re-eligible; does not the rashness of the design, strike every thinking observer? He may be a good man, and may extend his country's glory: but an end must be put to his career, and if nothing else can, death certainly will. Then if he should not have fixed his power in his family, as I have said may happen: yet a new election which must follow, would probably cause great convulsions; because great interest would be made to attain to an office, which might be enjoyed for life—If we but turn our eyes to the government of Poland, we will see that the openings given for commotions after the demise of her King, are great, and much to be feared. We will see that whole kingdom, then divided into parties; which are equally impelled by interested motives, and wandering from the line of rectitude and patriotism. We will then see, her blood and strength exhausted: not in the prosecution of her own interests, but in basely forwarding the views of surrounding powers. If we turn them from thence to the United Provinces, we will now see them involved in tumult and confusion: we will now see sad effects arising from the cause, of continuing an high officer in his power. We will see him striving to encroach upon the people his constituents, and them endeavouring to bind him faster than he now is—If the President shall hold his office for four years only, and never again: then shall we see each man obey his proper calling, and every thing be placid and serene. He who is chosen will be happy, because he is not envied; and they who have chosen will be also content, because they may arrive to the same station. We shall then see a laudable emulation, predominant among us; and every new Presidentship swell the annals of our country's fame—But that we may view in a proper light some powers of the President, let us revert to the 3d section, of the 2d article, in the proposed constitution. There we will find his unlimited power in adjourning both houses when they disagree "to such time as he shall think proper." A power which when misused will be productive of the most fatal consequences. And to believe that the case of disagreement may not happen, that the members of either house may not be influenced; is to leave ourselves open to a slight contingency. Is to imagine that mankind are not the same at present, as they were eighteen hundred years ago; or that greater patriotism is vested in Americans, then in any other race of men—After Cromwell had in a great measure broken the springs of British government, was not the adjournment of Parliament, sine die, the stroke by which he effectually trampled upon the liberties of Great-Britain? And shall we, when our President is to be possessed of this power by law, add still to his authority, by permitting him to be long in office? I trust my friends, that this will not be the case. I trust that the fear of our own misery, the hope of our own exaltation, and the experience which we have gained from the calamities of others, will so influence our councils, and determine our opinions; as that the reason of what has been advanced, will be evident and alluring—Then shall we see our President, enter upon his office with satisfaction. And as the rising sun adds joy to the creation, so shall his commencement extend the rays of happiness upon all men: and his career be not only productive of honor to himself, but serve that empire for whose welfare he was exalted.

Having already made some observations upon the resolves of the Federal Convention, I hoped to have rested in tranquility. The truths which I spread forth to the general view lately, were self-evident; and do not call upon me now to defend them. So that in vain should Maecenas attempt to draw me forth into action, or his weak insinuations provoke me to a reply; were I not prompted to take notice of his opposition, more by what the Public might imagine by my silence, than the fear that his arguments had done away my 5.10.3

positions, or that his aspersions would rest with generous breasts.[6] When I saw so respectable a Signature in a paper to day, I cannot but confess that

Jure perhorrui
Late conspicuum tollere verticem,
Maecenas equitum decus![7]

I was afraid lest I had left myself open to the confutations of so shrewed a Judge, or advanced doctrines not tenable, when opposed by so great an observer of mankind—However, after having run his scribling over, I am led to believe, that his hopes will be compleatly frustrated; and his work, like the baseless fabrick of a vision, pass away, without any good thing to recommend it, besides an empty name. He says "he means to take into consideration the production of a writer, &c." Have his reasonings tended to do away the main point of that writer's address, (viz.) that the President should not be re-eligible? Or have they only shewn a malevolence, which cannot be pardoned, although it may be overlooked? Are his arguments pointing to one mark, or are they wandering and unconnected?—He opposes Cato, but he asserts that "Frequency of election is the great preservative of the people's liberties." How contradictory then is he to himself? Cato has written for no other cause, than to investigate the nature and consequences of elections; and to prove by conclusions drawn from good premises, the impolicy of re-electing the President.—But it is asserted, that "Virtue is the principle of a Republic." In Plato's imaginary one, perhaps such an assertion might have had its weight; but in other Republics, and in modern times, I deny that Virtue alone is adequate to tumultuous operations—I say that mankind are more actuated by the fear of punishment, than the hope of reward; consequently that laws inflicting penalties, and providing against exigencies, are more forcible, than sweet allurements to the general good.[8] Even supposing that the present age were entirely virtuous, and patriotic; are we to rest so supine with that conviction, as to pay no regard to the calls of posterity? Much has been done already, to snatch us from the oppressions of a Tyrant; but still a great deal is unfinished. We are obligated to defend to our children, by our wisdom, what we have gained by our valour; and to hand down to them a well regulated government. If we let slip this opportunity, and do not protect our constitution from every advantage being taken of it, in a future day we will surely repent our folly. We will see what a miserable thing it is when a law is vague and improperly penned. And as a learned Marquis expresses himself, we shall not enjoy the benefit of being governed by the letter of the law, but be led along according to the prevalence of faction, or the gust of passion.[9] And I dare assert, that although the other parts of the intended constitution be wisely determined; yet if the Presidentship be heedlessly attended to, as trusting to virtuous Citizens, and he be re-eligible; if ever America be enslaved by any fault in her constitution, it will be by the ambition of a President.

It is denied, and that boldly by my opponent, that the President would be cloathed with the robes of Royalty—Well may he deny, what has never been asserted—If Cato said that he would be possessed of Royalty, he afterwards informed the Public how he would be understood. He pointed out regal qualities with which the President would be invested, and so far he would be cloathed with Royalty. But in order to give some colour to his assertions, Maecenas has quoted Montesquieu, and shewn the shallowness of his reasoning.[10] Truth is ever apparent, it requires no borrowed garb, no authorities to support her intrinsick grandeur; but falshood ever resorts to what she thinks will protect, and which in the end, like an ungrateful friend, will desert her when she has most need of assistance. The proper definition of Royalty is "the administration of certain powers appertaining to the most exalted station," and whoever possesses any of these, is possessed in a greater or less degree of Royalty. But my oppugner says "that no title of nobility shall be granted by the Congress, and no person holding any office under Congress shall accept any title from any foreign King, State, or Empire." As he has given me permission, I will refer, and beg him to do so likewise, to the 9th Sect. of the 1st Art, of the resolves of the convention: where he will find there is still an opening for dignities and titles with the consent of Congress, which he has artfully skipped over, and forgotten to mention. When a writer of this sort steps forth, giving one half of the Text he comments upon, and suppressing the other if it be not for his purpose; are we not to conclude that his intent is more to puzzle with opposition, than to convince with fair reasoning? Are we not to imagine that his desire is more to thwart public measures, than to be actuated by generous motives to the public weal? With regard to what Cato advanced in a former paper, what was the end he had in view? Was it not proving the dangers attending the re-election of a President? Has Maecenas by his false conclusions, and badly applied arguments, weakened his reasons tending to that point? No. As waves following waves are nevertheless broken, and turned aside by the opposing rock; so have all Maecenas's arguments been foiled by truths, and his every effort rendered feeble, and ineffectual. His writing is half filled up with quotations, which prove nothing even in his own favor: And his conclusion takes away even what ground he might have gained: for it shews that he did not know what he intended to confute. And he finishes with saying, "that from what he has said, the President will have no powers, but which are essentially necessary for the executory department."[11] Is it not distressing that I must inform this new warrior in the lists of opposition, that Cato never opposed any of the President's powers; for he saw that an officer without power, would be corpus sine capite. His only endeavours were to set forth those powers, in such a light: as to persuade his countrymen of the necessity of restricting the President in the enjoyment of his office. It was to that point his whole attention was bent, and there he hopes now to come off victorious. So that notwithstanding his opponents thoughtful motto, and asserting style; his solecisms and his sophistical reasoning, he has wandered from his mark, and Parturient montes, nascetur-ridiculus mus.[12]

5.10.5 Of the Public, now do I take my leave; hoping that I have advanced nothing, which modesty did not dictate, and patriotism support. And trusting that if any thing unguarded may have escaped me, it will be imputed to the impetuosity of passions eager to advance my Country's good; than to any sinister views, which can never find a resting place in the breast of Cato.

Essay by Tamony

VIRGINIA INDEPENDENT CHRONICLE
9 January 1788

This essay is a rather crude denunciation of the provisions for the Executive in the proposed Constitution; it is of some small interest because it is referred to by Publius in The Federalist no. 69, p. 465n. The essay was reprinted in the Philadelphia Independent Gazetter on 1 February, from which it was picked up and reprinted by the New York Journal on 8 February.

To the Freeholders of America.

When important subjects demand discussion, they ought to be treated with coolness and moderation, reason should be alone appealed to, and meet no interruption from passion or prejudice. 5.11.1

Those who contend for the new Constitution without amendment think differently, or must condemn their own assertions, for in place of ascertaining how natural rights are secured, or government prudently restrained, they continually exclaim in a tone that assumes authority, "rejection must precipitate into the gulphs of destruction,—adoption leads to national happiness and dignity—men whose fortunes are involved may dread an effective administration and join those who under a fœderal system, would lose an importance dearer to them, than the welfare of their country."

Listen Americans, with caution to declamatory invective, patriotism scorns such language, and recoils from the idea of inflaming prejudice to reduce reflection, the interest of your country requires mental exertion, joined to a manly firmness, that may be compared to the steadiness of time, rises superior to the keenness of death. 5.11.2

Such sentiments exalt human nature, they have acquired one glorious revolution, and must be banished from your breasts, before you can embrace a Constitution, which does not secure a minority of the states, from local oppression, [and] is open to the encroachments of aristocracy, the ambition of an individual.

5.11.3 Happily for America the enlightened wisdom of a Virginia Assembly, has empowered their constituents, to investigate the truth or falsehood of the above assertions, by enacting that their Convention should proceed to a full discussion, and be freed from those fetters artifice wished to impose, under the specious pretence, of confining debate within the compass of absolute rejection or adoption.

5.11.4 The extent thus opened for speculative enquiry, joined to real magnitude in the object, may be styled by enthusiasm or horizon, [which] the eyes of few mens understanding can steadily behold[;] the expression, though poetically just, reduced to common sense, means importance, and instead of superseding the duty incumbent on freeholders to judge for themselves, renders the neglect of doing so, treason against their country. What man capable of enjoying that liberty Divine Providence gives as common inheritance to mankind, will at such a crisis restrain his mental faculties from examining a temple built by men equally mortal with himself, for the residence of constitutional freedom, despotism may enjoin a silent reverence, free governments command enquiry, and owe existence to that animation enquiry creates. That citizen who feels and avows such a maxim, need not apologize for collecting the following observations on the fœderal fabric.

5.11.5 Force seems its ruling principle—Forts and garrisons are provided for, a standing army must follow, the celebrated Doctor Price thus addresses Americans, "God forbid that standing armies should ever find an establishment in America[. T]hey are every where the grand support of arbitrary power and the chief source of the depression of mankind[. N]o wise people will trust their defence out of their own hands, or consent to hold their rights at the mercy of armed slaves."[1]

5.11.6 The office of president is treated with levity and intimated to be a machine calculated for state pageantry—Suffer me to view the commander of the fleets and armies of America, with a reverential awe inspired by the contemplation of his great prerogatives, though not dignified with the magic name of King, he will possess more supreme power, than Great Britain allows her hereditary monarchs, who derive ability to support an army from annual supplies, and owe the command of one to an annual mutiny law.[2] The American President may be granted supplies for two years, and his command of a standing army is unrestrained by law or limitation.

5.11.7 As to supplies, the term may be shortened; but such a measure implying want of confidence in the first magistrate, will probably be postponed till the hour of danger arrives and commonwealths be exposed to that hazardous situation, emphatically called deathbed repentance. Expectation from such a source may be deemed visionary, and reflection must expel even hope to confess, a mutiny law must owe existence to a general Convention, as the mode prescribed by article the 5th—for the president being by the people made commander of an army, is not subject in that command to a legislative body. Pause America—suspend a final affirmation, till you contemplate what may ensue—Do not contemn the declarations of Locke, Sydney, Montesquieu, Raynal, whose writings are legacies to the present and future ages, they unite in asserting that annual supplies and an annual mutiny law, are the chief dykes man's sagacity can raise against that torrent of despotism, which continually attempts to deluge the rights of individuals. You are told impeachment will stem the flood, a legislative body, sixty-five in number, are to march in formidable array, to a tribunal of twenty-six, and summons the commander of an army sworn to obey him—the event can be foreseen without suspicion of second sight, for anticipation may with confidence announce, that the bauble of a mace, hazarded in the mouth of a mortar, would be speedily conveyed, to that "bourn from whence no traveller returns."[3]

Had the Constitution said, the president can do no wrong, nor shall he be re-elected—corruption in the man might be guarded against by that rotation, which inculcates the idea of certain dissolution, and a council answerable to the people for consenting to, or advising measures, would cautiously give their sanction to a ruler whose official shield, must inevitably revert to dust. 5.11.8

Speeches of Rawlins Lowndes in the South Carolina Legislature

January 1788

In South Carolina, on 16, 17, and 18 January 1788, the House of Representatives debated whether or not to provide for a convention to consider the proposed Constitution. Rawlins Lowndes, the prominent South Carolina lawyer, judge, stateman, and former state president, did not expect his pro-Constitution constituents in Charleston to elect him to the convention and therefore took advantage of the legislative debate to lay out his reasons for opposition. Confronted by a number of able Federalists, Lowndes carried the opposition almost single-handed.[1] His speeches are especially interesting for their thoughtful presentation of the Southern point of view. All that has been preserved of these speeches, except for a couple of brief interventions in debate, is reprinted here, taken from the contemporary publication of the debates, Debates Which Arose in the House of Representatives of South Carolina on the Constitution Framed for the United States by a Convention of Delegates Assembled at Philadelphia (Charleston 1788) 15–17, 25–28, 39–41.[2]

It appears that Lowndes was in fact elected to the ratifying convention but declined to serve.[3] "He knew that he had failed, and accepted defeat."[4] He wished, he said in the last speech printed here, "for no other epitaph than to have inscribed on his tomb, here lies the man that opposed the Constitution, because it was ruinous to the liberty of America."

1. Yet in the decisive and very close (76 yes and 75 no) vote on whether to call a convention on 12 May 1788, Lowndes voted yes, thus throwing away, in the words of one commentator, "the only chance offered him of keeping South Carolina out of the Federal Union" (review of Ravenel's The Life and Times of William Lowndes in The South Carolina Historical and Genealogical Magazine II [1901], 252). It does not seem possible to reconstruct satisfactorily his reasons for this action or for his absence from the convention that finally met (see below, note 3). It may be that Lowndes simply felt that he could not stem the tide and that no practical purpose was to be served by persisting in an unpopular opposition; this is Rutland's view, The Ordeal of the Constitution 165.

2. This publication is reprinted in Elliot IV, 253–342. While the text of Lowndes' speeches is taken from the original 1788 edition, references to the debate in the notes that follow will be made to the more accessible Elliot.

3. There is a good deal of confusion about the reason for Lowndes' absence from the convention. George C. Rogers, Jr., has said that Lowndes' constituents "refused to elect him to the ratification convention." ("South Carolina Ratifies the Federal Constitution" Proceedings of the South Carolina Historical Association, 1961, p. 58). This seems to be confirmed by Lowndes' letter to General John Lamb of 21 June 1788 (in Leake, Memoir of the Life and Times of General John Lamb 308), to the effect that an open avowal of his sentiments did not meet with the concurrence of his "constituents in Charleston, and I was, therefore, rejected in their choice of delegates for the Convention." On the other hand, Aedanus Burke wrote to Lamb on 23 June 1788 "that Mr. Lowndes would not serve in the Convention, declining to take his seat; out of disgust to some leading men in the parish that sent him, he abandoned a Cause, which, I believe, he thought a just one" (John Lamb Papers). And Mrs. St. Julien Ravenel (Life and Times of William Lowndes of South Carolina [Boston 1901] 32) says that Lowndes "refused to serve" in the ratifying convention, that "the people of St. Bartholomew's were anxious to send him, but he refused firmly." The Dictionary of American Biography (XI, 472–73) also reports, "though he was elected in the constitutional convention he did not serve." The facts seem to be that Lowndes was rejected in Charleston; that he was elected, perhaps without his consent, by his home parish of Saint Bartholomew's (which he had also represented in the South Carolina Legislature), but that he declined to serve. The probability of this explanation is strengthened by a manuscript list of "members of the convention" in South Carolina in May 1788, located in the South Carolinian Library, University of South Carolina, on which, I am informed by Professor Carl Vipperman, Lowndes' name was included among the delegates from Saint Bartholomew but then crossed out and another name added, suggesting that Lowndes was elected but declined to serve, for reasons that remain obscure. See Rutland, The Ordeal of the Constitution 166.

4. Ravenel, Life and Times of William Lowndes of South Carolina 32.

Mr. Lowndes desired gentlemen to consider that his antagonists were 5.12.1
mostly gentlemen of the law, who were capable of giving ingenious explanations to such points as they wished to have adopted.[1] He explained his opinion relative to treaties to be, that no treaty concluded contrary to the express laws of the land could be valid. The king of England, when he concluded one, did not think himself warranted to go further than to promise that he would endeavor to induce his parliament to sanction it. The security of a republic is jealousy; for its ruin may be expected from unsuspecting security; let us not therefore receive this proferred system with implicit confidence, as carrying with it the stamp of superior perfection; rather let us compare it with what we already possess with what we are offered for it. We are now under government of a most excellent constitution—one that had stood the test of time, and carried us through difficulties generally supposed to be insurmountable—one that had raised us high in the eyes of all nations, and given to us the enviable blessings of liberty and independence—a constitution sent like a blessing from heaven, yet we were impatient to change it for another, that vested power in a few men to pull down that fabric which we had raised at the expence of our blood.[2] Charters ought to be considered as sacred things; in England an attempt was made to alter the charter of the East India company, but they invoked heaven and earth in their cause—moved lords, nay even the king in their behalf, and thus averted the ruin with which they were threatened. It had been said, that this new government was to be considered as an experiment;[3] he really was afraid it would prove a fatal one to our peace and happiness—an experiment! what risque the loss of political existence on experiment? No, Sir, if we are to make experiments, rather let them be such as may do good, but which cannot possibly do any injury to us or our posterity.[4] So far from having any expectation of success from such experiments, he sincerely believed that when this new constitution should be adopted, the sun of the southern states would set never to rise again. To prove this, he observed, that six of the eastern states formed a majority in the house of representatives (in the enumeration he passed Rhode Island, and included Pennsylvania.) Now was it consonant with reason—with wisdom—with policy, to suppose that in a legislature where a majority of persons sat whose interests were greatly different from ours, that we had the smallest chance of receiving adequate advantages? certainly not. He believed the gentlemen that went from this state to represent us in the convention, possessed as much integrity, and stood as high in point of character as any gentlemen that could have been selected; and he also believed, that they had done every thing in their power to procure for us a proportionate share in this new government; but the very little which they had gained proved what we might expect in future; and that the interest of the Northern states would so predominate, as to divest us of any pretensions to the title of a republic. In the first place, what cause was there for jealousy of our importing negroes? Why confine us to 20 years, or rather why limit us at all? For his part he thought this trade could be justified on the principles of religion, humanity and justice; for certainly to translate a set of human beings from a bad country to a better, was fulfilling every part of those principles.[5] But they don't like our slaves, because they have none themselves, and therefore want to exclude us from this great advantage; why should the southern states allow of this without the consent of nine states? (Judge Pendleton observed, that only three states, Georgia, South Carolina, and North Carolina, allowed the importation of negroes, Virginia had a clause in her constitution for this purpose, and Maryland, he believed, even before the war, prohibited them.) Mr. Lowndes observed, that we had a law prohibiting the importation of negroes for three years, a law he greatly approved of, but there was no reason offered why the southern states might not find it necessary to alter their conduct, and open their ports.—Without negroes this state would degenerate into one of the most contemptible on the union, and cited an expression that fell from general Pinckney, on a former debate, that whilst there remained one acre of swamp land in South Carolina, he should raise his voice against restricting the importation of negroes. Even in granting the importation for 20 years, care had been taken to make us pay for this indulgence, each negro being liable on importation to pay a duty not exceeding ten dollars, and in addition to this were liable to a capitation tax. Negroes were our wealth, our only natural resource, yet behold how our kind friends in the North were determined soon to tie up our hands, and drain us of what we had.[6]—The Eastern states drew their means of subsistence in a great measure from their shipping, and on that head they had been particularly careful not to allow of any burthens—they were not to pay tonnage or duties, no not even the form of clearing out—all ports were free and open to them! Why then call this a reciprocal bargain, which took all from one party to bestow it on the other? (Major Butler observed, that they were to pay five per cent. impost) This Mr. Lowndes proved must fall upon the consumer. They are to be the carriers, and we being the consumers, therefore all expences would fall upon us. A great number of gentlemen were captivated with this new constitution, because those who were in debt would be compelled to pay; others pleased themselves with the reflection that no more confiscation laws could be passed; but those were small advantages in proportion to evils that might be apprehended from the laws that might be passed by Congress, whenever there was a majority of representatives from the Eastern states, who were governed by prejudices and ideas extremely different from ours. He was afraid in the present instance that so much partiality prevailed for this new constitution, that opposition from him would be fruitless; however he felt so much the importance of the subject, that he hoped the house would indulge him in a few words to take a view comparatively of the old constitution and the new one, in point of modesty.—Congress, labouring under many difficulties, asked to regulate commerce for 21 years, when the power reverted into the hands of those who originally gave it; but this infallible new constitution eased us of any more trouble, for it was to regulate commerce ad infinitum; and thus called upon us to pledge ourselves and posterity forever in support of their measures; so that when our local legislature had dwindled down to the confined powers of a corporation, we should be liable to taxes and excise; not perhaps payable in paper, but in specie. However they need not be uneasy, since every thing would be managed in future by great men, and great men every body knew were incapable of acting under influence of mistake or prejudice—they always were infallible—so that if at any future period we should smart under laws which bore hard upon us, and think proper to remonstrate, the answer would probably be—Go, you are totally incapable of managing for yourselves—go mind your private affairs—trouble not yourselves with public concerns—mind your business—the latter expression was already the motto of some coppers in circulation, and he thought it would soon be the style of language held out towards the southern states. The honorable member apologized for going into the merits of this new constitution, when it was ultimately to be decided on by another tribunal, but understanding that he differed in opinion with his constituents, who were opposed to electing any person as a member of the convention that did not approve of the proposed plan of government; he should not therefore have an opportunity of expressing those sentiments which occurred to him on considering the plan for a new federal government. But if it was sanctioned by the people it would have his hearty concurrence and support. He was very much originally against a declaration of independency—he also opposed the instalment law, but when they received the approbation of the people, it became his duty as a good citizen to promote their due observance.

5.12.2 Mr. Lowndes declared himself almost willing to give up his post; finding he was opposed by such a phalanx of able antagonists, any one of them possessing sufficient abilities to contend with him, but as a number of respectable members, men of good sense, though not in the habit of speaking in public, had requested that he would state his sentiments, for the purpose of gaining information on such points as seemed to require it, rather in compliance therefore with their wishes than any inclination on his part, he should make a few further observations on the subject. Much had been said from different parts of the house against the old confederation, that it was such a futile, inefficient, impolitic government as to render us the objects of ridicule and contempt in the eyes of other nations; he could not agree to this, because there not did appear any evidence of the fact, and because the names of those gentlemen who had signed the old confederation were eminent for patriotism, virtue and wisdom; as much so as any set of men that could be found in America, and their prudence and wisdom particularly appeared in the care which they had taken sacredly to gaurantee the sovreignty of each state. The treaty of peace expressly agreed to acknowledge us as free, sovereign and independent states,[7] which privileges we lived at present in the exercise of; but this new constitution at once swept those privileges away, being sovereign over all, so that this state will dwindle into a mere skeleton of what it was; its legislative powers would be pared down to little more than those now vested in the corporation; and he should value the honor of a seat in the legislature in no higher estimation than a seat in the city council. Adverting to the powers given to the president, he considered them as enormous, particularly in being allowed to interfere in the election of members in the house of representatives; astonishing that we had not this reserved to us, when the senators were to be chosen from that body—things might be so managed that the different legislatures should be limited to the passing a few laws for regulating ferries and roads. The honorable gentleman went into an investigation of the weight of our representation in the proposed government, which he thought would be merely virtual, similar to what we were allowed in England, whilst under the British government; we were then told that we were represented in parliament, and this would in the event prove just such another. The mode of chosing senators was exceedingly exceptionable; it had been the practice formerly to chuse the senate or council for this state from that house, which practice proved so inconvenient and oppressive, that when we framed our present constitution, great care was taken to vest the power of electing the senate originally with the people, as the best plan for securing their rights and privileges. He wished to know in what manner it was proposed to elect the five representatives—was it [to] be done in this city—or would some districts return one member, and others none at all? Still greater difficulties would be found in the choice of a president, because he must have a majority of 91 votes in his favor. For the first president there was one man to whom all America looked up, (General Washington,) and for whom he most heartily should vote; but after that gentleman's administration ceased, where could they point out another so highly respected as to concenter a majority of 91 persons in his favor, and if no gentleman should be fully returned, then the government must stand still.—He went over much of the ground which he had trod the preceding day, relative to the eastern states having been so guarded in what they had conceded to gain the regulation of our commerce, which threw into their hands the carrying trade, and put it in their power to lay us under payment of whatever freightage they thought proper to impose; it was their interest to do so, and no person could doubt but they would promote it by every means in their power. He wished our delegates had sufficiently attended to this point in the convention, had been more attentive to this object; and taken care to have it expressed in this constitution that all our ports were open to all nations; instead of putting us in the power of a set of men who may fritter away the value of our produce to little or nothing, by compelling payment of exorbitant freightage. Neither did he believe it was in the power of the Eastern states to furnish a sufficient number of ships to carry our produce; it was indeed a general way of talking that the Eastern states had a great number of seamen—a vast number of ships, but where were they? Why did not they come here now when ships are greatly wanted? he should always wish to give them a preference, and so no doubt would many other gentlemen, and yet very few ships came here from the Eastern states. Another exceptionable point was, that we were to give up the power of taxing ourselves. During our connexion with Great Britain, she left us the power of raising money in any way most convenient: a certain sum was only required to defray the public wants, but no mode of collecting it ever prescribed. In this new constitution every thing is transferred, not so much power being left us as Lord North offered to guarantee to us in his conciliatory plan. Look at the articles of union ratified between England and Scotland; how cautiously had the latter taken care of her interest in reserving all the forms of law—her representation in parliament—the right of taxation—the management of her revenue—and all her local and municipal interests.[8] Why take from us the right of paying our delegates, and pay them from the federal treasury? He remembered formerly what a flame was raised in Massachusetts, on account of Great Britain assuming the payment of salaries to judges and other state officers; and that this conduct was considered as originating in a design to destroy the independence of their government. Our local expences had been nearly defrayed by our impost duty, but now that this was given away, and thrown into a general fund, for the use of all the states indiscriminately, we should be obliged to augment our taxes to carry on our local government, notwithstanding we were to pay a poll tax for our negroes. Paper money too was another article of restraint, and a popular point with many; but what evils had we ever experienced by issuing a little paper money to relieve ourselves from any exigency that pressed us? We had now a circulating medium which every body took, we used formerly to issue paper bills every year, and recal them every five, with great convenience and advantage—had not paper money carried us triumphantly through the war—extricated us from difficulties generally supposed to be insurmountable, and fully established us in our independence, and now every thing is so changed that an entire stop must be put to any more paper emissions, however great our distress may be. It was true no article of the constitution declared there should not be jury trials in civil cases, yet this must be implied, because it stated that all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be tried by a jury, but even if trials by jury were allowed, could any person rest satisfied with a mode of trial which prevents the parties from being obliged to bring a cause for discussion before a jury of men chosen from the vicinage, in a manner conformable to the present administration of justice, which had stood the test of time and experience, and ever been highly approved of. Mr. Lowndes expatiated some time on the nature of compacts—the sacred light in which they were held by all nations, and solemnly called on the house to consider whether it would not be better to add strength to the old confederation, instead of hastily adopting another? asking, whether a man could be looked on as wise, who, possessing a magnificent building, upon discovering a flaw, instead of repairing the injury should pull it down, and build another? Indeed he could not understand with what propriety the convention proceeded to change the confederation; for every person with whom he had conversed on this subject concurred in opinion that the sole object of appointing a convention was to enquire what alterations were necessary in the confederation, in order that it might answer those salutary purposes for which it was originally intended.—He recommended, that another convention should be called, and as the general sense of America appeared now to be known, every objection could be met on fair grounds, and adequate remedies applied where necessary; this mode of proceeding would conciliate all parties because it was candid, and had a more obvious tendency to do away all inconveniencies, than the adoption of a government which perhaps might require the bayonet to enforce it; for it could not be expected that the people, who had disregarded the requisitions of congress, tho' expressed in language the most elegant and forcible that he ever remembered to have read, would be more obedient to the government until an irresistible force compelled them to do so. Mr. Lowndes concluded a long speech with a glowing eulogy on the old confederation, and challenged his opponents, whilst one state objected, to get over the section which said, "the articles of this confederation shall be inviolably observed in every state, and the union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration, at any time hereafter be made in any of them, unless such alterations be agreed to in a congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every state."[9]

18 January 1788

Mr. Lowndes observed, that he had been accused of obstinacy in standing out against such a formidable opposition, but he could sincerely assure the house that he was as open to conviction as any gentleman on that floor; yet he never would allow himself to be drawn into the adoption of specious arguments, for such he considered many of those now opposed against him to be. Indeed some gentlemen had departed from their usual candor in giving an interpretation to his arguments which they did not merit. In one instance it had been stated as if he was of opinion that treaties had not the force of law;[10] this was going too far; he did not recollect that he asserted any more than that the king of Great Britain had not a legal power to ratify any treaty which trenched on the fundamental laws of the country. He supposed a case under the dispensing act of William and Mary, asking, if the king had made a treaty with the Roman Catholics, could that which was excepted by the law ever be considered as paramount. The honorable gentleman again took an ample review of the old confederation, on which he dwelt with fervency for some time, and ridiculed the depraved inconstancy of those who pant for the change. Great stress was laid on the admirable checks which guarded us under the new constitution from the encroachments of tyranny, but too many checks in a political machine must produce the same confusion as in a mechanical one, that of throwing all into confusion. But supposing we considered ourselves so much aggrieved as to reduce us to the necessity of insisting on redress? what probability had we of relief? Very little indeed.—In the revolving on misfortune some little gleams of comfort resulted from an hope of being able to resort to an impartial tribunal for redress; but pray what reason was there for expectancy that in congress the interests of five southern states would be considered in a preferable point of view to the nine Eastern ones? With respect to migration from the Eastern states to the Northern [Southern?] ones,[11] he did not believe people would ever flock here in such considerable numbers, because our country had generally proved so uncomfortable, from the excessive heats, that our acquaintance during the heats is rather shunned than solicited. The honorable gentleman mentioned that he had sent for a person from Europe, who did not long survive his introduction here, falling a sacrifice to the baneful effects of fogs and swamps, so that from our limitation of importing negroes after the term of twenty years, instead of rising in representation we should gradually degenerate. He treated those fears of our falling a prey to foreigners as one of those arguments tending to precipitate us into measures inimical to our natural interest; for was it to be supposed that the policy of France would ever suffer America to become an appendage of the crown of Great Britain; or that Great Britain, equally jealous of France, would permit her to reduce us to subjection!—Our danger of ruin should rather be apprehended from dissentions amongst ourselves—from our running into debt without any intention to pay; that was the rock on which we might split, rather than foreign enemies; and therefore all those arguments for establishing the necessity of a navy and standing army were nugatory and entitled to very little attention.[12]

5.12.4 It was urged, that until we had a navy powerful enough to protect us, our liberties and property were held only on courtesy; but if gentlemen adverted where this navy, so necessary, was to come from, not from the southern states, but the northern ones, they would easily perceive to whom this country would belong. It was true, the old confederation was a mere paper defence, but then it was a good proof on our behalf if we were overcome by unmerited wrongs. Some had made this a question, will you join or will you be single? for his part he did not think matters had come to such a crisis; rather let us comply with our federal connection, which not yet being broken admits of being strengthened. A gentleman had instanced Vattel, in support of his argument, and laid down from that author an opinion, that where parties engaged in the performance of an obligation, should any one of them fly off from his agreement, that then the original compact was null and void.[13] He had ingeniously applied this to our present continental situation, and contended, that as some of the states acted in a refractory manner towards the continental union, and obstinately refused a compliance on their parts with solemn obligations, that of course the confederation was virtually dissolved; but Vattel merely recited such a case as where only a part of a confederation was broken; whereas ours was totally different, every state in the union having been uniform in refusing a compliance with the requisition of congress. Some gentlemen had advanced a set of assertions to prove that the eastern states had greatly suffered in the war,[14] pray how had they suffered? did they not draw from the continental treasury large sums of money? was not every expence incurred by them defrayed out of the continental coffers? Another great advantage held out was, that we should be eased in future from the obligation and difficulty of defraying the expences of delegates; had we gained so much by this, when we had given up the very means of furnishing this sort of supply, formerly in our option? As to the taxes, undoubtedly they must be increased under this new government: we paid at present 2 dollars per head upon our negroes, but the expences attending our pompous government might increase this expence into six dollars per head, and this enormous sum collected by a sort of foreign power; for did any man that knew America suppose such tax will be easily paid? But if there was such an universal propensity to set up this golden image, why delay its inauguration? Let us at once go plump into adoration of it—let us at once surrender every right which we at present possess. A material objection of his to the offered plan was that the president would have a power to call both houses at what time and place he thought proper; suppose a political cause for partiality, might he not so arrange things, as to carry a favorite point, by assembling the federal government to the ruin or detriment of those states he meant to crush, and laws be enacted before those in extreme parts of the country knew any thing of their tendency; surely some restrictions as to time of meeting, should have been specified. The president had also the power of adjourning to any day that he thought proper. In our old constitution no such power was given to the chief magistrate to adjourn or dissolve. On the whole this was the best preparatory plan for a monarchical government that he had read; the constitution of Great Britain he considered as the best monarchical one that he ever perused, and this new government came so near to it, that instead of our changing from a republic to a monarchy, it was what every body must naturally expect—How easy the transition, no difficulty occurred in finding a king; the president was the man proper for this appointment. The senate hail him king, constituted according to Mr. Adams's description, from the well born,[15] will naturally say to one another, "You see how we are situated, certainly it is for our country's benefit that we shall be all lords, and lords they are."

Mr. Lowndes concluded his speech with thanking the house for their very great indulgence in permitting him to take up so much time. He hoped that the vast importance of the subject would plead his excuse; he also thanked those gentlemen on the other side of the question for the candid, fair manner in which they had answered his arguments. Popularity was what he never courted, but on this point he spoke merely to point out those dangers to which his fellow citizens were exposed; dangers that were so evident, that when he ceased to exist, he wished for no other epitaph than to have inscribed on his tomb, here lies the man that opposed the constitution, because it was ruinous to the liberty of America. 5.12.5

1. Lowndes had objected to the power of the President and a small number of senators (ten, being two-thirds of a quorum of fourteen) to conclude treaties, which would become part of the supreme law of the land, a power not enjoyed by the most despotic prince. He was challenged by several members who contended that treaties were supreme law under the Articles of Confederation and were thus treated by state judges and that the kings of England and France did in fact have the power to conclude binding treaties without parliamentary assent. This subject was discussed at length on the following day by General Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, Elliot IV, 277–81.

2. Henry 5.16.2. Chancellor John Matthews "confessed himself astonished at hearing such encomiums on the Articles of Confederation, as if they had carried us victoriously through the war, when, in fact, they were not ratified until the year 1781; and if the Confederation had been in force in 1776, this country would have inevitably been lost, because, under it, Congress had not authority to give General Washington the powers of a dictator at Valley Forge. Surely the honorable gentleman must be sensible that the success of Congress depended on the explicit confidence of the people; the voice of Congress had the force of law, and was cheerfully and readily obeyed." Elliot IV, 298. See also E. Rutledge, ibid. 274–75, and General Pinckney, ibid. 281–82. On the sacredness of contracts and the dangers of innovation see Republican Federalist 4.13.15 and n. 11.

3. Charles Pinckney, who led off the debate, contended that the question of the limits to which a republic might extend, uniting liberty and safety, was to be tried for the first time by the United States. Elliot IV, 262.

4. Mr. Edward Rutledge replied: "The gentleman would have done well to have defined the kind of power that could do no harm. The very idea of power included a possibility of doing harm; and if the gentleman would show the power that could do no harm, he would at once discover it to be a power which could do no good." Elliot IV, 276.

5. This argument was strikingly rare during the debate over the Constitution, in contrast to later periods. See Martin 2.4.65 n. 24. See Herbert J. Storing, "Slavery and the Moral Foundations of the American Republic," in The Moral Foundations of the American Republic, ed. Robert Horwitz (Charlottesville 1977).

6. General Pinckney replied: "I am of the same opinion now as I was two years ago, when I used the expressions the gentleman has quoted—that, while there remained one acre of swamp-land uncleared of South Carolina, I would raise my voice against restricting the importation of negroes. I am as thoroughly convinced as that gentleman is, that the nature of our climate, and the flat, swampy situation of our country, obliges us to cultivate our lands with negroes, and that without them South Carolina would soon be a desert waste. . . . It was alleged, by some of the members who opposed an unlimited importation, that slaves increased the weakness of any state who admitted them; that they were a dangerous species of property, which an invading enemy could easily turn against ourselves and the neighboring states; and that, as we were allowed a representation for them in the House of Representatives, our influence in government would be increased in proportion as we were less able to defend ourselves. 'Show some period,' said the members from the Eastern states, 'when it may be in our power to put a stop, if we please, to the importation of this weakness, and we will endeavor, for your convenience, to restrain the religious and political prejudices of our people on this subject.' . . .

"By this settlement [incorporated into the Constitution] we have secured an unlimited importation of negroes for twenty years. Nor is it declared that the importation shall be then stopped; it may be continued. We have a security that the general government can never emancipate them, for no such authority is granted; and it is admitted on all hands, that the general government has no powers but what are expressly granted by the Constitution, and that all rights not expressed were reserved by the several states. We have obtained a right to recover our slaves in whatever part of America they may take refuge, which is a right we had not before. In short, considering all circumstances, we have made the best terms for the security of this species of property it was in our power to make. We would have made better if we could; but, on the whole, I do not think them bad." Elliot IV, 285–86.

See also the argument by Barnwell that because of the interest of the North in the carrying trade the slave trade will never be abolished unless the Southern states decide to do it. Ibid. 296–97.

7. In the Treaty of Peace of 3 September 1783, "His Britannic Majesty acknowledges the said United States, viz. [naming them] to be free, sovereign, and independent States." William M. Malloy, ed., Treaties, Conventions [etc.] (Washington 1910) I, 587. General Pinckney denied what he took to be Lowndes' implication that "our independence had been granted us by the king of Great Britain," maintaining that the treaty does not grant but only acknowledges United States independence. Independence should be dated, Pinckney contended in lyrical terms, from the Declaration of Independence, in which the several states are not named, "as if it was intended to impress this maxim on America, that our freedom and independence arose from our union, and that without it we could neither be free nor independent. Let us, then, consider all attempts to weaken this Union, by maintaining that each state is separately and individually independent, as a species of political heresy, which can never benefit us, but may bring on us the most serious distresses." Elliot IV, 301–2.

8. See Edward Rutledge, Elliot IV, 298–300.

9. Articles of Confederation, Art. XIII. See Republican Federalist 4.13.10 n. 6.

10. This probably refers to remarks of General Pinckney; see Elliot IV, 277–81.

11. Mr. Edward Rutledge responded, "Several of the Northern States were already full of people: it was otherwise with us; the migrations to the south were immense, and we should, in the course of a few years, rise high in our representation, whilst other states would keep their present position." Elliot IV, 276–77.

12. Both General Pinckney and Edward Rutledge argued that a navy would be needed to maintain American independence. Ibid. 283–85, 299.

13. The reference is probably to General Pinckney who, in the speech preceding this one of Lowndes, had said: "The honorable gentleman says, compacts should be binding, and that the Confederation was a compact. It was so; but it was a compact that had been repeatedly broken by every state in the Union; and all the writers on the laws of nations agree that, when the parties to a treaty violate it, it is no longer binding." Ibid. 308. While General Pinckney is not reported as referring specifically to Vattel here, he did so earlier in the debates on the general obligation of compacts. Ibid. 278.

14. Mr. Robert Barnwell had paid eloquent tribute to the aid of the Eastern states to the Union and to the South: "When we stood with the spirit, but weakness, of youth, they supported us with the vigor and prudence of age. . . . He saw not a man who did not know that the shackles of the south were broken asunder by the arms of the north." Ibid. 292. And General Pinckney asked, "who have been the greatest sufferers in the Union, by our obtaining our independence? I answer, the Eastern States. They have lost every thing but their country, and their freedom." Ibid. 284.

Essays by Republicus

(LEXINGTON) KENTUCKY GAZETTE
16 February and 1 March 1788

In his first essay, Republicus presents a straightforward but, for the Anti-Federalists, unusually theoretical account of the origin of civil government, the need for limiting constitutions (excluding all idea of prerogative), and the nature of representation. He contends that all of the branches of government, not just the legislature, are representatives of the people (5.13.2). He argues strongly against a bicameral legislature (5.13.7). In his second essay, the author directs his relatively radical views toward the proposed Constitution, reenforcing his argument against two houses of the legislature and his insistence on a strict numerical representation (5.13.12). He objects to the method of electing the President and to his dangerous powers and to the power of Congress to regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections for the national legislature (5.13.13–14). He concludes with a very strong denunciation of the fugitive slave provision and the dangers of thus sanctioning, in a constitution devoted to liberty, the principle of slavery (5.13.14).

A reply by Mancius appeared, also in the Lexington Kentucky Gazette, on 23 February 1788.

So soon after the close of a bloddy and distressing war, which we have 5.13.2 sustained in defence of the liberties and indefeasible rights of mankind; during which those rights have been investigated with the utmost precision: it may, to some, seem a little extraordinary to resume so trite a subject; but as there is a prospect of an aera near approaching, big with events highly, very highly interesting to these western districts; and as it seems, that some, even of our leading characters, have been too much hurried to have given those subjects so much of their attention as they seem to have merited; or may have forgotten some of the features peculiar to the picture of liberty; I beg leave to hold up to public view, some of the outlines of the charming portrait, in order to attach my fellow citizens to the original form from whence they are taken: and add a few very plain observations on civil government. In this I shall confine myself to civil liberty, and that natural liberty or freedom of mankind, in an unconnected state (or as some say, in a state of nature) from whence it arises: and shall first enquire what this natural freedom is, it is obvious at first sight, that this is neither more nor less than a power of self government, a performance of all our actions agreeable to our own will; or in plainer terms, it is a doing as we please; under the direction of reason, the great, primary, and never-ceasing law of nature. As long as any man does so he has a right to enjoy his person, life, and property, free from all molestation whatsoever; and were he able, even to repel the combined power of the world in any attempt to deprive him of either; and on this is founded a right of equality: for as one mans right is limited to the enjoyment, and defence of his own property; so every other mans right extends to the same limits, but no further, for it is inconceivable that an individual can of right, enjoy any possible possession, or happiness any part of which another person or even community of men can have a right to deprive him of: or that any two or more individuals, can at the same time justly claim or possess an exclusive right to any thing whatsoever; for what I wholy and rightfully claim or enjoy, every other man is wholy and rightfully excluded of claiming, or enjoying by this great and primary law of nature, and this it is which establishes a perfect natural equality among mankind, and excludes all right of one man to govern or controul the rightful actions, or property of another in any case whatsoever; and an universal, and unerring observation of, and obedience to this law, is what we call rectitude, or moral virtue: which, where it prevails, necessarily precludes all civil government; which is only substituted in the room of the aforesaid natural law, where its principles are not duly attended to, or its sanctions appear too distant, or feble. It is evident that all men act according to, or depart from this law of nature; in proportion as, on the one hand their reason, or on the other their passions and appetites, preponderate: but as universal observation assures us, that mankind are more generally actuated by their passions and appetites, than by their reason; something is necessary to restrain, controul, or at least to counteract those passions: hence the necessity of civil government; and on that necessity it originates: the lust of power, or of property, would stimulate the strong, or the artful, to seize[?] the persons, or properties of the weak, or the simple, and appropriate them to their own use, in contempt of the sacred law of nature. Hence, mankind found it necessary to enter into solemn compacts of mutual defence, and security, and in those compacts, to establish certain rules, founded upon, or at least agreeable to, the universal reason of mankind, (the common law of nature) to which they should all be equally subject; as they rightfully, and originally were in their unconnected state, to that original law; and this only to secure to themselves that liberty, and those rights to which they as said above are all naturally, equally, and unalienably entitled. Thus it appears how civil government becomes a substitute for moral virtue: and that instead of infringing the rightful liberties of mankind, it tends to secure them: and by this criterion may every government be tried: that government which tends not to secure the lives, liberties and properties of every individual of the community, as far as the law of reason would have done, is unjust and iniquitious and merits not the name of civil government. I said above that civil government originates in necessity: I now add it originates with the people under that necessity. They form the compact, they prescribe the rules and they also enact them or delegate others to do it for them; who are indiscriminately, and in the proper sense of the word their servants and accountable to them and to them only how they execute those trusts; as really so as the man whom I employ for daily wages is accountable to me and to me only how he performs my business; and are therefore to be chosen by them, and that in a way perfectly consistent with the equality of their right; because if they have an equal natural right to legislative and executive power in all their different branches, which takes in all the powers that can exist in a state; none can have a right to exercise any of those powers, but by appointment or delegation: consequently those who are thus chose by them to the executive department are as really their representatives, as those similarly chosen to the legislative: This I think an observation of some consequence; all this power they are justly authorized to exercise and that in their own joint and equal right: for if at the time of entering into such compact, a compleat equality in point of right subsists; it ever ought to subsist as there can be no legitimate superior or even co-ordinate power, to destroy or diminish that equality. But it is not only necessary that government should be formed on principles of equal right; but also that those principles should be precisely delineated and guaranteed by the most solemn sanctions. This if you please we will call a constitution. There should also be woven into the very texture of that constitution certain antidotes or preservatives against corruption or degeneracy, and care should be taken by every member of the community, that those antidotes be duly administered. Otherwise tho they may begin their career on a very fair plain, yet, it may at last terminate in a precipice, which they may never discover till it be too late to retract.

And first the constitution should provide for a fair and equal representation.[2] That is that every member of the union have a freedom of suffrage and that every equal number of people have an equal number of representatives; for if the preceding sentiments are just, no one deprived of suffrage, ought (unless he voluntarily adopt it at least implicitly) to be under the controul or direction of such constitution, or any law made in consequence of it: it is no law to him[,] he is in respect of it, still in a state of nature: and without equality of numbers it would be unjust; for it is incontestable that if every man has an equal natural right to governing power, he has an equal right to every thing that represents it; and if we suppose for instance one district to contain one hundred inhabitants, and another a thousand: each entitled to send two representatives[;] if we suppose the former to be only duly represented, then there will be nine hundred in the latter not represented at all; But this is so plain a case that it is only strange that it should ever have been controverted. 5.13.3

But again it should provide against their holding those trusts for long terms. This would call into public service a greater variety of estimable characters; would beget an emulation who should serve their country the most essentially; and make it perhaps as fashionable a virtue to serve the interest of the public, as it has been formerly a vice to serve the private interest of some favorite family or worthless dependent. Besides, this is a security which the people owe to themselves, for the fidelity of their servants; and perhaps the only good security they can have: add to this temporary intervals of ineligibility, that they may in a private capacity feel all the good and evil effects resulting from their administration; and be prevented from acquiring any influence, dangerous to the liberty of the community. Who ever doubts the utility of this provisionary measure let him just recur to the state of the British government under the triennial and septennial parliaments: and he will soon be satisfied. 5.13.4

But it should also provide for its own stability and permanency: and that no law may ever come into existence the foundation of which is not found in those primary[?] principles: as the constitution comes immediately from the people; so ought the laws to flow immediately from the constitution; it should like a circle circumscribe all legislative power as the legislative ought to circumscribe the executive, and both take their form from the people as the great centre of all; it should with all the authority becoming the majesty of a free people from whence it proceeds command; hitherto shalt thou come but no further; for if it suffers itself to be broken in one instance, why not in a thousand; it become, like a bubble, its existence is no more and the issue may be fatal. 5.13.5

But lastly, and above all it should provide that no man or set of men whatsoever from within or without, should even[?] possess a power of controul, suspension, or negation, either permanent, or temporary, on or over any resolves, acts, procedures, or laws made by the people them- 5.13.6

selves, or their representatives duly chosen as above[,] for whenever this happens, their liberty expires, they are under the direction of a will different from, and superior to their own: and though they may still have the privilege of nominating those who possess that power, it is only the poor and degrading privilege of pointing out, among many tyrannical masters, whose lash they will chose to feel. In short they are slaves.

5.13.7 It has been disputed whether one house, or rather power of legislature be more eligible, or rather to be chosen than two.[3] I shall hazard a few random thoughts on that subject. And first, if an institution answers all the ends designed by the institution, as well as any other institution, or plan could have done, or can do, there remain no possibility of its doing more; it is therefore perfect, if anything is added it becomes a redundancy, consequently an imperfection. I hope twill not be denied, that a single legislative body, is capable of making laws, the perfection of those laws depend on the wisdom, virtue, and integrity of the legislature, but does it appear, that more wisdom, virtue, and integrity, will, or can possibly be found in two houses than in one, provided they consist of the same number, but more particularly of the same identical person? No man will affirm this. But it may be said that a second house or senate, being generally fewer in number, do by their separation acquire an influence which would have been lost, had the whole been incorporated in one house. I answer, perhaps it might not have been lost; it would no doubt sometimes so happen, that they, in conjunction with the minority in the other house would be able to set aside some bills, which for want of their assistance there, have passed, this would have been a shorter, and easier way; and attended besides, with much less expence of time and money; and excepting in some such instances, all such influence ought to be lost; for in no instance ought the minority to govern the majority. Again, it is more simple: and it is a well known maxim that the simpler a machine is, it is the more perfect; the reason on which it is grounded is obvious: viz. because it is the less liable to disorder, the disorder more easily discovered, and when discovered, more easily repaired and in no instance is this maxim more applicable than in the great machine of government.[4] But say they there ought to be two houses because there are two separate interests. I answer by denying that any community can possibly have any but one common public interest, that is, the greatest good of the whole and of every individual as a part of that whole: but if it be private interest that is meant, I confess that there are not only two, but twenty and it may be more private interests in every government, and the same argument would prove that there ought to be twenty or indeed five hundred houses of legislature in each government: and by proving too much falls to the ground. But the grand argument of all, is that by being separate they have a power of checking some bills which would otherwise pass into laws and might be detrimental to society. Had not this argument been produced on the other side, I should certainly have produced it in favour of one house: however I ask is a minority in one house, properly entitled to over rule a majority in the other? Are they not as likely to check a good bill as a bad one? and has it not[5] in fact often happened? Is it not as probable that the second house lay some[?] of their checks on a good bill which perhaps they had little considered as that the first, should pass a bad one, where it had originated and perhaps[?] thoroughly considered? But let us turn the argument over and take a view of the other side of it. The inconsistencies that attend the idea of two houses are innumerable. Take one, supposing them both our representatives (tho it will be hard to prove them so) it makes their constituents to say in many instances by their representatives in one house, 'this shall be a law,' by their representatives in the other with respect to the same bill; 'This shall not be a law.' It impowers one body of men to enact statutes; and another to forbid their being carried into execution. It resembles a man putting forth his right hand to do some important business and then stretching forth his left hand to prevent it; but supposing them not our representatives at all, they have no business there, and all their mighty power of checking, is a mere farce.

I am now come down to that period, which I proposed at my setting out; 5.13.8 and ought not, it may be trouble the public any farther; however as I consider myself a free agent, and would have every other man not only to believe so of himself but also to use every means to be and continue really so for ever; I intend in some future paper (if I continue in the same humour I am now in) to make some transient observations, on the constitution held out to the united states, by the continental convention, which I sincerely wish might in the mean time be done by some better hand.

In the above hints, I have spoken my sentiments but their authority comes 5.13.9
from their being the sentiments of a Locke[,] a Sidney and of all the great and good names who have favoured the world with observations on this important subject: but what gives them the highest possible dignity with me; I believe them to be the sentiments of reason itself: and while I remain under the conviction should a government arise, flowing from any other source and running in another channel; though I shall always submit to the laws of my country, with as much cheerfulness as I can; yet the voice of the united world shall never persuade me to say it is right.

True Liberty
. . . Always with right reason dwells
Twinn'd, and from her hath no dividual being.
MILTON[6]

5.13.10 There is but one source of political happiness, viz. liberty; our liberty is founded on our reason, which is the gift of heaven: this proves its excellence; but many sources of unhappiness, and slavery: every one of which, owes its existence to the abuse of some passion or appetite of mankind. Ambitious persons, already raised to a pitch of eminence disgraceful to human nature; not contented with the vassalage of thousands, who have given themselves up to the vilest subjection, even to be bought or sold like asses or swine; too often, merely to gratify a wanton lust of domination, employ those very wretches, in the infernal business of subjecting others, before happy and free; this constitutes external slavery; of such an attempt we have had a recent trial; but there is another sort of slavery which from the modesty of its appearance, and gentleness of its approaches, is not so alarming, and therefore the more dangerous; of which we ought continually to beware: viz. internal, that is, when a people already free, implicitly intrust, or permit, any set of men to form constitutions of government or enact laws for them; without inquiring, whether such constitutions, have for their basis, the true principles of liberty, and equal right. Of those principles I have, in a former paper, attempted a very succinct investigation: I shall in this, examine some parts of the federal constitution, (now held out to these states) according to those principles, and leave the public, impartially to judge for themselves.

5.13.11 And here, I am happy in finding myself anticipated, and the work partly done to my hand, by the publication of a letter from a gentleman, whose official situation sets his sentiments in a very conspicuous point of view; and whose well known abilities and integrity make every observation of his, merit the highest degree of attention;[7] I shall therefore pass over those things which he has already done in so masterly a manner, and confine myself to a few points, which he has either slightly touched upon or has been wholy silent.

5.13.12 Article I. Section I. "All legislative power herein granted, shall be vested in a Congress of the united states; which shall consist of a senate and house of representatives.["]

The absurdity of two houses of legislature, has formerly been touched upon on the supposition of their being both our representatives; but that observation becomes here unnecessary: this appears without a mask: they (the senate) are not even the supposed representatives of any body; but distinguished from them, in as express terms as english words can do it; how then is this a Congress [that is a meeting][8] of the united States; when such meeting, does neither consist of the whole people of these states, nor wholly of the representatives of those people?[9] but not to dispute about words let us consider the election, the proportional numbers, and the powers of this senatorial body. And first, they are to be chosen by the legislative bodies of the several states respectively: what numeral proportion these legislative bodies may bear to their constituents, or the people at large, is to me uncertain; but I will suppose it as one to two hundred; it is plain, that if they represent any body at all, it can be only those who have elected them, viz. one two-hundredth part of the people: bodies, having been chosen only for legislative purposes, and election, and legislation, being powers wholly different, and indeed too important to be both committed to the same set of men, at the same time; that choice can invest them with no right to delegate representatives for any body but themselves; but I confess this argument is superfluous, this constitution having in so many words, separated the very idea or character of a senator from that of a representative. Again, as to their numbers, there are to be two senators from each state; is not this visibly subversive of the great original right to equality? does it not tend to obliterate the very idea? To demonstrate this, requires only that we compare the representation of the state of Rhode-Island and Providence plantations, with that of Virginia; the former from their numbers, are intitled to have only one representative in Congress; the latter, on the same principle, and for the same reason, are to have ten. If Virginia, from her numbers, has a right to ten times the influence of Rhode-Island in the lower house of Congress, why not in the senate? I see no reasonable answer to this, but that the lower house consists of the representatives of the people, consequently are a regular, well proportioned body, the senate an unmeaning and arbitrary [ ] of the different legislatures; and of consequence a body irregular, deformed, and disproportionate.

But again, if we consider this power, it contains a very considerable and 5.13.13 essential share of the elective, legislative, executive, and judiciary department, and in all these, they are independent of the people, not in any instance responsible to them: from whence can their right to such power arise? It was never delegated to them from the people, who alone were justly possessed of it; no exterior power had authority to confer it; it appears therefore a mere non entity; or rather a complicated usurpation of power without right: and therefore to be rejected: and yet, extraordinary as it may seem, this senatorial dignity, is to continue in the same hands six years, and even at the end of that term, they are again eligible, and so on a third, a fourth, a seventh time, to perpetuity. But I long to have them off my hands, as I would any other useless or dangerous commodity, and can only consider their institution, as a servile and ill-judg'd imitation of the house of lords in the British parliament, where (though there appears now and then a virtuous character) dissipation, venality, and corruption, are alternately, and incessantly breeding growing, and triumphing; have often distracted the kingdom, and in some degree, inslaved the nation. I go now to Art. 2, Sec. 1 which vest the supreme continental executive power in a president: in order to the choice of whom, the legislative body of each state, is empowered to point out to their constituents, some mode of choice, or (to save trouble) may choose themselves, a certain number of electors, who shall meet in their respective states, and vote by ballot, for two persons, one of whom, at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves. Or in other words, they shall vote for two, one or both of whom they know nothing of. An extraordinary refinement this, on the plain simple business of election; and of which the grand convention have certainly the honour of being the first inventors; and that for an officer too, of so much importance as a president; invested with legislative and executive powers—who is to be commander in chief of the army[,] navy, militia, etc. grant reprieves and pardons, have a temporary negative on all bills and resolves, convene and adjourn both houses of congress, be supreme conservator of laws, commission all officers, make treaties, etc. etc. and who is to continue[10] four years, and is only removable on conviction of treason[?] or bribery and trial be only by the senate, who are to be his own council whose interest in every instance runs parallel with his own; and who are neither the officers of the people, nor accountable to them. Is it then become necessary, that a free people, should first resign their right of suffrage into other hands besides their own, and then, secondly, that they to whom they resign it, should be compelled to choose men, whose persons, characters, manners, or principles they know nothing of; and after all, (excepting some such change as is not likely to happen twice in the same century) to intrust Congress with the final decision at last? Is it necessary, is it rational that the sacred rights of mankind should thus dwindle down to Electors, of electors, and those again electors of other electors; this seems to be degrading them, even below the prophetical curse denounced by the good old patriarch, on the offspring of his degenerate son; ["]servant of servants."[11]

5.13.14 Art. I. Sect. 4. "The times, places and manner of holding elections for senators, and representatives, shall be prescribed in each State, by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of chusing senators.["][12] Whether this clause gives Congress a power to call the people of Georgia to chuse their representatives in the city of Boston, and on the twentieth of December, and so of every other State, I leave to be determined by better judges of language than myself; however, I believe I shall not be amiss in asserting, that it invests them with power to appoint the time of choosing senators, at the greatest possible distance from the usual, and perhaps constitutionally appointed time of meeting for the purpose of legislation: This latter in large States, or newly settled countries amounts to little less than a peremptory exclusion of all members of legislatures, in extensive districts; who from their situation, are less liable to corruption: the former, if true, would put it into the power of a few, a very few! to appoint representatives for the whole continent: and both together, tend to perpetuate the authority, not only of the same men, but also of their heirs for ever. Again, I would ask (considering how prone mankind are to engross power, and then to abuse it) is it not probable, at least possible, that the president who is to be vested with all this demi-omnipotence, who is not chosen by the community, and who

consequently as to them, is irresponsible, and independent; that he, I say, by a few, artful and dependent emissaries in congress, may not only perpetuate his own personal administration, but also make it hereditary: that by the same means, he may render his suspensive power over the law, as operative, and permanent, as that of G. the 3d over the acts of the British parliament: and under the modest title of president, may exercise the combined authority of legislation, and execution, in a latitude yet unthought of: or, that upon his being invested with those powers a second, or third time, he may acquire such enormous influence, as, added to his uncountroulable power over the army, navy, and militia; together with his private interest in the officers, of all these different departments, who are all to be appointed by himself, and so his creatures, in the true political sense of the word; and more especially when added to all this, he has the power of forming treaties and alliances, and calling them to his assistance; that he may, I say, under all these advantages, and almost irresistable temptations, on some pretended pique, haughtily, and contemptously, turn our poor lower house, (the only shadow of liberty we shall have left) out of doors, and give us law at the bayonets point; or may not the senate, who are nearly in the same situation, with respect to the people from similar motives, and by similar means, erect themselves easily into an oligarchy, towards which they have already attempted so large a stride; to one of which channels, or rather to a confluence of both, we seem to be fast gliding away; and the moment we arrive at it—farewell liberty. This leads me to Art. I Sect. 9. "The migration or importation of such persons, as any of the States now existing, shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808; (twenty years hence) but a tax, or duty may be imposed on much importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person.["] An excellent clause this, in an Algerian constitution: but not so well calculated (I hope) for the latitude of America.[13] It is not to be disguised that by "such persons," slaves are principally, if not wholly intended: and shall this be found among the principles of a free people, and making a radical part of the grand base, on which they would erect an edifice sacred to liberty. "Tell it not in Gath!"[14] O that no envious surge might ever roll it to the eastern side of the Atlantic! Unhappy africans! What have they done? Have they murdered our citizens or burnt our settlements? Have they butchered, scalped, and exhausted every device of torture, on our defenceless women, and innocent children; as the savage meserians[?] of our own country have done? No, no! Then, why deprive them of the greatest of all blessings, liberty, "without which," says Dr. Price man is a beast, and life a curse,[15] while coward-like, we court, caress, and cringe to our murderers. Ignorant, and comparatively innocent, till we taught them the diabolical arts of destruction, captivity, and death; and provided them with the infernal means of carrying them into practice: and all this to furnish ourselves with slaves, at the guilty expence oftimes, of the blood of, ten times the number of those thus enslaved, who lost their lives in the gallant the virtuous defence of themselves, and families. Has this guilt ever been attoned? and do we boast of being advocates for liberty? shocking absurdity! More absurd still that a license for such an execrable trade, should be radically woven into, and become an essential part of our national constitution[,] a constitution, formed by a chosen assembly of our most eminent and respectable citizens: and where a personage presided, second to no individual of the human family.

The boast of America.—The wonder of Europe
O liberty! O virtue! O my country.

Tell us, ye who can that, cooly, reduce the impious principle of slavery, to a constitutional system: ye professed violators of liberties of mankind: where will ye stop? what security can you give, that, when there shall remain no more black people, ye will not enslave others, white as yourselves? when Africa is exhausted, will ye spare America? and is not twenty years (taking into the account the slain with the more unhappy captives, victims to perpetual slavery) sufficient to depopulate her inmost forest? Or is this only an ill boding prelude, sounded in the ears, and designedly introductory to the fate of these (yet unhappy) states, who gave you existence; and who even now, while you are thus ungratefully soaring toward the summit of Aristocracy, are honouring you with their confidence? I shudder at the catastrophe? awake my fellow citizens! and let this infamous clause, together with the principle which gave it birth, be not only expunged out of your constitution: but countermanded, eradicated, torn from your heart forever.

5.13.15 To conclude, I can think of but one source of right to government, or any branch of it; and that is the people. They, and only they, have a right to determine whether they will make laws, or execute them, or do both in a collective body, or by a delegated authority. Delegation is a positive actual investiture. Therefore if any people are subjected to an authority which they have not thus actually chosen; even though they may have tamely submitted to it, yet it is not their legitimate government: they are wholly passive, and as far as they are so, are in a state of slavery. Thank heaven we are not yet arrived at that state; and while we continue to have sense enough to discover and detect, and virtue enough to detest and oppose every attempt, either of force or fraud, either from without or within, to bring us into it, we never will.

5.13.16 Let us therefore continue united in the cause of rational liberty. Let unity and liberty be our mark as well as our motto: for only such an union can secure our freedom; and division will inevitably destroy it. Thus a mountain of sand may peace meal be removed by the feeble hands of a child: but if consolidated to a rock, it mocks the united efforts of mankind, and can only fall in a general wreck of nature.

Essays by The Impartial Examiner

VIRGINIA INDEPENDENT CHRONICLE
February–June 1788

The five essays of the Impartial Examiner appeared in the Virginia Independent Chronicle, the first during February and March of 1788, and the remainder in successive weeks in May and June. They constitute another important and interesting Anti-Federal statement reprinted here for the first time. The Impartial Examiner begins the first, long essay with a good statement of the dangers of ill-considered innovation (5.14.1). He makes and elaborates a distinction between arbitrary and free governments, on which the whole argument rests: "in [arbitrary governments] the governors are invested with powers of acting according to their own wills, without any other limits than what they themselves may understand to be necessary for the general good; whereas in [free goverments] they are intrusted with no such unlimited authority, but are restrained in their operations to conform to certain fundamental principles, the preservation whereof is expressly stipulated for in the civil compact: and whatever is not so stipulated for is virtually and impliedly given up" (5.14.2). Judged by this criterion, the author finds the proposed Constitution arbitrary: it provides for unlimited supremacy of the federal government, despite the absence among the different parts of the United States of that union of interest that must be the basis of union of counsels (5.14.4, 5, 10). There is no declaration of rights, without which civil liberty cannot exist, there being no standard to appeal to in cases of governmental oppression (5.14.5, 10). The Constitution grants dangerous and unlimited powers in the areas of taxation (5.14.6–7), standing armies (5.14.8), and the judiciary (5.14.9). While respecting the intentions of the framers, the author insists that the people must exercise an independent judgment (5.14.10–12). He contends that a more moderate revision is feasible, and (in a balanced and penetrating statement) he emphasizes the nobility of true confederation (5.14.13). The Impartial Examiner concludes the first essay with a good statement of the dangers of loose and extensive powers that goes well beyond the usual Anti-Federal cautions. The problem is to perpetuate the free republic as "the ardent glow of freedom" evaporates—as the leaders grow restless for exercise of ambition, as the advantages of the new government "grow stale with use," and as the people grow fat with prosperity. To avoid these dangers the principles of the political order must be firmly fixed in the Constitution (5.14.14–16).

In the remaining essays, the Impartial Examiner mainly elaborates the themes already laid down. He argues in the second essay that arbitrary government is inherently despotic (5.14.17–22). The first question to be raised is whether the system proposed is "coincident with [American] standing maxims of liberty" and the second whether it is "conducive to good policy" (5.14.24). Having shown in the first essay that the system fails with respect to the former, Impartial Examiner argues that no examination of the latter is strictly necessary; but he follows the many writers who proceed to the question of policy, concluding this essay with an argument that the so-called Anti-Federalists are the true Federalists (5.14.25–26).

In essay III the Impartial Examiner takes up the question of representation, contending (in one of the good Anti-Federalist discussions of this matter) that representation must be both ample and complete and that the representation in the House of Representatives is not sufficiently numerous to be either (5.14.28–32). The Senate is elected not by the people but by the state legislatures and is open to even stronger objections (5.14.33–34).

The executive proposed by the new Constitution, discussed in essay IV, ought not to have a negative on legislation, this power being an imitation of the British system, whose circumstances are very different. The executive veto will destroy rather than maintain the balance in the American republican system (5.14.35–40).

In conclusion (essay V) the Impartial Examiner argues that the evils experienced under the Articles of Confederation spring not from vicious principles pervading the whole system (which would admittedly require radical change) but from certain weaknesses in some of the parts. The weaknesses may therefore be remedied by strengthening these parts, in particular by investing Congress with sufficient power to regulate commerce and to procure the necessary revenue for the common defense or general welfare.

I

20 February 1788

To the free people of Virginia.

Countrymen and Fellow-Citizens,

That the subject, which has given rise to the following observations, is of the highest consequence to this country, requires not the aid of logical proof; that it merits the most serious attention of every member of this 5.14.1

community, is a fact not to be controverted. Will not a bare mention of the new Fœderal Constitution justify this remark? To foreigners or such, whose local connections form no permanent interest in America, this may be totally indifferent; and to them it may afford mere matter of speculation and private amusement. When such advert to the high and distinguished characters, who have drawn up, and proposed a set of articles to the people of an extensive continent as a form of their future government, an emotion of curiosity may induce them to examine the contents of those articles: and they may, perhaps, from having contemplated on a former situation of those people—that they had struggled against a potent enemy—that they had by their virtuous and patriotic exertions rescued themselves from impending danger—that they had used the like endeavors to establish for themselves a system of government upon free and liberal principles—that they had in pursuance of those endeavors chosen a system, as conducive to the great ends of human happiness, the preservation of their natural rights and liberties—that this system has prevailed but a few years; and now already a change, a fundamental change therein is meditated:—strangers, I say, having contemplated on these circumstances, may be led to consider this nation, as a restless and dissatisfied people, whose fickle inconsistent minds suffer them not to abide long in the same situation; who perpetually seeking after new things throw away one blessing in pursuit of another: and while they are thus indulging their caprice—lose all, ere any can ripen into maturity. If the unconcerned part of those among us entertain themselves in this manner, can any good American be content to deserve such reflections? Will not all rather feel an honest indignation, if they once perceive their country stamped with a character like this? And yet, may we not justify such conceptions, if we thus precipitate ourselves into a new government before we have sufficiently tried the virtues of the old?[1] So incident is error to the human mind, that it is not to be wondered at indeed, if our present Constitution is incomplete. The best regulated governments have their defects, and might perhaps admit of improvement: but the great difficulty consists in clearly discovering the most exceptionable parts and judiciously applying the amendments. A wise nation will, therefore, attempt innovations of this kind with much circumspection. They will view the political fabric, which they have once reared, as the sacred palladium of their happiness;—they will touch it, as a man of tender sensibility toucheth the apple of his own eye,—they will touch it with a light, with a trembling—with a cautious hand,—lest they injure the whole structure in endeavoring to reform any of its parts. In small and trivial points alterations may be attempted with less danger; but—where the very nature, the essence of the thing is to be changed: when the foundation itself is to be transformed, and the whole plan entirely new modelled;—should you not hesitate, O Americans? Should you not pause—and reflect a while on the the important step, you are about to take? Does it not behove you to examine well into the nature and tendency of the Constitution now proposed for your adoption? And by comparing it with your present mode of government, endeavor to distinguish which of the two is most eligible? Whether this or that is best calculated for promoting your happiness? for obtaining and securing those benefits, which are the great object of civil society? Will it be consistent with the duty, which you owe to yourselves, as a nation, or with the affection, which you ought to bear for your posterity, if you rashly or inconsiderately adopt a measure, which is to influence the fate of this country for ages yet to come? How will it accord with your dignity and reputation, as an independent people, if either through an over-weaning fondness for novelty you are suddenly transported on the wings of imagination, and too hastily make up your thoughts on this great subject; or by sinking into a listless inactivity of mind, view it as an indifferent matter unworthy of any deliberate consideration? Will any respect? Will any honor? Will any veneration be due to the memory of yourselves, as ancestors, if millions of beings, who have not yet received their birth, when you are all mouldered into dust, should find themselves fixed in a miserable condition by one injudicious determination of your's at this period? If you see no impropriety in these questions, the suggestions contained in them will not appear altogether unworthy of attention. One moment's reflection, it is humbly presumed, will render it obvious that on this occasion they are not impertinently propounded.

In pursuing this address I beg leave to premise that the only true point of 5.14.2
distinction between arbitrary and free governments seems to be, that in the former the governors are invested with powers of acting according to their own wills, without any other limits than[2] what they themselves may understand to be necessary for the general good; whereas in the latter they are intrusted with no such unlimited authority, but are restrained in their operations to conform to certain fundamental principles, the preservation whereof is expressly stipulated for in the civil compact: and whatever is not so stipulated for is virtually and impliedly given up. Societies so constituted invest their supreme governors with ample powers of exerting themselves according to their own judgment in every thing not inconsistent with or derogatory to those principles; and so long as they adhere to such restrictions, their deeds ought not to be rescinded or controuled by any other power whatsoever. Those principles are certain inherent rights pertaining to all mankind in a state of natural liberty, which through the weakness, imperfection, and depravity of human nature cannot be secured in that state. Men, therefore, agree to enter into society, that by the united force of many the rights of each individual may be protected and secured. These are in all just governments laid down as a foundation to the civil compact, which contains a covenant between each with all, that they shall enter into one society to be governed by the same powers; establishes for that purpose the frame of government; and consequently creates a Convention between every member, binding those, who shall at any time be intrusted with power, to a faithful administration of their trust according to the form of the civil policy, which they have so constituted, and obliging all to a due obedience therein. There can be no other just origin of civil power, but some such mutual contract of all the people: and although their great object in forming society is an intention to secure their natural rights; yet the relations arising from this political union create certain duties and obligations to the state, which require a sacrifice of some portion of those rights and of that exuberance of liberty, which obtains in a state of nature.—This, however, being compensated by certain other adventitious rights and privileges, which are acquired by the social connection; it follows that the advantages derived from a government are to be estimated by the strength of the security, which is attended at once with the least sacrifice and the greatest acquired benefits. That government, therefore, which is best adapted for promoting these three great ends, must certainly be the best constituted scheme of civil policy. Here, then, it may not be improper to remark that persons forming a social community cannot take too much precaution when they are about to establish the plan of their government. They ought to construct it in such a manner as to procure the best possible security for their rights;—in doing this they ought to give up no greater share than what is understood to be absolutely necessary:—and they should endeavor so to organize, arrange and connect it's several branches, that when duly exercised it may tend to promote the common good of all, and contribute as many advantages, as the civil institution is capable of. It has been before observed that the only just origin of civil power is a contract entered into by all the people for that purpose.—If this position be true (and, I dare presume, it is not controverted, at least in this country) right reason will always suggest the expediency of adhering to the essential requisites in forming that contract upon true principles. A cautious people will consider all the inducements to enter into the social state, from the most important object down to the minutest prospect of advantage. Every motive with them will have its due weight. They will not pay a curious attention to trifles and overlook matters of great consequence:—and in pursuing these steps they will provide for the attainment of each point in view with a care—with an earnestness proportionate to its dignity, and according as it involves a greater or a lesser interest. It is evident, therefore that they should attend most diligently to those sacred rights, which they have received with their birth, and which can neither be retained to themselves, nor transmitted to their posterity, unless they are expressly reserved: for it is a maxim, I dare say, universally acknowledged, that when men establish a system of government, in granting the powers therein they are always understood to surrender whatever they do not so expressly reserve.[3] This is obvious from the very design of the civil institution, which is adopted in lieu of the state of natural liberty, wherein each individual, being equally intitled to the enjoyment of all natural rights, and having equally a just authority to exercise full powers of acting, with relation to other individuals, in any manner not injurious to their rights, must, when he enters into society, be presumed to give up all those powers into the hands of the state by submitting his whole conduct to the direction thereof. This being done by every member, it follows, as a regular conclusion, that all such powers, whereof the whole were possessed, so far as they related to each other individually, are of course given up by the mere act of union. If this surrender be made without any reservation, the conclusion is equally plain and regular, that each and all have given up not only those powers, which relate to others, but likewise every claim, which pertained to themselves, as individuals. For the universality of the grant in this case must necessarily include every power of acting, and every claim of possessing or obtaining any thing—except according to the regulations of the state. Now a right being properly defined, "a power or claim established by law, to act, or to possess, or to obtain something from others,"[4] every natural right is such power or claim established by the law of nature. Thus, it is manifest, that in a society constituted after this manner, every right whatsoever will be under the power and controul of the civil jurisdiction. This is the leading characteristic of an arbitrary government, and whenever any people establish a system like this, they subject themselves to one, which has not a single property of a free constitution. Hence results the necessity of an express stipulation for all such rights as are intended to be exempted from the civil authority.

Permit me now, my country men, to make a few observations on the proposed Fœderal Constitution. In this attempt the subject, as it is arduous and difficult, naturally impresses the modest mind with diffidence: yet being of the last importance, as involving in it the highest interest, that freemen can have—all that is dear and valuable to the citizens of these United States; a consciousness of the strong claim, which this subject has, to a free and general discussion, has prevailed over that discouraging idea so far as to produce the present address to you. This is done with a reliance on that benevolence and liberality of sentiment, with which you have hitherto been actuated. From these benign qualities, it is hoped, the most favorable indulgence will be granted, and that the zeal, with which this is written, will be allowed in some measure an excuse for its defects. However imperfect, therefore this may be, however inadequate to your own ideas, or to the wishes of him, who offers it to your consideration; you are hereby intreated to let the perusal, with which you may think proper to favor it, be serious, candid, dispassionate—as it relates to a common cause, in which all are alike concerned. 5.14.3

Suffer me, then, in the first place to advert to a part of the sixth article in this constitution. It may, perhaps, appear somewhat irregular, to begin with this article, since it is almost the last proposed: yet, if it be considered that this at once defines the extent of Congressional authority, and indisputably 5.14.4

fixes its supremacy, every idea of impropriety on this head will probably vanish. The clause alluded to contains the following words, "This constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby; any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary, notwithstanding." If this constitution should be adopted, here the sovereignty of America is ascertained and fixed in the fœderal body at the same time that it abolishes the present independent sovereignty of each state. Because this government being general, and not confined to any particular part of the continent; but pervading every state and establishing its authority equally in all, its superiority will consequently be recognized in each; and all other powers can operate only in a secondary subordinate degree. For the idea of two sovereignties existing within the same community is a perfect solecism. If they be supposed equal, their operation must be commensurate, and like two mechanical powers of equal momenta counteracting each other;—there the force of the one will be destroyed by the force of the other: and so there will be no efficiency in either. If one be greater than the other, they will be similar to two unequal bodies in motion with a given degree of velocity, and impinging each other from opposite points;—the motion of the lesser in this case will necessarily be destroyed by that of the greater: and so there will be efficiency only in the greater. But what need is there for a mathematical deduction to shew the impropriety of two such distinct co-existing sovereignties? The natural understanding of all mankind perceives the apparent absurdity arising from such a supposition: since, if the word means any thing at all, it must mean that supreme power, which must reside somewhere instate; or, in other terms, it is the united powers of each individual member of the state collected and consolidated into one body. This collection, this union, this supremacy of power can, therefore, exist only in one body. This is obvious to every man: and it has been very properly suggested that under the proposed constitution each state will dwindle into "the insignificance of a town corporate."[5] This certainly will be their utmost consequence; and, as such, they will have no authority to make laws, even for their own private government any farther than the permissive indulgence of Congress may grant them leave. This, Virginians, will be your mighty, your enviable situation after all your struggles for independence! and, if you will take the trouble to examine, you will find that the great, the supereminent authority, with which this instrument of union proposes to invest the fœderal body, is to be created without a single check—without a single article of covenant for the preservation of those inestimable rights, which have in all ages been the glory of freemen. It is true, "the United States shall guarantee to every state in this union a republican form of government": yet they do not guarantee to the different states their present forms of government, or the bill of rights thereto annexed, or any of them; and the expressions are too vague, too indefinite to create such a compact by implication. It is possible that a "republican form" of government may be built upon as absolute principles of despotism as any oriental monarchy ever yet possessed. I presume that the liberty of a nation depends, not on planning the frame of government, which consists merely in fixing and delineating the powers thereof; but on prescribing due limits to those powers, and establishing them upon just principles.

It has been held in a northern state by a zealous advocate for this constitution that there is no necessity for "a bill of rights" in the fœderal government; although at the same time he acknowledges such necessity to have existed when the constitutions of the separate governments were established.[6] He confesses that in these instances the people "invested their representatives with every power and authority, which they did not in explicit terms reserve": but "in delegating fœderal powers," says he, "every thing, which is not given, is reserved." Here is a distinction, I humbly conceive, without a difference, at least in the present enquiry. How far such a discrimination might prevail with respect to the present system of union, it is immaterial to examine: and had the observation been restrained to that alone, perhaps it might be acknowledged to contain some degree of propriety. For under the confederation it is well known that the authority of Congress cannot extend so far as to interfere with, or exercise any kind of coercion on, the powers of legislation in the different states; but the internal police of each is left free, sovereign and independent: so that the liberties of the people being secured as well as the nature of their constitution will admit; and the declaration of rights, which they have laid down as the basis of government, having their full force and energy, any farther stipulation on that head might be unnecessary. But, surely, when this doctrine comes to be applied to the proposed fœderal constitution, which is framed with such large and extensive powers, as to transfer the individual sovereignty from each state to the aggregate body,—a constitution, which delegates to Congress an authority to interfere with, and restrain the legislatures of every state—invests them with supreme powers of legislation throughout all the states—annihilates the separate independency of each; and, in short—swallows up and involves in the plenitude of its jurisdiction all other powers whatsoever:—I shall not be taxed with arrogance in declaring such an argument to be fallacious; and insisting on the necessity of a positive unequivocal declaration in favor of the rights of freemen in this case even more strongly than in the case of their separate governments. For it seems to me that when any civil establishment is formed, the more general its influence, the more extensive the powers, with which it is invested, the greater reason there is to take the necessary precaution for securing a due administration, and guarding against unwarrantable abuses.

5.14.6 Section 8th of the first article gives the Congress a power "to lay and collect, taxes, duties, imposts and excises." If it be a true maxim that those, who are entrusted with the exercise of the higher powers of government, ought to observe two essential rules: first in having no other view than the general good of all without any regard to private interest; and secondly, to take equal care of the whole body of the community, so as not to favor one part more than another: it is apparent that under the proposed constitution, this general confederated society, made up of thirteen different states, will have very little security for obtaining an observance, either of the one, or of the other, rule. For being different societies, though blended together in legislation, and having as different interests; no uniform rule for the whole seems to be practicable; and hence, it is to be feared, that the general good may be lost in a mutual attention to private views. From the same causes we may lament the probability of losing the advantage of the second rule; for it may be expected, in like manner, that the general care of the whole will be lost by the separate endeavors of different legislators to favor their own states. So long as mankind continues to be influenced by interest, the surest means of effecting an union of counsels in any assembly is by an union of interests.[7] Now, if it be considered that it is this concert, that it is this union in promoting the general good, which alone can preserve concord in this great republic, and secure it success and glory,—unhappy will be the situation of America, if she once precludes the beneficial effects of such a good understanding. Yet, I apprehend that these evils may result in a great measure from an exercise of that branch of legislative authority, which respects internal direct taxation. For in this, it is scarcely probable that the interest, ease or convenience of the several states can be so well consulted in the fœderal assembly, as in their own respective legislatures. So different are many species of property, so various the productions, so unequal the profits arising, even from the same species of property, in different states, that no general mode of contribution can well be adopted in such a manner as at once to affect all in an equitable degree. Hence may arise disagreeable objects of contention. A diversity of interests will produce a diversity of schemes. Thus each state, as it is natural, will endeavor to raise a revenue by such means, as may appear least injurious to its own interest: a source of dissention manifestly detrimental to that harmony, which is necessary to support the confederation. I cannot conceive it impracticable to reform the fœderal system in such a manner as to ensure a compliance with the necessary requisitions of Congress from the different state legislatures. Then all the several states being left to raise their own share of the revenue, and being the only proper judges of the mode most convenient to themselves, it is highly probable that this important branch of government would be carried on more generally to the satisfaction of each state; and would tend to promote a spirit of concord between all the parts of this great community. Because each being thus accomodated, and participating the advantages of the union,—none subjected to any inconvenience thereby,—all would consequently concur in nourishing an affection for the government, which so cemented them.

I believe, it is acknowledged that the establishment of excises has been 5.14.7
one of the greatest grievances, under which the English nation has labored for almost a century and an half. Although this may seem an œconomical tax, as arising out of manufactures, from which the industrious may derive advantages; and whereof the wealthy by consuming the greatest share, will of course contribute the largest proportion of the tax: yet the nature of it being such, as requires severe laws for its execution, it has justly become an object of general detestation. This has induced Judge Blackstone to declare that "the rigour and arbitrary proceedings of excise laws seem hardly compatible with the temper of a free nation."[8] While, therefore, you are freemen—while you are unused to feel any other power, but such as can be exercised within the bounds of moderation and decency, it, doubtless, behoves you to consider whether it is an eligible step to subject yourselves to a new species of authority, which may warrant the most flagrant violations of the sacred rights of habitation. If this branch of revenue takes place, all the consequent rigour of excise laws will necessarily be introduced in order to enforce a due collection. On any charges or offence in this instance you will see yourselves deprived of your boasted trial by jury. The much admired common law process will give way to some quick and summary mode, by which the unhappy defendant will find himself reduced, perhaps to ruin, in less time than a charge could be exhibited against him in the usual course.

It has ever been held that standing armies in times of peace are dangerous 5.14.8 to a free country; and no observation seems to contain more reason in it. Besides being useless, as having no object of employment, they are inconvenient and expensive. The soldiery, who are generally composed of the dregs of the people, when disbanded, or unfit for military service, being equally unfit for any other employment, become extremely burthensome. As they are a body of men exempt from the common occupations of social life, having an interest different from the rest of the community, they wanton in the lap of ease and indolence, without feeling the duties, which arise from the political connection, though drawing their subsistence from the bosom of the state. The severity of discipline necessary to be observed reduces them to a degree of slavery; the unconditional submission to the commands of their superiors, to which they are bound, renders them the fit instruments of tyranny and oppression.—Hence they have in all ages afforded striking examples of contributing, more or less, to enslave mankind;—and whoever will take the trouble to examine, will find that by far the greater part of the different nations, who have fallen from the glorious state of liberty, owe their ruin to standing armies. It has been urged that they are necessary to provide against sudden attacks.[9] Would not a well regulated militia, duly trained to discipline, afford ample security? Such, I conceive, to be the best, the surest means of protection, which a free people can have when not actually engaged in war. This kind of defence is attended with two advantages superior to any others; first, when it is necessary to embody an army, they at once form a band of soldiers, whose interests are uniformly the same with those of the whole community, and in whose safety they see involved every thing that is dear to themselves: secondly, if one army is cut off, another may be immediately raised already trained for military service. By a policy, somewhat similar to this, the Roman empire rose to the highest pitch of grandeur and magnificence.

5.14.9 The supreme court is another branch of fœderal authority, which wears the aspect of imperial jurisdiction, clad in a dread array, and spreading its wide domain into all parts of the continent. This is to be co-extensive with the legislature, and, like that, is to swallow up all other courts of judicature.—For what is that judicial power which "shall extend to all cases in law and equity" in some having "original," in all others "appellate jurisdiction," but an establishment universal in its operation? And what is that "appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact," but an establishment, which may in effect operate as original jurisdiction?[10]—Or what is an appeal to enquire into facts after a solemn adjudication in any court below, but a trial de novo? And do not such trials clearly imply an incompetency in the inferior courts to exercise any kind of judicial authority with rectitude? Hence, will not this eventually annihilate their whole jurisdiction? Here is a system of jurisprudence to be erected, no less surprising than it is new and unusual. Here is an innovation, which bears no kind of analogy to any thing, that Englishmen, or Americans, the descendants of Englishmen, have ever yet experienced. Add to all, that this high prerogative court establishes no fundamental rule of proceeding, except that the trial by jury is allowed in some criminal cases. All other cases are left open—and subject "to such regulations as the Congress shall make."—Under these circumstances I beseech you all, as citizens of Virginia, to consider seriously whether you will not endanger the solemn trial by jury, which you have long revered, as a sacred barrier against injustice—which has been established by your ancestors many centuries ago, and transmitted to you, as one of the greatest bulwarks of civil liberty—which you have to this day maintained inviolate:—I beseech you, I say, as members of this commonwealth, to consider whether you will not be in danger of losing this inestimable mode of trial in all those cases, wherein the constitution does not provide for its security.[11] Nay, does not that very provision, which is made, by being confined to a few particular cases, almost imply a total exclusion of the rest? Let it, then, be a reflection deeply impressed on your minds—that if this noble privilege, which by long experience has been found the most exquisite method of determining controversies according to the scale of equal liberty, should once be taken away, it is unknown what new species of trial may be substituted in its room. Perhaps you may be surprised with some strange piece of judicial polity,—some arbitrary method, perhaps confining all trials to the entire decision of the magistracy, and totally excluding the great body of the people from any share in the administration of public justice.

5 March 1788

After the most deliberate reflections on this important matter, permit me, 5.14.10
my dear countrymen, to declare to you in the most unfeigned manner, that not perceiving any thing in the proposed plan of government, which seems calculated to ensure the happiness of America—I could not, as a fellow-citizen, resist the inclination to impart these sentiments to you. Unmoved by party—rage—unassailed by passion—uninfluenced by any other interest, but the genuine effusion of zeal for this, our common country, I confess to you in the language of sincerity and candor, that after the first reading of this new code, I could not behold it, but with an eye of disapprobation. Unwilling, however, to reject at first sight an object of such high moment, I resolved to distrust the propriety of a construction passed at so early a period.—This led me to peruse it with the utmost diligence I was capable of; and believe me, the foregoing observations have arisen from the fullest conviction that the system involves in it the most dangerous principles; and—so far from exalting the standard of American liberty, I fear indeed that, should it be adopted, this glorious work, which already has cost the lives of many worthy patriots, will ere long be leveled with the dust. Let it not be conjectured from hence that any illiberal conceptions are formed by the writer hereof respecting the intentions of those gentlemen, who have offered this plan of fœderal government.[12] He knows no circumstance inducing him to suppose they had any other object in view but the good of their country.—When we contemplate the great—the magnanimous HERO, who has conducted our armies through all the trying vicissitudes of danger and difficulty,—there is no man so disingenuous—there is no man so ungrateful, as to impute any transactions of his to sinister motives. Every true American is well assured that steadiness of virtue—that benignity of soul have the chief rule in all his actions.—Yet every American, and every other person, are satisfied also that there is no infallibility in human nature.—To be man is to be subject to error. The best, the greatest, the wisest are liable to commit mistakes.—Let it be remembered, then, that this code of government is solemnly proposed to every freeman in America. For what?—For the purpose of binding them without their approbation? No.—For an implicit acceptance? No.—For their adoption merely in compliment to the general convention? No.—What then?—Every man's duty to his country points out to him the end of this proposition. Every man knows that it is for a free, a candid, and impartial discussion and determination thereon; whether they will approve and adopt it; or whether they will disapprove and reject it. Can any citizen, therefore, be so weak? can any be so timid? so pusillanimous, as to acknowledge that he has no right to exercise his own judgement with regard to this matter? If there should be any haughty spirits among us, who think that this subject ought to be handled by none but a few persons of eminent characters, let such recollect that the dignity, the importance of their country should inspire sentiments more exalted than the highest characters—sentiments, that should correspond with the worth of America, not with the consequence of any mere individuals. Will you, then, Virginians, arrogate too much by boldly asserting the privilege to judge for yourselves in what so nearly concerns the cause of liberty? No, no, my countrymen, you will not arrogate too much; you will not: I avow it by the souls of those brave patriots, who fought for the same cause in the late war. You will in this affair act as becomes you. The rank, you hold amongst the nations of the earth, requires this of you. And you will forfeit that rank: you will forfeit the character of freemen; and shew that you deserve to be enslaved, if you decline that privilege. The happiness of a multitude of people is certainly the highest advantage, which can be conferred on any society: and if you will contribute a full share of duty to effect this, so shall you obtain a due share of glory. No pomp of character, no sound of names, no distinction of birth—no pre-eminence of any kind, should dispose you to hoodwink your own understandings; and in that state suffer yourselves to be led at the will of any order of men whatsoever. The part you have acted heretofore,—the brave, the noble efforts, you have made, are proof enough of your fortitude, and totally exclude every idea of pusillanimity. Herein you have evinced the highest sense of public virtue: herein you have manifested to the whole world that the cause of liberty has hitherto had the prevailing influence over your hearts. And shall men possessed of these sentiments? shall those valiant defenders of their country, who have not feared to encounter toil and danger in a thousand shapes, who have not startled, even at the prospect of death itself? Shall you, O Virginians; shall you, I say, after exhibiting such bright examples of true patriotic heroism, suddenly become inconsistent with yourselves; and were [fail?] to maintain a privilege so incontestibly your due?—No, my countrymen;—by no means can I conceive that the laudable vigor, which flamed so high in every breast, can have so far evaporated in the space of five years. I doubt not, but you will in this trying instance acquit yourselves in a manner worthy of your former conduct. It is not to be feared that you need the force of persuasion, to exercise a proper freedom of enquiry into the merits of this proposed plan of government: or that you will not pay a due attention to the welfare of that country, for which you have already so bravely exerted yourselves. Of this I am well assured; and do not wonder when imagination presents to my view the idea of a numerous and respectable body of men reasoning on the principles of this fœderal constitution. If herein I conceive that you are alarmed at the exceedingly high and extensive authority, which it is intended to establish, I cannot but see the strongest reasons for such apprehensions. For a system, which is to supercede the present different governments of the states, by ordaining that "laws made in pursuance thereof shall be supreme, and shall bind the judges in every state, any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding," must be alarming indeed! What cannot this omnipotence of power effect? How will your bill of rights avail you any thing? By this authority the Congress can make laws, which shall bind all, repugnant to your present constitution—repugnant to every article of your rights; for they are a part of your constitution,—they are the basis of it. So that if you pass this new constitution, you will have a naked plan of government unlimited in its jurisdiction, which not only expunges your bill of rights by rendering ineffectual, all the state governments; but is proposed without any kind of stipulation for any of those natural rights, the security whereof ought to be the end of all governments. Such a stipulation is so necessary, that it is an absurdity to suppose any civil liberty can exist without it. Because it cannot be alledged in any case whatsoever, that a breach has been committed—that a right has been violated; as there will be no standard to resort to—no criterion to ascertain the breach, or even to find whether there has been any violation at all.[13] Hence it is evident that the most flagrant acts of oppression may be inflicted; yet, still there will be no apparent object injured: there will be no unconstitutional infringement. For instance, if Congress should pass a law that persons charged with capital crimes shall not have a right to demand the cause or nature of the accusation, shall not be confronted with the accusers or witnesses, or call for evidence in their own favor; and a question should arise respecting their authority therein,—can it be said that they have exceeded the limits of their jurisdiction, when that has no limits; when no provision has been made for such a right?—When no responsibility on the part of Congress has been required by the constitution? The same observation may be made on any arbitrary or capricious imprisonments contrary to the law of the land. The same may be made, if excessive bail should be required; if excessive fines should be imposed; if cruel and unusual punishments should be inflicted; if the liberty of the press should be restrained: in a word—if laws should be made totally derogatory to the whole catalogue of rights, which are now secured under your present form of government.

You will, doubtless, consider whether the inconveniences may not be very disagreeable, and perhaps injurious, to which this country may be 5.14.11 subjected by excise laws,—by direct taxation of every kind,—by the establishment of fœderal courts. You will advert to the dangerous and oppressive consequences, that may ensue from the introduction of standing armies in times of peace; those baneful engines of ambition, against which free nations have always guarded with the greatest degree of caution. You will determine likewise as to the propriety of being excluded from keeping ships of war without the consent of Congress. The situation of these states renders a naval force extremely desirable. Being bounded on one side by the sea, their coasts are accessible to every lawless adventurer: and without ships to guard them, they are subject to continual depredations. The expediency of this species of defence is manifest. The great advantages to be derived from it,—the strength,—the consequence, which it adds to a nation, are such, that every well-wisher to this country would rejoice to see as large a navy established, as the circumstances of the state can at any time admit of. This, therefore, seems to be a very improper restraint upon the states,—a restraint, which may perhaps eventually prove very injurious.

5.14.12 Upon the whole, my fellow-citizens, if you judge this proposed constitution to be eligible or ineligible, you will accordingly instruct your delegates when they are about to meet in convention. The wisdom of the legislature has judged it advisable to fix the time for deciding on this momentous business at the distance of several months, that you may become thoroughly acquainted with a subject, which so nearly concerns your greatest interests.

5.14.13 I know it is a favorite topic with the advocates for the new government—that it will advance the dignity of Congress; and that the energy, which is now wanting in the fœderal system, will be hereby rendered efficient. Nobody doubts, but the government of the union is susceptible of amendment. But can any one think that there is no medium between want of power, and the possession of it in an unlimited degree? Between the imbecility of mere recommendatory propositions, and the sweeping jurisdiction of exercising every branch of government over the United States to the greatest extent? Between the present feeble texture of the confœderation, and the proposed nervous ligaments? Is it not possible to strengthen the hands of Congress so far as to enable them to comply with all the exigencies of the union—to regulate the great commercial concerns of the continent,—to superintend all affairs, which relate to the United States in their aggregate capacity, without devolving upon that body the supreme powers of government in all its branches?[14] The original institution of Congressional business,—the nature, the end of that institution evince the practicability of such a reform; and shew that it is more honorable, more glorious—and will be more happy for each American state to retain its independent sovereignty. For what can be more truly great in any country than a number of different states in the full enjoyment of liberty—exercising distinct powers of government; yet associated by one general head, and under the influence of a mild, just and well-organized confederation duly held in equilibrio;—whilst all derive those external advantages, which are the great purposes of the union? This separate independency existing in each—this harmony pervading the whole—this due degree of energy in the fœderal department, all together, will form a beautiful species of national grandeur. These will add lustre to every member, and spread a glory all around. These will command the admiration of mankind. These will exhibit a bright specimen of real dignity, far superior to that immense devolution of power, under which the sovereignty of each state shall shrink to nothing.

5.14.14 It requires no great degree of knowledge in history to learn what dangerous consequences generally result from large and extensive powers. Every man has a natural propensity to power; and when one degree of it is obtained, that seldom fails to excite a thirst for more:—an higher point being gained, still the soul is impelled to a farther pursuit. Thus step by step, in regular progression, she proceeds onward, until the lust of domination becomes the ruling passion, and absorbs all other desires. When any man puts himself under the influence of such a passion, it is natural for him to seek after every opportunity, and to employ every means within reach, for obtaining his purpose. There is something so exceedingly bewitching in the possession of power that hardly a man can enjoy it, and not be affected after an unusual manner. The pomp of superiority carries with it charms, which operate strongly on the imagination. Nay, it is a melancholy reflection that too often the very disposition itself is transformed,—and for the gratification of ambitious views, the mild, the gentle, humane—the virtuous becomes cruel and violent, losing all sense of honor, probity, humanity and gratitude.[15]—Hence, should it not be a maxim, never to be forgotten—that a free people ought to intrust no set of men with powers, that may be abused without controul, or afford opportunities to designing men to carry dangerous measures into execution, without being responsible for their conduct? And as no human foresight can penetrate so far into future events, as to guard always against the effects of vice,—as the securest governments are seldom secure enough;—is it not the greatest imprudence to adopt a system, which has an apparent tendency to furnish ambitious men with the means of exerting themselves—perhaps to the destruction of American liberty?

5.14.15 It is next to impossible to enslave a people immediately after a firm struggle against oppression, while the sense of past injury is recent and strong. But after some time this impression naturally wears off;—the ardent glow of freedom gradually evaporates;—the charms of popular equality, which arose from the republican plan, insensibly decline;—the pleasures, the advantages derived from the new kind of government grow stale through use.[16] Such declension in all these vigorous springs of action necessarily produces a supineness. The altar of liberty is no longer watched with such attentive assiduity;—a new train of passions succeeds to the empire of the mind;—different objects of desire take place:—and, if the nation happens to enjoy a series of prosperity, voluptuousness, excessive fondness for riches, and luxury gain admission and establish themselves—these produce venality and corruption of every kind, which open a fatal avenue to bribery. Hence it follows, that in the midst of this general contageon a few men—or one—more powerful than all others, industriously endeavor to obtain all authority; and by means of great wealth—or embezzling the public money,—perhaps totally subvert the government, and erect a system of aristocratical or monarchic tyranny in its room. What ready means for this work of evil are numerous standing armies, and the disposition of the great revenue of the United States! Money can purchase soldiers;—soldiers can produce money; and both together can do any thing. It is this depravation of manners, this wicked propensity, my dear countrymen, against which you ought to provide with the utmost degree of prudence and circumspection. All nations pass this parokism of vice at some period or other;—and if at that dangerous juncture your government is not secure upon a solid foundation, and well guarded against the machinations of evil men, the liberties of this country will be lost—perhaps forever!

5.14.16 Let us establish a strong fœderal government, which shall render our Congress a great and eminent body, says one. By all means, replies another; and then they will command the attention of all Europe.—Why, pray, what will it avail you in the hour of distress—in the midst of calamity, though all Europe should pay attention to the Congress? What advantage will it be to the citizens of America, should they elevate Congress to the highest degree of grandeur;—should the sound of that grandeur be wafted across the Atlantic, and echoe through every town in Europe? What will the pomp—the splendor of that dignified body profit you, I say, if you place yourselves in a situation, which may terminate in wretchedness? Of what consequence will that state of congressional pre-eminence be to you, or to your posterity, if either the one, or the other should thereby be reduced to a mere herd of——? O great GOD, avert that dreadful catastrophe.—Let not the day be permitted to dawn, which shall discover to the world that America remains no longer a free nation!—O let not this last sacred asylum of persecuted liberty cease to afford a resting place for that fair goddess!—Re-animate each spirit, that languishes in this glorious cause! Shine in upon us, and illumine all our counsels!—Suffer thy bright ministers of grace to come down and direct us;—and hovering for awhile on the wings of affection, breathe into our souls true sentiments of wisdom!—that in this awful, this important moment we may be conducted safely through the maze of error;—that a firm basis of national happiness may be established, and flourish in undiminished glory through all succeeding ages!

December 17,1787.

II
28 May 1788

I have in a former paper endeavored to take a view of the leading principles 5.14.17 of the new fœderal constitution. In pursuing the design of that address it was necessary to make some previous remarks on the nature of civil government in general: This led me to premise the material discrimination between arbitrary constitutions and the constitution of free governments.

The arbitrary species, or those, which fix no other limits to the supreme rulers, but their own wills, are totally incompatible with the spirit of civil liberty, and exclude every idea of free government. These may be described by the harsher epithet of despotism.

Some men may perhaps fancy a distinction where in reality none exists. 5.14.18
They may conceive the possibility of a government being constituted, which may with great propriety be denominated arbitrary; and yet consider it not as despotic. If, however, it be recollected that the term despotism is a relative expression arising from the authority of masters over their servants, which authority is founded in the will of the masters, it must plainly appear that every degree of arbitrary power is despotic; and that tyranny in government, whether it be distinguished by the former, or by the latter, appellation, is its regular and natural production. For whenever a power becomes vested in any agent, as unrestrained as the will of that agent, in him are immediately created the properties of a master; and those, over whom he exercises such power, stand ipso facto in the relation of servants.

To some the bare mention of despotic rule conveys the most alarming 5.14.19 ideas of horror; yet at the same time are they satisfied with [ ] as they imagine, of some [ ].[17] With [ ]vency of zeal they urge the expediency of a plan, which has for its basis the extended sphere of human will. They contend that it is necessary to establish a system, so unrestrained in its nature, in order to effectuate a strong and energetic government. This desirable object they seem to consider as unattainable by any other means;—and that all institutions, which convey only a limited authority, are inadequate to the purposes of society.

Such a kind of responsibility, as would form a check on the supreme 5.14.20 rulers, is deemed a source of continual impediment; and—to secure any degree of natural liberty, however small a residuum, is, in contemplation of their minds, laying the foundation of a weak government, liable to endless confusions, and productive of nothing better than sedition and anarchy. They conceive a fondness for this species of government, because it is framed in the republican stile; and, although fraught with the seeds of despotism, the apparent lovliness of its outward garb hides all the deformity of its inward corruptions. Whence it is manifest that distinctions are formed, which are preposterous and merely imaginary.

Nothing, perhaps, has contributed more towards interrupting the repose of mankind than a curious attention to the names and shadows of things, whilst the real essence and substantial parts have been disregarded.

5.14.21 That, which in any particular form has once produced much evil and discontent, generally stamps a lasting impression on the mind, and is not contemplated but with extreme detestation; although evils of the same nature, when inflicted under a different appearance, are frequently submitted to without repining. Thus, after the expulsion of Tarquin, and with him the extinction of regal authority in Rome, the name of King was ever odius to the Roman people; yet did they acquiesce in the exercise of arbitrary transactions under a different form of government. Such were they frequently subjected to through the various stages of their republic; until at last the sovereign power was established in the person of a single man. This change produced a system of government, unbounded as the regal sway, and no less susceptible of tyrannical proceedings. They could then respect the name of emperor, unlimited as he was, and, though exposed to all the rage of oppression, bow down with reverence, and venerate the imperial scepter.

5.14.22 The insidious attempts under a British administration to pervert the former government into a baneful system of tyranny had spread a general alarm throughout America. Opposition to arbitrary measures manifested itself among all ranks of people. Diligent inquiries were made to [ ][18] the schemes of their enemies; jealousies excited to an unusual degree with respect to their rights and privileges;—whilst exertions were made, which produced the most desirable effects. All these circumstances conspired in exhibiting very favorable prospects, and promised a lasting security to American liberty.

5.14.23 The injuries suffered under a government, which exposed the people of these states to the machinations of wicked and designing ministers, determined them in the choice of a system, which had principally in view the preservation of their liberty. Such was its grand object. In pursuit of this plan, as the great means of national happiness, constitutions were formed for the different states upon principles, salutary in their nature; and tending to perpetuate the freedom and independency of each. To these was added a confederation, under which the separate republics so constituted might harmonize in all their general interests.

5.14.24 Thus were they situated—when a defect was apprehended in this confederation. The ineffectual endeavors to promote some important advantages, and to answer all the exigencies of the union, indicated a weakness in the general government. A revision was deemed expedient. When, therefore, a new constitution was proposed, it became the duty of every American diligently to enquire, first, whether this system was coincident with their standing maxims of liberty; and, if so—whether conducive to good policy. If found derogatory to the former—any consideration respecting the latter should be unnecessary. This alone should mark it, as dangerous, and unworthy of approbation. The genius of America [ ][19] that no fancied schemes of policy should compensate for the adoption of a plan discordant to be favorite principles of liberty. This is not a chimerical illusion, but a solid and interesting consideration. A mind thus convicted must act inconsistent with propriety, and contrary to every sentiment of duty, if it would then approve of the plan.

The writer of this address had, therefore, in his first number chiefly intended to take up this matter only so far as related to its principles—and having conceived that these were incompatible with the admired maxims of American liberty, his objections on that head were there laid down.

Observing, however, that most of the writers in favor of the plan seem in a great measure to have passed over this important point—and recommend it merely from motives of policy; it is now intended, as the business of some succeeding papers, to state objections to such of the constituent parts of the plan, abstracted of its principles, as appear, in his opinion, improperly constructed, and calculated to produce ill effects in their operation. These writers seem not to regard any fundamentals in government, provided they can procure a plan, in which they fancy some prospects of immediate benefit are to be discovered. In conformity with the stile of the proposed constitution, the favorers of it have, with a peculiarity of self-applause, ascribed to themselves the distinction of fœderalists; while those, who oppose the plan are marked with the epithet of anti-fœderal.[20] 5.14.25

The strong desire, which has been manifested, for a union between the American states, since the revolution, affords an opportunity of making the distinction, as they imagine, to their advantage.—As fœderalists, in their opinion, they must be deemed friendly to the union:—as anti-fœderal, the opposers must, in their opinion too, be considered unfriendly. Thus on the sound of names they build their fame. 5.14.26

For those gentlemen, however, let it be observed that the opponents seem to act on the broader scale of true fœderal principles. The advocates for the new code with all sovereignty to be lodged in the hands of Congress. This is not to connect thirteen independent states—but to form one extended empire by compounding the whole, and thus destroying the sovereignty of each. The other party desire a continuance of each distinct sovereignty—and are anxious for such a degree of energy in the general government, as will cement the union in the strongest manner. This they consider as one of the greatest blessings, which can attend their country.

III

4 June 1788

Besides those inherent rights, which should be established as fundamental principles, independent of the constitution, there are certain other maxims essential to every free government. These should pervade the whole plan. 5.14.27

They should be interwoven with its very texture. And, as it is necessary that the first should be preserved sacred and inviolate; so ought the last to be regarded as indispensible. These should be the leading properties, the head—the soul of the system; whilst those exist entire, supreme and uncontroled.[21]

5.14.28 It will not be denied, that all power is originally vested in the people, and that it should be exercised either immediately by themselves, or mediately by their representatives. These are maxims, without the observance of which the liberty of every nation must expire. When the power is exercised by their representatives, it is expedient that the representation be ample and complete. It should be ample, that amongst the members there may be a competent knowledge of the constituents their sentiments, connections, views and habits; and that amongst the constituents, there may generally be a due degree of knowledge respecting the virtues and abilities of the members.[22]

5.14.29 In extensive territories, where the people are widely dispersed, and individuals can have very little communication beyond the circle of their own neighbourhood, the representation should also be extensive. In countries thus situated, unless the legislature be numerous, there cannot be expected amongst the members thereof a general knowledge of their constituents: and when the member to be elected bears a very small proportion to the number of electors, it is utterly improbable that the majority should have an adequate knowledge of those, who will be elected. So that a great part of the community must in a manner be obliged to submit their most important concerns into the hands of a few persons unknown to themselves, and of whose wisdom, integrity and patriotism they can form no competent judgment.

5.14.30 Again, the representation should be complete, that is, it should be such as to comprehend every species of interest within the society. All orders of men, who have any permanent interest in the government, as far as practicable, ought to be represented. Regarding, then, the great diversity, which pervades most communities, from the highest landed concerns through the various stages of mercantile and mechanic interests, we must discover the necessity of an extensive delegation. When, therefore, the number of representatives in a legislature is very small, this affords objections, not only because they are not numerous enough to contain a competent knowledge of their constituents: they are inadequate to, and cannot sufficiently respect, all the complicated,[23] variant and opposite interests, which must necessarily subsist in a commonwealth, whose inhabitants are spread over a wide-extended country. The smallness of their number enhances the dignity of their seats; and none can expect to obtain a seat, except men of the most elevated station. Thus in the beginning of a government so constituted there will be laid a foundation for the exercise of undue influence, whereby every branch of supreme power will be in a manner monopolized by one set of men: and thus the delegation will become partial. For, besides the effect of this undue influence in elections, the dispersed situation of the electors, together with that of the candidates, will ever produce much division amongst the suffrages;—and so the select party, who will be distinguished by their superior wealth, being the leading junto in this business, will easily procure a competent number to decide for themselves or their favorites.

5.14.31 Thus it will generally happen, that elections will be determined, not by the majority of the people, but perhaps by an inconsiderable part of them; and the persons chosen will be such, whose situation and rank in life had removed them far from a knowledge of the great body of the people. They will consequently be unacquainted with the customs, feelings, opinions and wishes of most of their constituents: and as the constituents will be unacquainted with their representatives,—these will not possess the confidence of those. Doubt and distrust will prevail.—That course of congenial sentiment—that reciprocity of common interest between the legislature and bulk of the nation, which should be the soul of republicanism, and are the chief objects of a free, unbiassed and general representation, will not exist in this kind of government. How, then, can it be expected that a strict regard to the good of all will mark the public proceedings? Who can really imagine that a body, thus constituted and thus invested with sovereign authority, will regularly devote their labors to promote the happiness, prosperity and freedom of a community, over whom they bear the rule—when they view themselves advanced to this state of exaltation—when this high degree of dignity will tempt them to look down with indifference, perhaps contempt, on the inhabitants of a spacious territory, as the subjects of their government—and when they contemplate these, as generally unconnected with themselves in all their most important concerns?—The uniform experience of ages operates against the idea. It may be dangerous to indulge in such a scheme of policy—lest its fairest prospects should prove visionary indeed!—lest in its exercise the directly contrary effects should be produced.

5.14.32 For the foregoing reasons, the legislative powers proposed to be granted according to the new system appear liable to material objections. For herein the number of representatives being too small to encourage the idea of a full or complete deputation, there is no prospect of securing a due regard to all the different interests necessarily arising amongst the numerous inhabitants of America, spread over a territory so extensive—so vast—so various in climate, products, habits and connections.

5.14.33 That part of the legislature, which is particularly denominated the house of representatives, is indeed the only popular branch; and although these officers are to be chosen by the immediate suffrages of the people, yet their dignity being necessarily great in proportion as their number is small, fair and unbiassed elections are scarcely probable, if not impracticable.

In the appointment and constitution of the other branch,[24] the senate, we have but the shade of a deputation from the people. The state-legislatures, it seems, are to elect this body. The objections, which apply to the house of representatives, hold more strongly with regard to this, in as much as longer continuance in office will be productive of more danger; and the mode of appointment, by rendering them more independent of the people, will preclude these from having any decisive influence on their conduct.

5.14.34 It is no argument in favor of the manner proposed, that it is the same, by which the members of the present Congress are chosen. The nature and end of the one being totally different from those of the other, if they be duly considered, it may, perhaps, be thought not inexpedient to vary the proceedings respecting them. The Congress under the present confederation are the deputies of sovereign states in the full exercise of independent government. These deputies are appointed by the legislatures thereof, not for the purpose of regulating the internal police of the states, but to superintend their general and foreign affairs so far as all the states are concerned in common. When, therefore, the legislature of any state is actually existing and in the exercise of their office, it seems not improper that such deputies should be appointed by them: so in strictness they appear to be the deputies of the legislature; and are to them immediately amenable. The proposed senate are to exercise a share of legislation in the general government, and to participate in the sovereignty of America. Thus circumstanced, they will know not any authority superior to that, whereof they themselves possess a part. They are intended, as such, to be a branch of the representation of the people. To the people they ought to be amenable: and by the people they ought to be chosen.

IV

5.14.35 Although the senate and house of representatives are to be established, and it seems to be the spirit of the proposed plan of government, that they should be considered as the grand deputation of America—the great aggregate body, to whom shall be delegated the important trust of representing the whole nation—the august, puissant assembly, in whom shall reside the full majesty of the people: yet, it seems too, these alone shall not be sufficient to exercise the powers of legislation. It is ordained, as a necessary expedient in the fœderal government, that a president of the United States (who is to hold the supreme executive power) should also concur in passing every law.

In monarchy, where the established maxim is, that the king should be respected as a great and transcendent personage, who knows no equal—who in his royal political capacity can commit no wrong—to whom no evil can be ascribed—in whom exists the height of perfection—who is supreme above all, and accountable to no earthly being, it is consistent with such a maxim, that the prince should form a constituent branch of the legislature, and that his power of rejecting whatever has been passed by the other branches should be distinct, and co-extensive with that of either of those branches in rejecting what has been proposed and consented to by the other. It is necessary that the fundamental laws of the realm should ascribe to the king those high and eminent attributes—that he should possess in himself the sovereignty of the nation; and that the regal dignity should distinguish him, as superior to all his subjects, and in his political character endowed with certain inherent qualities, which cannot be supposed to reside in any other individual within the kingdom: otherwise, that constitutional independence, which the laws meant peculiarly to establish in his person, would not be preserved. To this end the king of England is invested with the sole executive authority, and a branch of legislative jurisdiction so far as to pass his negative on all proceedings of the other two branches, or to confirm them by his assent. 5.14.36

This secures to him the intended superiority in the constitution, and gives him the ascendant in government; else his sovereignty would become a shadow—whilst that doctrine, whereby he is declared to be the head, the beginning and end of the great body politic, would prove to be nothing more than mere sound. This two-fold jurisdiction established in the British monarch being founded on maxims extremely different from those, which prevail in the American States, the writer hereof is inclined to hope that he will not be thought singular, if he conceives an impropriety in assimilating the component parts of the American government to those of the British: and as the reasons, which to the founders of the British constitution were motives superior to all others to induce them thus to give the executive a controul over the legislative, are so far from existing in this country, that every principle of that kind is generally, if not universally, exploded; so it should appear that the same public spirit, which pervades the nation, would proclaim the doctrine of prerogative and other peculiar properties of the royal character, as incompatible with the view of these states when they are settling the form of a republican government.[25] Is it not therefore sufficient that every branch in the proposed system be distinct and independent of each other—that no one branch might receive any accession of power (by taking part of another) which would tend to overturn the balance and thereby endanger the very being of the constitution? Whilst the king of England enjoys all the regalia, which are annexed to his crown—whilst he exercises a transcendent dominion over his subjects, the existence whereof is coeval with the first rudiments of their constitution—let the free citizens 5.14.37 of America, consulting their true national happiness, wish for no innovation, but what is regulated according to the scale of equal liberty, or which may not destroy that liberty by too great a share of power being lodged in any particular hands;—let this collateral jurisdiction, which constitutes the royal negative, be held by kings alone, since with kings it first originated:—Let this remain in its native soil, as most congenial to it; there it will cumber less, and be more productive,—here it will be an exotick, and may poison the stock, in which it may be engrafted.

5.14.38 It will be said, perhaps, that the power, granted the president, of approving or disapproving the proceedings, which have passed the senate and house of representatives, will not be so decisive in its nature as the king's negative. True it is, this power of rejecting does not extend so far as primarily to produce an entire overthrow of any law, which has passed those two houses: but it may be expected that in many instances this negative will amount to a final and conclusive rejection. For as a law, which has been once disapproved by the president, cannot be re-passed without the agreement of two-thirds of both houses, there can be no doubt, it will frequently happen that this concurrence of two thirds cannot be obtained. The law must then fall: and thus the president, although he has not the power of resolving originally and enacting any laws, independent of those two houses, hath nevertheless in the legislative scale of government a weight almost equal to that of two thirds of the whole Congress. If the system proposed had been calculated to extend his authority a little farther, he would preponderate against all—he alone would possess the sovereignty of America. For if the whole executive authority and an absolute, entire negative on the legislature should become united in one person, these must, with regard to that person, destroy every idea of a subject. Thus circumstanced he cannot be the object of any laws; he will be above all law: as none can be enacted without his consent—he will be elevated to the height of supremacy.—

5.14.39 How near will the president approach to this consummate degree of power! The portion allotted him may, however, be amply sufficient to give him the ascendant in the constitution. He must continually acquire great accessions of weight in every scale of government, as chief magistrate and generalissimo of the United States—at the same time possessing so great a share in the legislature, as a revision of all bills and other proceedings which shall have passed the senate and house of representatives with a discretionary right of rejecting them—united with the senate in making treaties, appointing all public ministers, judges, and a train of other officers, who will be necessary for carrying on the business of government; thus dispensing honor and profit throughout America—whilst copious streams of influence must flow from him, as from a source. Can the different departments be duly balanced when all these high powers concenter in one branch? Is it not rather probable that this branch will destroy the balance, and eventually rise to the fulness of dominion?

When the spirit of America becomes such, as to ascribe to their president all those extraordinary qualities, which the subjects of kingly governments ascribe to their princes: then, it is presumed, and not till then, he may consistently be invested with a power similar to theirs.[26] 5.14.40

It is remarkable how the president and senate mutually participate in the exercise of a two-fold jurisdiction. How, then, can it be surprising to any one, if some citizens, truly jealous of their liberties, are alarmed with the apprehensions of aristocracy? Those, who seriously reflect on the properties of human nature, and who possess republican principles, will suppose they conceive grounds for such apprehensions: those, who have different sentiments, will not care whether there are grounds for such apprehensions, or not.

When a change, so momentous in it's nature, as that of new modelling a plan of government, becomes the object of any people's meditation, every citizen, whose mind is duly impressed with a regard for the welfare of his country, will consider himself under an indispensible obligation to make some such enquiries, as the following.—Whence flows the necessity of a change?—Does it proceed from certain vicious properties, which reside in the old system and form the essential parts of it?[27]—Or will such a measure become eligible, because evils have arisen from the feeble texture of the plan, or a loose exercise of government, which could not well be avoided?—What are the evils complained of? and what will be their correspondent remedies?—Are the evils radical, and not be removed but by a general reform throughout the constitution?—Or do they result from a defect in some particular branch only? and may an adequate remedy be effected by introducing a new regulation merely as to that branch? 5.14.41

If investigations like these are seriously and dispassionately pursued, and it should be found that the present confederation of the American states contains vicious properties, which are inherent, fundamental, and tending to produce a general corruption, the necessity of a change must then be manifest. This discovery will lead to another enquiry; and that is—Do such properties pervade the whole system and contaminate all the parts of it? If so—then a thorough change will appear to be expedient, and it may be necessary to new model the system. 5.14.42

5.14.43 If, on the other hand, evils are found existing, which proceed, not so much from any internal corrupt qualities, as from the feeble texture of any parts of the system, or a laxity in the exercise of it's powers, it should seem adviseable to make alterations so far as to add a due degree of strength to the weak parts, and thereby insure efficacy in the government.

Should it appear, after a proper enquiry into the nature of the evils, that they are radical, and strike at the vital principles of the constitution—then to apply a correspondent remedy, an institution, which would produce a general reform, might with great propriety be deemed requisite.

If the defects are of a trivial nature, and subsist merely in some particular department or branch of the system—then amendments in the defective branch, tending to give energy where it had hitherto been wanting, would be amply sufficient for removing the evils and forming a competent remedy.

5.14.44 In order to discover how far the present system is vicious, or inadequate to the purposes of this great confederated society, for which it was established, a retrospect of the original design of the confederacy itself may afford no small degree of assistance.—Let it be recollected, then, that the primary object was to form a perfect union. This is manifested by the very "stile of the confederacy."[28]—That it was intended to promote justice equally between all the states cannot be doubted; because it is an institution, calculated to unite a number of independent republics under a firm league of amity,[29] and to provide that contributions of every kind, which had been, or might be, necessary towards supporting their general government, should be furnished in due proportions[30]—whilst it was stipulated that a mutual intercourse and reciprocal privileges and immunities should subsist between the citzens of all the several states.[31] Again, to ensure domestic tranquility must have been another important object with the framers of this confederation: for union, harmony and justice cannot fail to promote tranquility; and whenever a contract is formed for the purpose of procuring the three first, it follows, as a regular consequence, that the other should partake of the intention.—This great association is expressly declared to be entered into between the states "for their common defence, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, binding themselves to assist each other against all force offered to, or attacks made upon, them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretence whatever."[32]

5.14.45 The objects herein recited do certainly form the chief design of the present confederation; and the same are declared to be the great ends of the proposed plan of government. So far then do they agree. A subject of much contention, however, and with which the minds of different citizens are variously agitated, has arose.

5.14.46 It has been said that some of these advantages, and of high import too, cannot be obtained under the present system. It is the opinion of some citizens that the constitution proposed to us will secure all these objects and form a complete remedy for every evil now subsisting; whilst it is asserted by others that amendments might be introduced in the former, which would be competent to every good purpose, and promote some of very great consequence, that might be endangered by an adoption of the latter. Thus it is inferred that this system extends too far—and, like many human institutions, flits by a rapid progress from one extreme to another.

Those, who cannot approve of this plan, have very strong objections to it, 5.14.47 because they apprehend that no security for their liberties will remain after it's adoption: and although some of the ends proposed might be obtained thereby; yet they think the sacrifice will be too great for the benefit to be received. To enjoy a competent degree of liberty they consider as the greatest of human blessings—for the loss of which no acquisitions whatsoever can compensate. They esteem this (and deservedly too) as the soul of all political happiness.

It seems to be agreed on all sides that in the present system of union the 5.14.48
Congress are not invested with sufficient powers for regulating commerce, and procuring the requisite contributions for all expences, that may be incurred for the common defence or general welfare. Hence arise the principal defects;—and it is presumed that the evils resulting from these weak branches in the fœderal government might be adequately remedied by making due amendments merely therein.

It is thought by some that the powers of making and enforcing the obser- 5.14.49 vance of treaties are not ample enough at present. If so—cannot these be enlarged so as to answer every desirable purpose of that branch in the fœderal institution? Thus, while many citizens cannot think that the confederation is fundamentally vicious, but that all the evils now complained of do rather proceed from a weakness in some of its parts, they apprehend no necessity for an innovation further than strengthening those parts. If such measures were effectually established, they conceive that all the great ends of the general government might be promoted.—No contention, therefore, subsists about supporting a union, but only concerning the mode; and as well those, who disapprove of the proposed plan, as those, who approve of it, consider the existence of a union as essential to their happiness.[33]

Reply to Cassius
By Brutus

VIRGINIA INDEPENDENT CHRONICLE
14 May. 1788

In this short piece, Brutus (unrelated to the famous New York Brutus, 2.9) defends Richard Henry Lee against attacks by Cassius.[1] He deals primarily with the separation of powers (quoting Montesquieu), objecting especially to the combination of the Executive and the Senate in the treaty power and the inadequate provision for Executive impeachment. He stresses the need for greater restrictions on the rulers, (quoting Cato's Letters) and ends with miscellaneous criticisms of the Constitution.

1. See Lee 5.6 intro.

Mr. Davis.

Sir,

In your Chronicle, of April the 2d, you have furnished the public with a piece under the signature of Cassius, which states that "opinions have been insidiously disseminated, respecting the fœderal constitution, which are entirely devoid of truth," etc.[1] Whether this assertion is true or not remains with Cassius to prove, and to shew the impropriety of—The term insidiously may indeed be applied, as Cassius has applied it, abusively, to treat the most decent consideration of a subject, which[,] deeply interesting every freeman of the state[,] requires to be freely and fully discussed—or why was it placed before the public for the consideration of the people? But Cassius will do well to shew by what authority he calls a mere project or proposed plan of government "the Fœderal Constitution"—Were any citizen insidiously to disseminate falsehoods against a government established, there would be occasion for censure, but surely no man of sense or modesty, will arrogate to himself and his associates an exclusive right to give opinions upon a submitted question which essentially concerns the dearest rights of humanity. It is certainly to be lamented, that a subject so momentous as government, cannot be temperately and decently agreed upon, without producing 5.15.1

the most illiberal abuse and indecent violation of all good sense and good manners! Mr. Lee had certainly as good a right to give his sentiments to the proposed plan of government, to his friend, as Cassius had to trouble the public with his curious dissertation on parts of Mr. Lee's letter—the first objection to which letter Cassius thinks to be what follows—"It has hitherto been supposed a fundamental maxim that in governments rightly balanced, the different branches of legislation should be unconnected, and the legislative and executive powers separated"[2]—The candid reader may observe here that as an American is giving his opinions to an American concerning American government, the principles which reign in the American, and not in the British form of government, should have occupied his mind. In support of Mr. Lee's opinion, let us, passing over similar declarations in other states, see what is asserted by two of the most considerable states in the union. The Massachusetts bill of rights contains these remarkable words—"In the government of this commonwealth, the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them; the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them; the executive shall never exercise the legislative or judicial powers, or either of them; to the end it may be a government of laws and not of men."[3] This sensible republic considers the union of either of these powers as producing a government of men and not of laws. The bill of rights or constitution of our country declares, "The legislative, executive, and judiciary departments, shall be separate and distinct, so that neither exercise the powers of more than one of them at the same time."[4] The judgment of the learned Montesquieu will be found analogous to these declarations of Virginia and Massachusetts. This able writer says, "whenever the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person or in the same body of magistracy, there can be then no liberty; because apprehensions may arise that the same monarch or senate should enact tyrannical laws to execute them in a tyrannical manner. Again, there is no liberty if the power of judging be not separated from the legislative and executive powers. Were it joined with the legislative the life and liberty of the subject would be exposed to arbitrary controul, for the judge would then be the legislator. Were it joined to the executive power, the judge might behave with all the violence of an oppressor. Miserable indeed would be the case, "were the same man or the same body of men, whether of the nobles or the people, to exercise those three powers, that of enacting laws, that of executing the public resolutions, and that of judging the crimes and differences of individuals"[5]—I may now be allowed to call upon Cassius in his own civil language—"Cassius what say you? are these quotations just or not? I dare you to speak out. I should not, Sir, have produced them, did I not conceive it necessary to convince the world, that you are either totally ignorant of the subject on which you write, or that you have ungenerously attempted to deceive the people against your better information." It is reasonably to be expected that the good people of America will rather approve of the American ideas of Mr. Lee, than the ill understood British ideas of Cassius. I will not dispute with you Cassius, or with your authority, whether "the negative given to the King (of Great-Britain I suppose you mean) on the proceedings of both houses of parliament, was conceived absolutely necessary to preserve the balance of power, although the King at the same time exercises the whole executive power." But I think Cassius will find in Lord Clarendon's history, that both houses of parliament joined in declaring to the people, "that the King of England was obliged by his coronation oath to pass such laws as the people should choose by the two houses of parliament, and that since laws have passed by way of bills they did not find that ever the Kings did deny them, otherwise than is expressed in that usual answer "LeRoy s'avisera," which signifies rather a suspension than a refusal of the royal assent."[6] It will be very difficult I believe, to find three instances in the course of one hundred years back of any such prerogative being exercised by the Kings of England. However let it be granted, that the British Kings have a negative on the bills proposed by the two houses, and that they have also the executive power, does it follow that Mr. Lee did not reasonably object to the proposed plan of government which joins the president with the senate in the general discharge of executive powers, when they are both of them branches of the legislature, and in some instances the whole of the legislature, and when at the same time the senate are the sole judges of impeachments, thus rendering responsibility difficult, if not impracticable? Here your favorite constitution of England foresakes you—in that system the King is aided in the exercise of his executive functions by a privy council (not by the house of Lords) the members of which are put in the way of responsibility by being obliged to sign the advice they give in a council book. Doctor Blackstone says that the abuse of the kingly power in making treaties to the detriment of the nation is checked "by the means of parliamentary impeachment for the punishment of such ministers as from criminal motives advise or conclude any treaty, which shall afterwards by judged to derogate from the honor and interest of the nation."[7]—Now let me again apply in the civil words of Cassius—"stand forth, thou deliberate deceiver of the public and answer"—if a treaty were made by the president and senate that should be found prejudicial to the interest and honor of the United States, how is punishment to be applied? By impeaching the senate before the senate, who are to judge of their own crimes in this respect, and inflict punishment in themselves? The public will then judge, Cassius, of these your insolent questions proposed to Mr. Lee—"Do you not sincerely believe that the concurrence of the senate with the president in the execution of this power is a happy innovation (innovation on what Cassius?) in the fœderal constitution? Will it not afford a strong additional security to the people for its faithful performance? Do you not conceive it to be one of the loveliest features of the new constitution?" I will help you to answer these handsome questions yourself by a citation from Cato's letters, written by very able defenders of public liberty in the early parts of the present century—"Considering what sort of a creature man is, it is scarce possible to put him under too many restraints, when he is possessed of great power: He may possibly use it well; but they act most prudently, who, supposing that he would use it ill, enclose him within certain bounds, and make it terrible in him to exceed them. Men that are above all fear, soon grow above all shame. Rupto pudore et metu suo tantum ingenio utebatur, says Tacitus of Tiberius. Even Nero had lived a great while inoffensively and reigned virtuously. But finding at last that he might do what he would, he let loose his appetite for blood, and committed such mighty, such monstrous, such unnatural slaughters and outrages, as none but a heart bent on the study of cruelty could have devised"[8]—I would advise you Cassius to read Cato's letters, they may perhaps inform your mind, which appears at present to be extremely uninformed, and render you a better citizen of a free government than the principles you now profess seem to promise. Are you sure, Cassius, absolutely certain, that a King of England can make a valid treaty that shall contravene the previously established law of the land, whether common or statute, because as you say the law of nations is part of the law of the land.—But so is the law of parliament part of the law of the land, and yet either house of parliament that can make this kind of law, cannot by their single determinations repeal or alter an act of parliament, or the common law. Do you think, Cassius, that the King by treaty can alienate the British dominions? Every man acquainted with the subject will, I believe answer NO. That in such case an act of parliament must give validity to the treaty. Yet by the new plan of government, a treaty made by the president and senate shall be "the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby."—That seems to be saying in other words that a part shall be greater than the whole—Or that though three branches must make the law, two may destroy it—I apprehend, Cassius, these strictures will prove, even to yourself, that you are but little fitted to give opinions upon government, to the public; where quackery is more surely to be discovered than in the private prescriptions of other professions, and that you have but lightly considered the proposed constitution for the states which you so rudely (I wish I were not compelled to say weakly) support—If you really understand any thing of this latter subject, so adventurous a champion as yourself may give the public satisfactory reasons why a power is given to the new Congress over the times, places and manner of holding elections for representatives; because such a power is capable of the grossest abuse by ordering all the elections of this country to be held at the most inconvenient places, where few can or will attend to vote? Why so ill an opinion of the justice and judges, of our country should be entertained as that citizens of other states and foreigners should have liberty to carry our citizens into the fœderal courts for the most trifling causes? Perhaps you know that England and Scotland are united for every good purpose, and yet that an Englishman cannot originally sue a Scotchman in any court erected by an act of parliament of Great-Britain, although in great cases an appeal may go to the house of Lords? I believe you will find that this degrading idea of our courts is truly original, and that nothing similar to it, is to be found in the history of nations. An Englishman will not allow you to carry him out of his own country for debt, but he may carry a citizen of Virginia to Philadelphia, or wherever the new Congress may appoint, upon every frivolous pretext, and there try him without a jury—because the supreme fœderal court in appeal shall have jurisdiction both "as to law and fact." Tell us if you please why no declaration is made in form of a bill of rights to secure the freedom of the press, the trial by jury, common law securities in criminal accusations, and to save from violation the rights of conscience? So able an advocate as you for the new constitution may also assign a good reason why Delaware, that pays but a sixty-seventh part of the general expences, should vote on a money bill in the senate equally with Virginia that pays a sixth part of the same expences? Perhaps you may satisfy us that another convention cannot be obtained to remedy the defects that are so apparent in this proposed system. Whether Mr. Lee does or does not, think it worth his while to correct your errors, the government under which we are to live, is too serious a matter to suffer your deceptions and abuse of good characters to pass unnoticed.*—You should remember, Cassius, that there is a great difference between a railer and a reasoner; that good sense and good manners are essential to good writing.

Brutus.

Will you have the goodness, Cassius, to reconcile this paradox of yours to the public,* that the House of Commons has been found by experience a sufficient counterpoise to the kingly powers in England, although the same House of Commons is supposed to be always under the influence of the crown by bribery of different kinds. It will not do to suggest, as you have done, that it will take less money to bribe one hundred than five hundred, because the same argument should persuade America to put their government into the hands of one man, because less money may do to bribe one, than one hundred men!

1. Cassius' criticism was directed against Lee's letter to Governor Randolph of 16 October 1787, which is printed above, 5.6. The Cassius essays appeared in the Virginia Independent Chronicle of 2, 9, and 23 April 1788.

2. The quotation is from Lee's letter 5.6.1. Speeches of Patrick Henry in the Virginia State Ratifying Convention

June 1788

Although he wrote no Anti-Federalist pamphlet or essay, Patrick Henry argued mightily against the Constitution in the Virginia Ratifying convention. The Virginia convention contained the most distinguished Anti-Federalist group in the country; yet Henry carried the opposition argument for the first week almost alone, in a series of six speeches covering the whole Anti-Federal ground, an exhibition of stamina, argument, and rhetoric unmatched on either side during the ratification debate. Henry's forensic skill;[1] his exploitation of his popularity with the independent yeomanry, with whom he shared a common origin; the maintenance of a simple, common manner and, some said, even an affected vulgarized pronunciation, contributed to his reputation as a demagogue, a reputation reenforced by his subsequent reentry into politics in 1799 as a Federalist.[2] It is doubtless true, as Nevins said, that he was not a "great constructive statesman,"[3] but that he was a man of substance as well as talent is demonstrated by his performance at the Virginia ratification convention.

Unfortunately Henry left no written record elucidating his political opinions, and his biographies do not so much discuss underlying guiding principles as enumerate specific positions.[4] George Ticknor Curtis, whose judgment is more favorable than that of many historians, described with approval Henry's contemporaries' opinion that, although wise, he lacked comprehensiveness, "and that the mere intensity with which he regarded the ends of public liberty was likely to mislead his judgment as to the means by which it was to be secured and upheld."[5] He was a Union man; indeed, it was he who at the First Continental Congress—his only public service outside Virginia—stated the fundamental principle of the nationalist position, words echoed in 1787 by James Wilson at Philadelphia. "The Distinctions between Virginians, Pennsylvanians, New Yorkers and New Englanders are no more. I am not a Virginian, but an American."[6] It was, however, as a Virginian that he performed most of his public service, as governor of Virginia and member of its House of Delegates, and it was through the eyes of a Virginian that he viewed American concerns. He declined an invitation to serve as one of Virginia's delegates to the Federal Convention in 1787, to a considerable extent at least because of his opposition to the Jay negotiations with Spain, in which he saw a willingness on the part of the Northern States to barter the United States claim to the Mississippi for commercial advantage.[7]

Henry's brilliant, turbulent, repetitious argument before the Virginia convention is unusually difficult to edit. Printed here in their entirety are his first two speeches (4 and 5 June) and two later, shorter speeches on a bill of rights (16 and 17 June). Other important speeches or statements are given in briefer form (9 and 12 June) or as interpolations, enclosed in braces { }, in the main statements (7 and 14 June). Bracketed (or sometimes parenthetical) interpolations summarizing omitted passages are from the original. It should be noted that Henry's discussions of the Mississippi negotiations and the peculiar interests of the South—for example, in regard to commercial regulations—are largely omitted here. While this great "contest for empire," as Anti-Federalist Grayson called it,[8] was an important concern of the Southern Anti-Federalists, it was subordinate to more general questions of principle and was only discussed at length, after the ground of principle had been covered.

The thread on which Henry's arguments against the Constitution are strung is the spirit of true federalism and Virginia patriotism. The Constitution, speaking the language of "We the People," destroys the confederation and, with it, Virginia (5.16.1–2, 6, 8, 9, 22–23). Although the connection is not always explicitly made, Henry's advocacy of federalism is tied to several further arguments. He contends that the Constitution represents a hankering after glory and riches rather than liberty, the true object of government and the object associated with the individual states and their federal union under the Articles of Confederation (5.16.2, 6). He denies that he favors secession or separate confederacies (5.16.11), insisting that only liberty is dearer to him than Union (5.16.6). Although Henry does not make any extensive use of the small republic argument, he indicates his acceptance of it (5.16.11). He contends that under the new Constitution the representation is grossly inadequate (5.16.2, 8, 19, 29); that, unlike the British system, there are no real checks or true responsibility (5.16.2, 7–8, 17), and that the only reliance is on the virtue of the rulers (5.16.7, 11, 17). The Constitution is not sufficiently hard-headed. "Tell me not of checks on paper; but tell me of checks founded on self-love" (5.16.14, 17).

Henry defends the system of requisitions (5.16.15–19) and sees the power to tax under the Constitution as especially dangerous, as the end of the states in any significant form, and as the source of excessive burdens on the people. Under the Constitution the people give up everything and lose all their capacity to check the government and preserve their liberty (5.16.2, 6, 7).

The advocates for the Constitution pretend external dangers and internal turbulence where none exist (5.16.1, 2–4). So far as there are dangers, Henry relies on the American spirit to preserve us (5.16.2, 12). It is not new constitutions but industry and economy that are needed to solve America's economic problems (5.16.10). Republican simplicity and the love of freedom are the rocks on which American liberty rests, and American laws must be conducive to and protective of this spirit (5.16.12–13). The absence of a bill of rights, will all its implications, indicates how far the Constitution is from the true American spirit of liberty (5.16.24–25, 34–41).

4 June 1788

Mr. Chairman.—The public mind, as well as my own, is extremely uneasy 5.16.1 at the proposed change of Government. Give me leave to form one of that number of those who wish to be thoroughly acquainted with the reasons of this perilious and uneasy situation—and why we are brought hither to decide on this great national question. I consider myself as the servant of the people of this Commonwealth, as a centinel over their rights, liberty, and happiness. I represent their feelings when I say, that they are exceedingly uneasy, being brought from the state of full security, which they enjoyed, to the present delusive appearance of things. A year ago the minds of our citizens were at perfect repose. Before the meeting of the late Federal Convention at Philadelphia, a general peace, and an universal tranquility prevailed in this country;—but since that period they are exceedingly uneasy and disquieted. When I wished for an appointment to this Convention, my mind was extremely agitated for the situation of public affairs. I conceive the republic to be in extreme danger. If our situation be thus uneasy, whence has arisen this fearful jeopardy? It arises from this fatal system—it arises from the proposal to change our government:—A proposal that goes to the utter annihilation of the most solemn engagements of the States. A proposal of establishing 9 States into a confederacy, to the eventual exclusion of 4 States. It goes to the annihilation of those solemn treaties we have formed with foreign nations. The present circumstances of France—the good offices rendered us by that kingdom, require our most faithful and most punctual adherence to our treaty with her. We are in alliance with the Spaniards, the Dutch, the Prussians: Those treaties bound us as thirteen States, confederated together—Yet, here is a proposal to sever this confederacy. Is it possible that we shall abandon all our treaties and national engagements?—And for what? I expected to have heard the reasons of an event so unexpected to my mind, and many others. Was our civil polity, or public justice, endangered or saped? Was the real existence of the country threatened—or was this preceded by a mournful progression of events? This proposal of altering our Federal Government is of a most alarming nature: Make the best of this new Government—say it is composed by any thing but inspiration—you ought to be extremely cautious, watchful, jealous of your liberty; for instead of securing your rights you may lose them forever. If a wrong step be now made, the Republic may be lost forever. If this new Government will not come up to the expectation of the people, and they should be disappointed—their liberty will be lost, and tyranny must and will arise. I repeat it again, and I beg Gentlemen to consider, that a wrong step made now will plunge us in misery, and our Republic will be lost. It will be necessary for this Convention to have a faithful historical detail of the facts, that preceded the session of the Federal Convention, and the reasons that actuated its members in proposing an entire alteration of Government—and demonstrate the dangers that awaited us: If they were of such awful magnitude, as to warrant a proposal so extremely perilous as this, I must assert, that this Convention has an absolute right to a thorough discovery of every circumstance relative to this great event. And here I would make this enquiry of those worthy characters who composed a part of the late Federal Convention. I am sure they were fully impressed with the necessity of forming a great consolidated Government, instead of a confederation. That this is a consolidated Government is demonstrably clear, and the danger of such a Government, is, to my mind, very striking. I have the highest veneration of those Gentlemen,—but, Sir, give me leave to demand, what right had they to say, We, the People. My political curiosity, exclusive of my anxious solicitude for the public welfare, leads me to ask who authorised them to speak the language of, We, the People, instead of We, the States? States are the characteristics, and the soul of a confederation.[1] If the States be not the agents of this compact, it must be one great consolidated National Government of the people of all the States. I have the highest respect for those Gentlemen who formed the Convention, and were some of them not here, I would express some testimonial of my esteem for them. America had on a former occasion put the utmost confidence in them: A confidence which was well placed: And I am sure, Sir, I would give up any thing to them; I would chearfully confide in them as my Representatives. But, Sir, on this great occasion, I would demand the cause of their conduct.—Even from that illustrious man, who saved us by his valor, I would have a reason for his conduct—that liberty which he has given us by his valor, tells me to ask this reason,—and sure I am, were he here, he would give us that reason: But there are other Gentlemen here, who can give us this information. The people gave them no power to use their name. That they exceeded their power is perfectly clear. It is not mere curiosity that actuates me—I wish to hear the real actual existing danger, which should lead us to take those steps so dangerous in my conception. Disorders have arisen in other parts of America, but here, Sir, no dangers, no insurrection or tumult, has happened—every thing has been calm and tranquil. But notwithstanding this, we are wandering on the great ocean of human affairs. I see no landmark to guide us. We are running we know not whither. Difference in opinion has gone to a degree of inflammatory resentment in different parts of the country—which has been occasioned by this perilous innovation. The Federal Convention ought to have amended the old system—for this purpose they were solely delegated: The object of their mission extended to no other consideration. You must therefore forgive the solicitation of one unworthy member, to know what danger could have arisen under the present confederation, and what are the causes of this proposal to change our Government.

Mr. Chairman—I am much obliged to the very worthy Gentleman [Henry Lee] for his encomium. I wish I was possessed of talents, or possessed of any thing, that might enable me to elucidate this great subject. I am not free from suspicion: I am apt to entertain doubts: I rose yesterday to ask a question, which arose in my own mind. When I asked the question, I 5.16.2

thought the meaning of my interrogation was obvious: The fate of this question and America may depend on this: Have they said, we the States? Have they made a proposal of a compact between States? If they had, this would be a confederation: It is otherwise most clearly a consolidated government. The question turns, Sir, on that poor little thing—the expression, We, the people, instead of the States of America. I need not take much pains to show, that the principles of this system, are extremely pernicious, impolitic, and dangerous. Is this a Monarchy, like England—a compact between Prince and people; with checks on the former, to secure the liberty of the latter? Is this a Confederacy, like Holland—an association of a number of independent States, each of which retain its individual sovereignty? It is not a democracy, wherein the people retain all their rights securely. Had these principles been adhered to, we should not have been brought to this alarming transition, from a Confederacy to a consolidated Government.[2] We have no detail of those great considerations which, in my opinion, ought to have abounded before we should recur to a government of this kind. Here is a revolution as radical as that which separated us from Great Britain. It is as radical, if in this transition our rights and privileges are endangered, and the sovereignty of the States be relinquished: And cannot we plainly see, that this is actually the case? The rights of conscience, trial by jury, liberty of the press, all your immunities and franchises, all pretensions to human rights and privileges, are rendered insecure, if not lost, by this change so loudly talked of by some, and inconsiderately by others. Is this same relinquishment of rights worthy of freemen? Is it worthy of that manly fortitude that ought to characterize republicans: It is said eight States have adopted this plan. I declare that if twelve States and an half had adopted it, I would with manly firmness, and in spite of an erring world, reject it. You are not to inquire how your trade may be increased, nor how you are to become a great and powerful people, but how your liberties can be secured; for liberty ought to be the direct end of your Government.[3] Having premised these things, I shall, with the aid of my judgment and information, which I confess are not extensive, go into the discussion of this system more minutely. Is it necessary for your liberty, that you should abandon those great rights by the adoption of this system? Is the relinquishment of the trial by jury, and the liberty of the press, necessary for your liberty? Will the abandonment of your most sacred rights tend to the security of your liberty? Liberty the greatest of all earthly blessings—give us that precious jewel, and you may take every thing else: But I am fearful I have lived long enough to become an old fashioned fellow: Perhaps an invincible attachment to the dearest rights of man, may, in these refined enlightened days, be deemed old fashioned: If so, I am contended to be so: I say, the time has been, when every pore of my heart beat for American liberty, and which, I believe, had a counterpart in the breast of every true American: But suspicions have gone forth—suspicions of my integrity—publicly reported that my professions are not real—23 years ago was I supposed a traitor to my country; I was then said to be a bane of sedition, because I supported the rights of my country: I may be thought suspicious when I say our privileges and rights are in danger: But, Sir, a number of the people of this country are weak enough to think these things are too true: I am happy to find that the Honorable Gentleman on the other side, declares they are groundless: But, Sir, suspicion is a virtue, as long as its object is the preservation of the public good, and as long as it stays within proper bounds: Should it fall on me, I am contented: Conscious rectitude is a powerful consolation: I trust, there are many who think my professions for the public good to be real. Let your suspicion look to both sides: There are many on the other side, who, possibly may have been persuaded of the necessity of these measures, which I conceive to be dangerous to your liberty. Guard with jealous attention the public liberty. Suspect every one who approaches that jewel. Unfortunately, nothing will preserve it, but downright force: Whenever you give up that force, you are inevitably ruined. I am answered by Gentlemen, that though I might speak of terrors, yet the fact was, that we were surrounded by none of the dangers I apprehended. I conceive this new Government to be one of those dangers: It has produced those horrors, which distress many of our best citizens. We are come hither to preserve the poor Commonwealth of Virginia, if it can be possibly done: Something must be done to preserve your liberty and mine: The Confederation; this same despised Government, merits, in my opinion, the highest encomium: It carried us through a long and dangerous war: It rendered us victorious in that bloody conflict with a powerful nation: It has secured us a territory greater than any European Monarch possesses: And shall a Government which has been thus strong and vigorous, be accused of imbecility and abandoned for want of energy?[4] Consider what you are about to do before you part with this Government. Take longer time in reckoning things: Revolutions like this have happened in almost every country in Europe: Similar examples are to be found in ancient Greece and ancient Rome: Instances of the people loosing their liberty by their own carelessness and the ambition of a few. We are cautioned by the Honorable Gentleman who presides, against faction and turbulence: I acknowledge that licentiousness is dangerous, and that it ought to be provided against: I acknowledge also the new form of Government may effectually prevent it: Yet, there is another thing it will as effectually do: it will oppress and ruin the people. There are sufficient guards placed against sedition and licentiousness: For when power is given to this Government to suppress these, or, for any other purpose, the language it assumes is clear, express, and unequivocal, but when this Constitution speaks of privileges, there is an ambiguity, Sir, a fatal ambiguity;—an ambiguity which is very astonishing: In the clause under consideration, there is the strangest that I can conceive. I mean, when it says, that there shall not be more Representatives, than one for every 30,000. Now, Sir, how easy is it to evade this privilege? "The number shall not exceed one for every 30,000." This may be satisfied by one Representative from each State. Let our numbers be ever so great, this immence continent, may, by this artful expression, be reduced to have but 13 Representatives: I confess this construction is not natural; but the ambiguity of the expression lays a good ground for a quarrel. Why was it not clearly and unequivocally expressed, that they should be entitled, to have one for every 30,000? This would have obviated all disputes; and was this difficult to be done? What is the inference? When population increases, and a State shall send Representatives in this proportion, Congress may remand them, because the right of having one for every 30,000 is not clearly expressed: This possibility of reducing the number to one for each State, approximates to probability by that other expression, "but each State shall at least have one Representative." Now is it not clear that from the first expression, the number might be reduced so much, that some States should have no Representative at all, were it not for the insertion of this last expression? And as this is the only restriction upon them, we may fairly conclude that they may restrain the number to one from each State: Perhaps the same horrors may hang over my mind again. I shall be told I am continually afraid: But, Sir, I have strong cause of apprehension: In some parts of the plan before you, the great rights of freemen are endangered, in other parts absolutely taken away. How does your trial by jury stand? In civil cases gone—not sufficiently secured in criminal—this best privilege is gone: But we are told that we need not fear, because those in power being our Representatives, will not abuse the powers we put in their hands: I am not well versed in history, but I will submit to your recollection, whether liberty has been destroyed most often by the licentiousness of the people, or by the tyranny of rulers? I amagine, Sir, you will find the balance on the side of tyranny:[5] Happy will you be if you miss the fate of those nations, who, omitting to resist their oppressors, or negligently suffering their liberty to be wrested from them, have groaned under intolerable despotism. Most of the human race are now in this deplorable condition: And those nations who have gone in search of grandeur, power and splendor, have also fallen a sacrifice, and been the victims of their own folly: While they acquired those visionary blessings, they lost their freedom. My great objection to this Government is, that it does not leave us the means of defending our rights; or, of waging war against tyrants: It is urged by some Gentlemen, that this new plan will bring us an acquisition of strength, an army, and the militia of the States: This is an idea extremely ridiculous: Gentlemen cannot be in earnest. This acquisition will trample on your fallen liberty: Let my beloved Americans guard against that fatal lethargy that has pervaded the universe: Have we the means of resisting disciplined armies, when our only defence, the militia is put into the hands of Congress? The Honorable Gentleman said, that great danger would ensue if the Convention rose without adopting this system: I ask, where is that danger? I see none:

Other Gentlemen have told us within these walls, that the Union is gone—or, that the Union will be gone: Is not this trifling with the judgment of their fellow-citizens? Till they tell us the ground of their fears, I will consider them as imaginary: I rose to make enquiry where those dangers were; they could make no answer: I believe I never shall have that answer: Is there a disposition in the people of this country to revolt against the dominion of laws? Has there been a single tumult in Virginia? Have not the people of Virginia, when labouring under the severest pressure of accumulated distresses, manifested the most cordial acquiescence in the execution of the laws? What could be more awful than their unamious acquiescence under general distresses? Is there any revolution in Virginia? Whither is the spirit of America gone? Whither is the genius of America fled? It was but yesterday, when our enemies marched in triumph through our country: Yet the people of this country could not be appalled by their pompous armaments: They stopped their career, and victoriously captured them: Where is the peril now compared to that? Some minds are agitated by foreign alarms: Happily for us, there is no real danger from Europe: that country is engaged in more arduous business; from that quarter there is no cause of fear: You may sleep in safety forever for them. Where is the danger? If, Sir, there was any, I would recur to the American spirit to defend us;—that spirit which has enabled us to surmount the greatest difficulties:[6] To that illustrious spirit I address my most fervent prayer, to prevent our adopting a system destructive to liberty. Let not Gentlemen be told, that it is not safe to reject this Government. Wherefore is it not safe? We are told there are dangers; but those dangers are ideal; they cannot be demonstrated: To encourage us to adopt it, they tell us, that there is a plain easy way of getting amendments: When I come to contemplate this part, I suppose that I am mad, or, that my countrymen are so: The way to amendment, is, in my conception, shut. Let us consider this plain easy way: "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress. Provided, that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808, shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." Hence it appears that three-fourths of the States must ultimately agree to any amendments that may be necessary. Let us consider the consequences of this: However uncharitable it may appear, yet I must tell my opinion, that the most unworthy characters may get into power and prevent the introduction of amendments: Let us suppose (for the case is supposeable, possible, and probable) that you happen to deal these powers to unworthy hands; will they relinquish powers already in their possession, or, agree to amendments? Two-thirds of the Congress, or, of the State Legislatures, are necessary even to propose amendments: If one-third of these be unworthy men, they may prevent the application for amendments; but what is destructive and mischievous is, that three-fourths of the State Legislatures, or of State Conventions, must concur in the amendments when proposed: In such numerous bodies, there must necessarily be some designing bad men: To suppose that so large a number as three-fourths of the States will concur, is to suppose that they will possess genius, intelligence, and integrity, approaching to miraculous. It would indeed be miraculous that they should concur in the same amendments, or, even in such as would bear some likeness to one another. For four of the smallest States, that do not collectively contain one-tenth part of the population of the United States, may obstruct the most salutary and necessary amendments: Nay, in these four States, six tenths of the people may reject these amendments; and suppose, that amendments shall be opposed to amendments (which is highly probable) is it possible, that three-fourths can ever agree to the same amendments? A bare majority in these four small States may hinder the adoption of amendments; so that we may fairly and justly conclude, that one-twentieth part of the American people, may prevent the removal of the most grievous inconveniences and oppression, by refusing to accede to amendments. A trifling minority may reject the most salutary amendments. Is this an easy mode of securing the public liberty? It is, Sir, a most fearful situation, when the most contemptible minority can prevent the alteration of the most oppressive Government; for it may in many respects prove to be such: Is this the spirit of republicanism? What, Sir, is the genius of democracy? Let me read that clause of the Bill of Rights of Virginia, which relates to this: 3d cl. "That Government is or ought to be instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security of the people, nation, or community: Of all the various modes and forms of Government, that is best which is capable of producing the greatest degree of happiness and safety, and is most effectually secured against the danger of mal-administration, and that whenever any Government shall be found inadequate, or contrary to these purposes, a majority of the community hath, an undubitable, unalienable and indefeasible right to reform, alter, or abolish it, in such manner as shall be judged most conducive to the public weal."[7] This, Sir, is the language of democracy; that a majority of the community have a right to alter their Government when found to be oppressive: But how different is the genius of your new Constitution from this? How different from the sentiments of freemen, that a contemptible minority can prevent the good of the majority? If then Gentlemen standing on this ground, are come to that point, that they are willing to bind themselves and their posterity to be oppressed, I am amazed and inexpressibly astonished. If this be the opinion of the majority, I must submit; but to me, Sir, it appears perilous and destructive: I cannot help thinking so: Perhaps it may be the result of my age; these may be feelings natural to a man of my years, when the American spirit has left him, and his mental powers, like the members of the body, are decayed. If, Sir, amendments are left to the twentieth or the tenth part of the people of America, your liberty is gone forever. We have heard that there is a great deal of bribery practiced in the House of Commons in England; and that many of the members raised themselves to preferments, by selling the rights of the people: But, Sir, the tenth part of that body cannot continue oppressions on the rest of the people. English liberty is in this case, on a firmer foundation than American liberty. It will be easily contrived to procure the opposition of one tenth of the people to any alteration, however judicious. The Honorable Gentleman who presides, told us, that to prevent abuses in our Government, we will assemble in Convention, recall our delegated powers, and punish our servants for abusing the trust reposed in them.[8] Oh, Sir, we should have fine times indeed, if to punish tyrants, it were only sufficient to assemble the people. Your arms wherewith you could defend yourselves, are gone; and have no longer a aristocratical; no longer democratical spirit. Did you ever read of any revolution in any nation, brought about by the punishment of those in power, inflicted by those who had no power at all? You read of a riot act in a country which is called one of the freest in the world, where a few neighbours cannot assemble without the risk of being shot by a hired soldiery, the engines of despotism. We may see such an act in America. A standing army we shall have also, to execute the execrable commands of tyranny: And how are you to punish them? Will you order them to be punished? Who shall obey these orders? Will your Mace-bearer be a match for a disciplined regiment? In what situation are we to be? The clause before you gives a power of direct taxation, unbounded and unlimitted: Exclusive power of Legislation in all cases whatsoever, for ten miles square; and over all places purchased for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, &c. What resistance could be made? The attempt would be madness. You will find all the strength of this country in the hands of your enemies: Those garrisons will naturally be the strongest places in the country. Your militia is given up to Congress also in another part of this plan: They will therefore act as they think proper: All power will be in their own possession: You cannot force them to receive their punishment: Of what service would militia be to you, when most probably you will not have a single musket in the State; for as arms are to be provided by Congress, they may or may not furnish them. Let me here call your attention to that part which gives the Congress power, "To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." By this, Sir, you see that their controul over our last and best defence, is unlimitted. If they neglect or refuse to discipline or arm our militia, they will be useless: The States can do neither, this power being exclusively given to Congress: The power of appointing officers over men not disciplined or armed, is ridiculous: So that this pretended little remains of power left to the States, may, at the pleasure of Congress, be rendered nugatory. Our situation will be deplorable indeed: Nor can we ever expect to get this government amended, since I have already shewn, that a very small minority may prevent it; and that small minority interested in the continuance of the oppression: Will the oppressor let go the oppressed? Was there ever an instance? Can the annals of mankind exhibit one single example, where rulers overcharged with power, willingly let go the oppressed, though solicited and requested most earnestly? The application for amendments will therefore be fruitless. Sometimes the oppressed have got loose by one of those bloody struggles that desolate a country. A willing relinquishment of power is one of those things which human nature never was, nor ever will be capable of: The Honorable Gentleman's observations respecting the people's right of being the agents in the formation of this Government, are not accurate in my humble conception.[9] The distinction between a National Government and a Confederacy is not sufficiently discerned. Had the delegates who were sent to Philadelphia a power to propose a Consolidated Government instead of a Confederacy? Were they not deputed by States, and not by the people? The assent of the people in their collective capacity is not necessary to the formation of a Federal Government. The people have no right to enter into leagues, alliances, or confederations: They are not the proper agents for this purpose: States and sovereign powers are the only proper agents for this kind of Government: Shew me an instance where the people have exercised this business: Has it not always gone through the Legislatures? I refer you to the treaties with France, Holland, and other nations: How were they made? Were they not made by the States? Are the people therefore in their aggregate capacity, the proper persons to form a Confederacy? This, therefore, ought to depend on the consent of the Legislatures; the people having never sent delegates to make any proposition of changing the Government. Yet I must say, at the same time, that it was made on grounds the most pure, and perhaps I might have been brought to consent to it so far as to the change of Government; but there is one thing in it which I never would acquiesce in. I mean the changing it into a Consolidated Government; which is so abhorent to my mind. The Honorable Gentleman then went on to the figure we make with foreign nations; the contemptible one we make in France and Holland; which, according to the system of my notes, he attributes to the present feeble Government.[10] An opinion has gone forth, we find, that we are a contemptible people: The time has been when we were thought otherwise: Under this same despised Government, we commanded the respect of all Europe: Wherefore are we now reckoned otherwise? The American spirit has fled from hence: It has gone to regions, where it has never been expected: It has gone to the people of France in search of a splendid Government—a strong energetic Government. Shall we imitate the example of those nations who have gone from a simple to a splendid Government. Are those nations more worthy of our imitation? What can make an adequate satisfaction to them for the loss they suffered in attaining such a Government for the loss of their liberty? If we admit this Consolidated Government it will be because we like a great splendid one. Some way or other we must be a great and mighty empire; we must have an army, and a navy, and a number of things: When the American spirit was in its youth, the language of America was different: Liberty, Sir, was then the primary object. We are descended from a people whose Government was founded on liberty: Our glorious forefathers of Great-Britain, made liberty the foundation of every thing. That country is become a great, mighty, and splendid nation; not because their Government is strong and energetic; but, Sir, because liberty is its direct end and foundation: We drew the spirit of liberty from our British ancestors; by that spirit we have triumphed over every difficulty: But now, Sir, the American spirit, assisted by the ropes and chains of consolidation, is about to convert this country to a powerful and mighty empire: If you make the citizens of this country agree to become the subjects of one great consolidated empire of America, your Government will not have sufficent energy to keep them together: Such a Government is incompatible with the genius of republicanism: There will be no checks, no real balances, in this Government: What can avail your specious imaginary balances, your rope-dancing, chain-rattling, ridiculous ideal checks and contrivances? But, Sir, we are not feared by foreigners: we do not make nations tremble: Would this, Sir, constitute happiness, or secure liberty?[11] I trust, Sir, our political hemisphere will ever direct their operations to the security of those objects. Consider our situation, Sir: Go to the poor man, ask him what he does; he will inform you, that he enjoys the fruits of his labour, under his own fig-tree, with his wife and children around him, in peace and security. Go to every other member of the society, you will find the same tranquil ease and content; you will find no alarms or disturbances: Why then tell us of dangers to terrify us into an adoption of this new Government? and yet who knows the dangers that this new system may produce; they are out of the sight of the common people: They cannot foresee latent consequences: I dread the operation of it on the middling and lower class of people: It is for them I fear the adoption of this system. I fear I tire the patience of the Committee, but I beg to be indulged with a few more observations: When I thus profess myself an advocate for the liberty of the people, I shall be told, I am a designing man, that I am to be a great man, that I am to be a demagogue; and many similar illiberal insinuations will be thrown out; but, Sir, conscious rectitude, out-weighs these things with me: I see great jeopardy in this new Government. I see none from our present one: I hope some Gentleman or other will bring forth, in full array, those dangers, if there be any, that we may see and touch them.

5.16.3 {[7 June] I have thought, and still think, that a full investigation of the actual situation of America, ought to precede any decision on this great and important question. That Government is no more than a choice among evils, is acknowledged by the most intelligent among mankind, and has been a standing maxim for ages. If it be demonstrated that the adoption of the new plan is a little or a trifling evil, then, Sir, I acknowledge that adoption ought to follow: But, Sir, if this be a truth that its adoption may entail misery on the free people of this country, I then insist, that rejection ought to follow. Gentlemen strongly urge its adoption will be a mighty benefit to us: But, Sir, I am made of such incredulous materials that assertions and declarations, do not satisfy me. I must be convinced, Sir. I shall retain my infidelity on that subject, till I see our liberties secured in a manner perfectly satisfactory to my understanding. . . .

5.16.4 { . . . You are told [by Governor Randolph] there is no peace,[12] although you fondly flatter yourselves that all is peace—No peace—a general cry and alarm in the country—Commerce, riches, and wealth vanished—Citizens going to seek comforts in other parts of the world—Laws insulted—Many instances of tyrannical legislation. These things, Sir, are new to me. He has made the discovery—As to the administration of justice, I believe that failures in commerce, &c. cannot be attributed to it. My age enables me to recollect its progress under the old Government. I can justify it by saying, that it continues in the same manner in this State, as it did under former Government. As to other parts of the Continent, I refer that to other Gentlemen. As to the ability of those who administer it, I believe they would not suffer by a comparison with those who administered it under the royal authority. Where is the cause of complaint if the wealthy go away? Is this added to the other circumstances, of such enormity, and does it bring such danger over this Commonwealth as to warrant so important, and so awful a change in so precipitate a manner? As to insults offered to the laws, I know of none. In this respect I believe this Commonwealth would not suffer by a comparison with the former Government. The laws are as well executed, and as patiently acquiesced in, as they were under the royal administration. Compare the situation of the country—Compare that of our citizens to what they were then, and decide whether persons and property are not as safe and secure as they were at that time. Is there a man in this Commonwealth, whose person can be insulted with impunity? Cannot redress be had here for personal insults or injuries, as well as in any part of the world—as well as in those countries where Aristocrats and Monarchs triumph and reign? Is not the protection of property in full operation here? The contrary cannot with truth be charged on this Commonwealth. Those severe charges which are exhibited against it, appear to me totally groundless. On a fair investigation, we shall be found to be surrounded by no real dangers. We have the animating fortitude and persevering alacrity of republican men, to carry us through misfortunes and calamities. 'Tis the fortune of a republic to be able to withstand the stormy ocean of human vicissitudes. I know of no danger awaiting us. Public and private security are to be found here in the highest degree. Sir, it is the fortune of a free people, not to be intimidated by imaginary dangers. Fear is the passion of slaves. Our political and natural hemisphere are now equally tranquil. Let us recollect the awful magnitude of the subject of our deliberation. Let us consider the latent consequences of an erroneous decision—and let not our minds be led away by unfair misrepresentations and uncandid suggestions. There have been many instances of uncommon lenity and temperance used in the exercise of power in this Commonwealth. I could call your recollection to many that happened during the war and since—But every Gentleman here must be apprized of them.

{The Honorable member has given you an elaborate account of what he judges tyrannical legislation, and an ex post facto law (in the case of Josiah Philips.)[13] He has misrepresented the facts. That man was not executed by a tyrannical stroke of power. He was a fugitive murderer and an out-law—a man who commanded an infamous banditti, at a time when the war was at the most perilous stage. He committed the most cruel and shocking barbarities. He was an enemy to the human name.—Those who declare war against the human race, may be struck out of existence as soon as they are apprehended. He was not executed according to those beautiful legal ceremonies which are pointed out by the laws, in criminal cases. The enormity of his crimes did not entitle him to it. I am truly a friend to legal forms and methods; but, Sir, the occasion warranted the measure. A pirate, an outlaw, or a common enemy to all mankind, may be put to death at any time. It is justified by the laws of nature and nations. The Honorable member tells us then, that there are burnings and discontents in the hearts of our citizens in general, and that they are dissatisfied with their Government.[14] I have no doubt the Honorable member believes this to be the case, because he says so. But I have the comfortable assurance, that it is a certain fact, that it is not so. The middle and lower ranks of people have not those illumined ideas, which the well-born are so happily possessed of—They cannot so readily perceive latent objects. The microscopic eyes of modern States-men can see abundance of defects in old systems; and their illumined imaginations discover the necessity of change.} 5.16.5

. . . I have said that I thought this a Consolidated Government: I will now prove it. Will the great rights of the people be secured by this Government? Suppose it should prove oppressive, how can it be altered? Our Bill of Rights declares, "That a majority of the community hath an undubitable, unalienable, and indefeasible right to reform, alter, or abolish it, in such manner as shall be judged most conducive to the public weal."[15] I have just proved that one tenth, or less, of the people of America, a most despicable 5.16.6

minority may prevent this reform or alteration. Suppose the people of Virginia should wish to alter their Government, can a majority of them do it? No, because they are connected with other men; or, in other words, consolidated with other States: When the people of Virginia at a future day shall wish to alter their Government, though they should be unanimous in this desire, yet they may be prevented therefrom by a despicable minority at the extremity of the United States: The founders of your own Constitution made your Government changeable: But the power of changing it is gone from you! Whither is it gone? It is placed in the same hands that hold the rights of twelve other States; and those who hold those rights, have right and power to keep them: It is not the particular Government of Virginia: One of the leading features of that Government is, that a majority can alter it, when necessary for the public good. This Government is not a Virginian but an American Government. Is it not therefore a Consolidated Government? The sixth clause of your Bill of Rights tells you, "That elections of members to serve as Representatives of the people in Assembly, ought to be free, and that all men having sufficient evidence of permanent common interest with, and attachment to the community, have the right of suffrage, and cannot be taxed or deprived of their property for public uses, without their own consent, or that of their Representatives so elected, nor bound by any law to which they have not in like manner assented for the public good."[16] But what does this Constitution say? The clause under consideration gives an unlimitted and unbounded power of taxation: Suppose every delegate from Virginia opposes a law laying a tax, what will it avail? They are opposed by a majority: Eleven members can destroy their efforts: Those feeble ten cannot prevent the passing the most oppressive tax law. So that in direct opposition to the spirit and express language of your Declaration of Rights, you are taxed not by your own consent, but by people who have no connection with you. The next clause of the Bill of Rights tells you, "That all power of suspending law, or the execution of laws, by any authority without the consent of the Representatives of the people, is injurious to their rights, and ought not to be exercised."[17] This tells us that there can be no suspension of Government, or laws without our own consent: Yet this Constitution can counteract and suspend any of our laws, that contravene its oppressive operation; for they have the power of direct taxation; which suspends our Bill of Rights; and it is expressly provided, that they can make all laws necessary for carrying their powers into execution; and it is declared paramount to the laws and constitutions of the States. Consider how the only remaining defence we have left is destroyed in this manner: Besides the expences of maintaining the Senate and other House in as much splendor as they please, there is to be a great and mighty President, with very extensive powers; the powers of a King: He is to be supported in extravagant magnificence: So that the whole of our property may be taken by this American Government, by laying what taxes they please, giving themselves what salaries they please, and suspending our laws at their pleasure: I might be thought too inquisitive, but I believe I should take up but very little of your time in enumerating the little power that is left to the Government of Virginia; for this power is reduced to little or nothing: Their garrisons, magazines, arsenals, and forts, which will be situated in the strongest places within the States: Their ten miles square, with all the fine ornaments of human life, added to their powers, and taken from the States, will reduce the power of the latter to nothing. The voice of tradition, I trust, will inform posterity of our struggles for freedom: If our descendants be worthy the name of Americans, they will preserve and hand down to their latest posterity, the transactions of the present times; and though, I confess, my exclamations are not worthy the hearing, they will see that I have done my utmost to preserve their liberty: For I never will give up the power of direct taxation, but for a scourge: I am willing to give it conditionally; that is, after non-compliance with requisitions: I will do more, Sir, and what I hope will convince the most sceptical man, that I am a lover of the American Union, that in case Virginia shall not make punctual payment, the controul of our custom houses, and the whole regulation of trade, shall be given to Congress, and that Virginia shall depend on Congress even for passports, till Virginia shall have paid the last farthing; and furnished the last soldier: Nay, Sir, there is another alternative to which I would consent: Even that they should strike us out of the Union, and take away from us all federal privileges till we comply with federal requisitions; but let it depend upon our own pleasure to pay our money in the most easy manner for our people. Were all the States, more terrible than the mother country, to join against us, I hope Virginia could defend herself; but, Sir, the dissolution of the Union is most abhorent to my mind: The first thing I have at heart is American liberty; the second thing is American Union;[18] and I hope the people of Virginia will endeavor to preserve that Union: The increasing population of the southern States, is far greater than that of New-England: Consequently, in a short time, they will be far more numerous than the people of that country: Consider this, and you will find this State more particularly interested to support American liberty, and not bind our posterity by an improvident relinquishment of our rights. I would give the best security for a punctual compliance with requisitions; but I beseech Gentlemen, at all hazards, not to give up this unlimitted power of taxation: The Honorable Gentleman has told us these powers given to Congress, are accompanied by a Judiciary which will connect all:[19] On examination you will find this very Judiciary oppressively constructed; your jury trial destroyed, and the Judges dependent on Congress. In this scheme of energetic Government, the people will find two sets of tax-gatherers—the State and the Federal Sheriffs. This it seems to me will produce such dreadful oppression, as the people cannot possibly bear: The Federal Sheriff may commit what oppression, make what distresses he pleases, and ruin you with impunity: For how are you to tie his hands? Have you any sufficient decided means of preventing him from sucking your blood by speculations, commissions and fees? Thus thousands of your people will be most shamefully robbed: Our State Sheriffs, those unfeeling blood-suckers, have, under the watchful eye of our Legislature, committed the most horrid and barbarous ravages on our people: It has required the most constant vigilance of the Legislature to keep them from totally ruining the people: A repeated succession of laws has been made to suppress their inequitous speculations and cruel extortions; and as often have their nefarious ingenuity devised methods of evading the force of those laws: In the struggle they have generally triumphed over the Legislature. It is fact that lands have sold for five shillings, which were worth one hundred pounds: If Sheriffs thus immediately under the eye of our State Legislature and Judiciary, have dared to commit these outrages, what would they not have done if their masters had been at Philadelphia or New-York? If they perpetrate the most unwarrantable outrage on your persons or property, you cannot get redress on this side of Philadelphia or New-York: And how can you get it there? If your domestic avocations could permit you to go thither, there you must appeal to Judges sworn to support this Constitution, in opposition to that of any State, and who may also be inclined to favor their own officers: When these harpies are aided by excise men, who may search at any time your houses and most secret recesses, will the people bear it? If you think so you differ from me: Where I thought there was a possibility of such mischiefs, I would grant power with a niggardly hand; and here there is strong probability that these oppressions shall actually happen. I may be told, that it is safe to err on that side; because such regulations may be made by Congress, as shall restrain these officers, and because laws are made by our Representatives, and judged by righteous Judges: But, Sir, as these regulations may be made, so they may not; and many reasons there are to induce a belief that they will not: I shall therefore be an infidel on that point till the day of my death.

5.16.7 This Constitution is said to have beautiful features; but when I come to examine these features, Sir, they appear to me horridly frightful: Among other deformities, it has an awful squinting; it squints towards monarchy: And does not this raise indignation in the breast of every American? Your President may easily become King: Your Senate is so imperfectly constructed that your dearest rights may be sacrificed by what may be a small minority; and a very small minority may continue forever unchangeably this Government, although horridly defective: Where are your checks in this Government? Your strong holds will be in the hands of your enemies: It is on a supposition that our American Governors shall be honest, that all the good qualities of this Government are founded: But its defective, and imperfect construction, puts it in their power to perpetrate the worst of mischiefs, should they be bad men: And, Sir, would not all the world, from the Eastern to the Western hemisphere, blame our distracted folly in resting our rights upon the contingency of our rulers being good or bad. Shew me that age and country where the rights and liberties of the people were placed on the sole chance of their rulers being good men, without a consequent loss of liberty? I say that the loss of that dearest privilege has ever followed with absolute certainty, every such mad attempt. If your American chief, be a man of ambition, and abilities, how easy is it for him to render himself absolute: The army is in his hands, and, if he be a man of address, it will be attached to him; and it will be the subject of long meditation with him to seize the first auspicious moment to accomplish his design; and, Sir, will the American spirit solely relieve you when this happens? I would rather infinitely, and I am sure most of this Convention are of the same opinion, have a King, Lords, and Commons, than a Government so replete with such insupportable evils. If we make a King, we may prescribe the rules by which he shall rule his people, and interpose such checks as shall prevent him from infringing them: But the President, in the field, at the head of his army, can prescribe the terms on which he shall reign master, so far that it will puzzle any American ever to get his neck from under the galling yoke. I cannot with patience, think of this idea. If ever he violates the laws, one of two things will happen: He shall come to the head of his army to carry every thing before him; or, he will give bail, or do what Mr. Chief Justice will order him. If he be guilty, will not the recollection of his crimes teach him to make one bold push for the American throne? Will not the immense difference between being master of every thing, and being ignominiously tried and punished, powerfully excite him to make this bold push? But, Sir, where is the existing force to punish him? Can he not at the head of his army beat down every opposition? Away with your President, we shall have a King: The army will salute him Monarch; your militia will leave you and assist in making him King, and fight against you: And what have you to oppose this force? What will then become of you and your rights? Will not absolute despotism ensue? [Here Mr. Henry strongly and pathetically expatiated on the probability of the President's enslaving America and the horrible consequences that must result.]

What[20] can be more defective than the clause concerning the elections?—The controul given to Congress over the time, place, and manner of holding elections, will totally destroy the end of suffrage. The elections may be held at one place, and the most inconvenient in the State; or they may be at remote distances from those who have a right of suffrage: Hence nine out of ten must either not vote at all, or vote for strangers: For the most influential characters will be applied to, to know who are the most proper to be chosen. I repeat that the controul of Congress over the manner, &c. of electing, well warrants this idea. The natural consequence will be, that this democratic branch, will possess none of the public confidence: The people will be prejudiced against Representatives chosen in such an injudicious manner. The proceedings in the northern conclave will be hidden from 5.16.8

the yeomanry of this country: We are told that the yeas and nays shall be taken and entered on the journals: This, Sir, will avail nothing: It may be locked up in their chests, and concealed forever from the people; for they are not to publish what parts they think require secrecy: They may think, and will think, the whole requires it. Another beautiful feature of this Constitution is the publication from time to time of the receipts and expenditures of the public money. This expression, from time to time, is very indefinite and indeterminate: It may extend to a century. Grant that any of them are wicked, they may squander the public money so as to ruin you, and yet this expression will give you no redress. I say, they may ruin you;—for where, Sir, is the responsibility? The yeas and nays will shew you nothing, unless they be fools as well as knaves: For after having wickedly trampled on the rights of the people, they would act like fools indeed, were they to publish and devulge their iniquity, when they have it equally in their power to suppress and conceal it.—Where is the responsibility—that leading principle in the British government? In that government a punishment, certain and inevitable, is provided: But in this, there is no real actual punishment for the grossest maladministration. They may go without punishment, though they commit the most outrageous violation on our immunities. That paper may tell me they will be punished. I ask, by what law? They must make the law—for there is no existing law to do it. What—will they make a law to punish themselves? This, Sir, is my great objection to the Constitution, that there is no true responsibility—and that the preservation of our liberty depends on the single chance of men being virtuous enough to make laws to punish themselves.[21] In the country from which we are descended, they have real, and not imaginary, responsibility—for there, maladministration has cost their heads, to some of the most saucy geniuses that ever were. The Senate, by making treaties may destroy your liberty and laws for want of responsibility. Two-thirds of those that shall happen to be present, can, with the President, make treaties, that shall be the supreme law of the land: They may make the most ruinous treaties; and yet there is no punishment for them. Whoever shews me a punishment provided for them, will oblige me. So, Sir, notwithstanding there are eight pillars, they want another. Where will they make another? I trust, Sir, the exclusion of the evils wherewith this system is replete, in its present form, will be made a condition, precedent to its adoption, by this or any other State. The transition from a general unqualified admission to offices, to a consolidation of government, seems easy; for though the American States are dissimilar in their structure, this will assimilate them: This, Sir, is itself a strong consolidating feature, and is not one of the least dangerous in that system. Nine States are sufficient to establish this government over those nine: Imagine that nine have come into it. Virginia has certain scruples. Suppose she will consequently, refuse to join with those States:—May not they still continue in friendship and union with her? If she sends her annual requisitions in dollars, do you think their stomachs will be so squeamish that they will refuse her dollars? Will they not accept her regiments? They would intimidate you into an inconsiderate adoption, and frighten you with ideal evils, and that the Union shall be dissolved. 'Tis a bugbear, Sir:—The fact is, Sir, that the eight adopting States can hardly stand on their own legs. Public fame tells us, that the adopting States have already heart-burnings and animosity, and repent their precipitate hurry: This, Sir, may occasion exceeding great mischief. When I reflect on these and many other circumstances, I must think those States will be fond to be in confederacy with us. If we pay our quota of money annually, and furnish our rateable number of men, when necessary, I can see no danger from a rejection. The history of Switzerland clearly proves, we might be in amicable alliance with those States without adopting this Constitution. Switzerland is a Confederacy, consisting of dissimilar Governments. This is an example which proves that Governments of dissimilar structure may be Confederated; that Confederate Republic has stood upwards of 400 years; and although several of the individual republics are democratic, and the rest aristocratic, no evil has resulted from this dissimilarity, for they have braved all the power of France and Germany during that long period. The Swiss spirit, Sir, has kept them together: They have encountered and overcome immense difficulties with patience and fortitude. In this vicinity of powerful and ambitious monarchs, they have retained their independence, republican simplicity and valour. [Here he makes a comparison of the people of that country, and those of France, and makes a quotation from Addison, illustrating the subject.] Look at the peasants of that country and of France, and mark the difference. You will find the condition of the former far more desirable and comfortable. No matter whether a people be great, splendid, and powerful, if they enjoy freedom. The Turkish Grand Seignior, along-side of our President, would put us to disgrace: But we should be abundantly consoled for this disgrace, when our citizen should be put in contrast with the Turkish slave. The most valuable end of government, is the liberty of the inhabitants. No possible advantages can compensate for the loss of this privilege. Shew me the reason why the American Union is to be dissolved. Who are those eight adopting States? Are they averse to give us a little time to consider, before we conclude? Would such a disposition render a junction with them eligible; or is it the genius of that kind of government, to precipitate people hastily into measures of the utmost importance, and grant no indulgence? If it be, Sir, is it for us to accede to such a government? We have a right to have time to consider—We shall therefore insist upon it. Unless the government be amended, we can never accept it. The adopting States will doubtless accept our money and our regiments—And what is to be the consequence, if we are disunited? I believe that it is yet doubtful, whether it is not proper to stand by a while, and see the effect of its adoption in other States. In forming a government, the utmost care should be taken to prevent its becoming oppressive; and this government is of such an intricate and complicated nature, that no man on this earth can know its real operation. The other States have no reason to think, from the antecedent conduct of Virginia, that she has any intention of seceding from the Union, or of being less active to support the general welfare: Would they not therefore acquiesce in our taking time to deliberate? Deliberate whether the measure be not perilous, not only for us, but the adopting States. Permit me, Sir, to say, that a great majority of the people even in the adopting States, are averse to this government. I believe I would be right to say, that they have been egregiously misled. Pennsylvania has perhaps been tricked into it. If the other States who have adopted it, have not been tricked, still they were too much hurried into its adoption. There were very respectable minorities in several of them; and if reports be true, a clear majority of the people are averse to it. If we also accede, and it should prove grievous, the peace and prosperity of our country, which we all love, will be destroyed. This government has not the affection of the people, at present. Should it be oppressive, their affection will be totally estranged from it—and, Sir, you know that a Government without their affections can neither be durable nor happy. I speak as one poor individual—but when I speak, I speak the language of thousands. But, Sir, I mean not to breath the spirit nor utter the language of secession. I have trespassed so long on your patience, I am really concerned that I have something yet to say. The honorable member has said that we shall be properly represented: Remember, Sir, that the number of our Representatives is but ten, whereof six is a majority. Will these men be possessed of sufficient information? A particular knowledge of particular districts will not suffice. They must be well acquainted with agriculture, commerce, and a great variety of other matters throughout the Continent: They must know not only the actual state of nations in Europe, and America, the situation of their farmers, cottagers, and mechanics, but also the relative situation and intercourse of those nations. Virginia is as large as England. Our proportion of Representatives is but ten men. In England they have 530. The House of Commons in England, numerous as they are, we are told, is bribed, and have bartered away the rights of their constituents: What then shall become of us? Will these few protect our rights? Will they be incorruptible? You say they will be better men than the English Commoners. I say they will be infinitely worse men, because they are to be chosen blindfolded: Their election (the term, as applied to their appointment, is inaccurate) will be an involuntary nomination, and not a choice. I have, I fear, fatigued the Committee, yet I have not said the one hundred thousandeth part of what I have on my mind, and wish to impart. On this occasion I conceived myself bound to attend strictly to the interest of the State; and I thought her dearest rights at stake: Having lived so long—been so much honored—my efforts, though small, are due to my country. I have found my mind hurried on from subject to subject, on this very great occasion. We have been all out of order from the Gentleman who opened to-day, to myself. I did not come prepared to speak on so multifarious a subject, in so general a manner. I trust you will indulge me another time.—Before you abandon the present system, I hope you will consider not only its defects, most maturely, but likewise those of that which you are to substitute to it. May you be fully apprised of the dangers of the latter, not by fatal experience, but by some abler advocate than me.

. . . A number of characters of the greatest eminence in this country, object to this Government, for its consolidating tendency. This is not imaginary. It is a formidable reality. If consolidation proves to be as mischievous to this country, as it has been to other countries, what will the poor inhabitants of this country do? This Government will operate like an ambuscade. It will destroy the State Governments, and swallow the liberties of the people, without giving them previous notice. If Gentlemen are willing to run the hazard, let them run it; but I shall exculpate myself by my opposition, and monitory warnings within these walls. But, then comes paper money. We are at peace on this subject. Though this is a thing which that mighty Federal Convention had no business with, yet I acknowledge that paper money would be the bane of this country. I detest it. Nothing can justify a people in resorting to it, but extreme necessity. It is at rest however in this Commonwealth. It is no longer solicited or advocated. Sir, I ask you, and every other Gentleman who hears me, if he can retain his indignation, at a system, which takes from the State Legislatures the care and preservation of the interests of the people; 180 Representatives, the choice of the people of Virginia cannot be trusted with their interests. They are a mobbish suspected herd.[22] This country has not virtue enough to manage its own internal interests. These must be referred to the chosen few. If we cannot be trusted with the private contracts of the citizens, we must be depraved indeed. If he can prove that by one uniform system of abandoned principles, the Legislature has betrayed the rights of the people, then let us seek another shelter. So degrading an indignity—so flagrant an out-rage to the States—so vile a suspicion is humiliating to my mind, and many others. 5.16.9

Will the adoption of this new plan pay our debts? This, Sir, is a plain question. It is inferred, that our grievances are to be redressed, and the evils of the existing system to be removed by the new Constitution. Let me inform the Honorable Gentleman, that no nation ever paid its debts by a change of Government, without the aid of industry. You never will pay your debts but by a radical change of domestic œconomy. At present you buy too much, and make too little to pay. Will this new system promote manufac- 5.16.10

tures, industry and frugality? If instead of this, your hopes and designs will be disappointed; you relinquish a great deal, and hazard infinitely more, for nothing. Will it enhance the value of your lands? Will it lessen your burthens? Will your looms and wheels go to work by the act of adoption? If it will in its consequence produce these things, it will consequently produce a reform, and enable you to pay your debts. Gentlemen must prove it. I am a sceptic—an infidel on this point. I cannot conceive that it will have these happy consequences. I cannot confide in assertions and allegations. The evils that attend us, lie in extravagance and want of industry, and can only be removed by assiduity and œconomy. Perhaps we shall be told by Gentlemen, that these things will happen, because the administration is to be taken from us, and placed in the hands of the luminous few, who will pay different attention, and be more studiously careful than we can be supposed to be.[23] . . .

5.16.11 . . . This Government is so new it wants a name. I wish its other novelties were as harmless as this. He told us, we had an American Dictator in the year 1781[24]—We never had an American President. In making a Dictator, we follow the example of the most glorious, magnanimous and skilful nations. In great dangers this power has been given.—Rome had furnished us with an illustrious example.—America found a person worthy of that trust: She looked to Virginia for him. We gave a dictatorial power to hands that used it gloriously; and which were rendered more glorious by surrendering it up. Where is there a breed of such Dictators? Shall we find a set of American Presidents of such a breed? Will the American President come and lay prostrate at the feet of Congress his laurels? I fear there are few men who can be trusted on that head. The glorious republic of Holland has erected monuments of her warlike intrepidity and valor: Yet she is now totally ruined by a Stadtholder—a Dutch President. The destructive wars into which that nation has been plunged, has since involved her in ambition. The glorious triumphs of Blenheim and Ramillies were not so conformable to the genius, nor so much to the true interest of the republic, as those numerous and useful canals and dykes, and other objects at which ambition spurns. That republic has, however, by the industry of its inhabitants, and policy of its magistrates, suppressed the ill effects of ambition.—Notwithstanding two of their provinces have paid nothing, yet I hope the example of Holland will tell us, that we can live happily without changing our present despised Government. Cannot people be as happy under a mild, as under an energetic Government? Cannot content and felicity be enjoyed in a republic, as well as in a monarchy, because there are whips, chains and scourges used in the latter? If I am not as rich as my neighbour, if I give my mite—my all—republican forbearance will say, that it is sufficient—So said the honest confederates of Holland.—You are poor—We are rich.—We will go on and do better, far better, than be under an oppressive Government.—For better will it be for us to continue as we are, than go under that tight energetic Government.—I am persuaded of what the Honorable Gentleman says, that separate confederacies will ruin us.[25] In my judgment, they are evils never to be thought of till a people are driven by necessity.—When he asks my opinion of consolidation—of one power to reign over America, with a strong hand; I will tell him, I am persuaded, of the rectitude of my honorable friend's opinion (Mr. Mason) that one Government cannot reign over so extensive a country as this is, without absolute despotism.[26] Compared to such a consolidation, small Confederacies are little evils; though they ought to be recurred to, but in case of necessity.—Virginia and North-Carolina are despised. They could exist separated from the rest of America. Maryland and Vermont were not over-run when out of the Confederacy. Though it is not a desirable object, yet I trust, that on examination it will be found, that Virginia and North-Carolina would not be swallowed up in case it was necessary for them to be joined together.

When we come to the spirit of domestic peace—The humble genius of Virginia has formed a Government, suitable to the genius of her people. I believe the hands that formed the American Constitution triumph in the experiment. It proves, that the man who formed it, and perhaps by accident, did what design could not do in other parts of the world. After all your reforms in Government, unless you consult the genius of the inhabitants, you will never succeed—your system can have no duration. Let me appeal to the candour of the Committee, if the want of money be not the source of all our misfortunes. We cannot be blamed for not making dollars. This want of money cannot be supplied by changes in Government. The only possible remedy, as I have before asserted, is industry aided by œconomy.[27] Compare the genius of the people with the Government of this country. Let me remark, that it stood the severest conflict, during the war, to which ever human virtue has been called. I call upon every Gentleman here to declare, whether the King of England had any subjects so attached to his family and Government—so loyal as we were. But the genius of Virginia called us for liberty.—Called us from those beloved endearments, which from long habits we were taught to love and revere. We entertained from our earliest infancy, the most sincere regard and reverence for the mother country. Our partiality extended to a predilection for her customs, habits, manners and laws. Thus inclined, when the deprivation of our liberty was attempted, what did we do? What did the genius of Virginia tell us? Sell all and purchase liberty. This was a severe conflict. Republican maxims were then esteemed—Those maxims, and the genius of Virginia, landed you safe on the shore of freedom. On this awful occasion, did you want a Federal Government? Did federal ideas possess your minds? Did federal ideas lead you to the most splendid victories? I must again repeat the favorite idea, that the genius of Virginia did, and will again lead us to happiness. To obtain the most splendid prize, you did not consolidate. You accomplished the most glorious ends, by the assistance of the genius of your country. Men were then taught by that genius, that they were fighting for what was most dear to them. View the most affectionate father—the most tender mother—operated on by liberty, nobly stimulating their sons—their dearest sons—sometimes their only son, to advance to the defence of his country. We have seen sons of Cincinnatus, without splendid magnificence or parade, going, with the genius of their great progenitor Cincinnatus, to the plough—Men who served their country without ruining it—Men who had served it to the destruction of their private patrimonies—Their country owing them amazing amounts, for the payment of which no adequate provision was then made. We have seen such men, throw prostrate their arms at your feet. They did not call for those emoluments, which ambition presents to some imaginations. The soldiers, who were able to command every thing, instead of trampling on those laws, which they were instituted to defend, most strictly obeyed them. The hands of justice have not been laid on a single American soldier. Bring them into contrast with European veterans. You will see an astonishing superiority over the latter. There has been a strict subordination to the laws. The Honorable Gentleman's office gave him an opportunity of viewing if the laws were administered so as to prevent riots, routs, and unlawful assemblies. From his then situation, he could have furnished us with the instances in which licentiousness trampled on the laws.—Among all our troubles we have paid almost to the last shilling, for the sake of justice. We have paid as well as any State: I will not say better. To support the General Government, our own Legislature, to pay the interest of the public debts, and defray contingencies, we have been heavily taxed. To add to these things, the distresses produced by paper money, and by tobacco contracts, were sufficient to render any people discontented. These, Sir, were great temptations; but in the most severe conflict of misfortunes, this code of laws—this genius of Virginia, call it what you will, triumphed over every thing.

5.16.13 Why did it please the Gentleman (Mr. Corbin)[28] to bestow such epithets on our country? Have the worms taken posession of the wood, that our strong vessel—our political vessel, has sprung a-leak? He may know better than me, but I consider such epithets to be the most illiberal and unwarrantable aspersions on our laws. The system of laws under which we have lived, has been tried and found to suit our genius. I trust we shall not change this happy system. I cannot so easily take leave of an old friend. Till I see him following after and pursuing other objects, which can pervert the great objects of human legislation, pardon me if I withhold my assent.

5.16.14 Some here speak of the difficulty in forming a new code of laws. Young as we were, it was not wonderful if there was a difficulty in forming and assimilating one system of laws. I shall be obliged to the Gentleman, if he would point out those glaring, those great faults. The efforts of assimilating our laws to our genius has not been found altogether vain.—I shall pass over some other circumstances which I intended to mention, and endeavor to come to the capital objection, which my Honorable friend made. My worthy friend said, that a republican form of Government would not suit a very extensive country; but that if a Government were judiciously organized and limits prescribed to it; an attention to these principles might render it possible for it to exist in an extensive territory.[29] Whoever will be bold to say, that a Continent can be governed by that system, contradicts all the experience of the world. It is a work too great for human wisdom. Let me call for an example. Experience has been called the best teacher. I call for an example of a great extent of country, governed by one Government, or Congress, call it what you will. I tell him, that a Government may be trimmed up according to Gentlemen's fancy, but it never can operate—It will be but very short-lived. However disagreeable it may be to lengthen my objections, I cannot help taking notice of what the Honorable Gentleman said. To me it appears that there is no check in that Government. The President, Senators, and Representatives all immediately, or mediately, are the choice of the people. Tell me not of checks on paper; but tell me of checks founded on self-love. The English Government is founded on self-love. This powerful irresistible stimulous of self-love has saved that Government. It has interposed that hereditary nobility between the King and Commons. If the House of Lords assists or permits the King to overturn the liberties of the people, the same tyranny will destroy them; they will therefore keep the balance in the democratic branch. Suppose they see the Commons incroach upon the King; self-love, that great energetic check, will call upon them to interpose: For, if the King be destroyed, their destruction must speedily follow. Here is a consideration which prevails, in my mind, to pronounce the British Government, superior in this respect to any Government that ever was in any country. Compare this with your Congressional checks. I beseech Gentlemen to consider, whether they can say, when trusting power, that a mere patriotic profession will be equally operative and efficatious, as the check of self-love. In considering the experience of ages, is it not seen, that fair disinterested patriotism, and professed attachment to rectitude have never been solely trusted to by an enlightened free people?—If you depend on your President's and Senators patriotism, you are gone. Have you a resting place like the British Government? Where is the rock of your salvation? The real rock of political salvation is self-love perpetuated from age to age in every human breast, and manifested in every action. If they can stand the temptations of human nature, you are safe. If you have a good President, Senators and Representatives, there is no danger.—But can this be expected from human nature? Without real checks it will not suffice, that some of them are good. A good President, or Senator, or Representative, will have a natural weakness.—Virtue will slumber. The wicked will be continually watching:[30] Consequently you will be undone. Where are your checks? You have no hereditary Nobility—An order of men, to whom human eyes can be cast up for relief: For, says the Constitution, there is no title of nobility to be granted; which, by the bye, would not have been so dangerous, as the perilous cession of powers contained in that paper: Because, as Montesquieu says, when you give titles of Nobility, you know what you give; but when you give power, you know not what you give.[31]—If you say, that out of this depraved mass, you can collect luminous characters, it will not avail, unless this luminous breed will be propagated from generation to generation; and even then, if the number of vicious characters will preponderate, you are undone. And that this will certainly be the case, is, to my mind, perfectly clear.—In the British Government there are real balances and checks—In this system, there are only ideal balances. Till I am convinced that there are actual efficient checks, I will not give my assent to its establishment. The President and Senators have nothing to lose. They have not that interest in the preservation of the Government, that the King and Lords have in England. They will therefore be regardless of the interests of the people. The Constitution will be as safe with one body, as with two. It will answer every purpose of human legislation. How was the Constitution of England when only the Commons had the power? I need only remark, that it was the most unfortunate æra when that country returned to King, Lords and Commons, without sufficient responsibility in the King. When the Commons of England, in the manly language which became freemen, said to their King, you are our servant, then the temple of liberty was complete. From that noble source, have we derived our liberty:—That spirit of patriotic attachment to one's country:—That zeal for liberty, and that enmity to tyranny which signalized the then champions of liberty, we inherit from our British ancestors. And I am free to own, that if you cannot love a Republican Government, you may love the British Monarchy;[32] for, although the King is not sufficiently responsible, the responsibility of his agents, and the efficient checks interposed by the British Constitution, render it less dangerous than other Monarchies, or oppressive tyrannical Aristrocracies. What are their checks of exposing accounts?—Their checks upon paper are inefficient and nugatory.—Can you search your President's closet? Is this a real check? We ought to be exceeding cautious, in giving up this life—this soul—of money—this power of taxation to Congress. What powerful check is there here to prevent the most extravagant and profligate squandering of the public money? What security have we in money matters? Enquiry is precluded by this Constitution. I never wish to see Congress supplicate the States. But it is more abhorent to my mind to give them an unlimited and unbounded command over our souls—our lives—our purses, without any check or restraint. How are you to keep enquiry alive? How discover their conduct? We are told by that paper, that a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money, shall be published from time to time. Here is a beautiful check! What time? Here is the utmost latitude left. If those who are in Congress please to put that construction upon it, the words of the Constitution will be satisfied by publishing those accounts once in 100 years. They may publish or not as they please. Is this like the present despised system, whereby the accounts are to be published monthly?[33]

I come now to speak something of requisitions, which the Honorable Gentleman thought so truly contemptible and disgraceful.[34] That Honorable Gentleman being a child of the revolution, must recollect with gratitude the glorious effects of requisitions. It is an idea that must be grateful to every American. An English army was sent to compel us to pay money contrary to our consent. To force us by arbitrary and tyrannical coercion to satisfy their unbounded demands. We wished to pay with our own consent.—Rather than pay against our consent, we engaged in that bloody contest, which terminated so gloriously. By requisitions we pay with our own consent; by their means we have triumphed in the most arduous struggle, that ever tried the virtue of man. We fought then, for what we are contending now: To prevent an arbitrary deprivation of our property, contrary to our consent and inclination. 5.16.15

{[7 June 1788] I never will give up that darling word requisitions—My country may give it up—A majority may wrest it from me, but I will never give it up till my grave. Requisitions are attended with one singular advantage. They are attended by deliberation.—They secure to the States the benefit of correcting oppressive errors.[35] If our Assembly thought requisitions erroneous—If they thought the demand was too great, they might at least supplicate Congress to reconsider,—that it was a little too much. The power of direct taxation was called by the Honorable Gentlemen the soul of the Government:[36] Another Gentleman, called it the lungs of the Government.[37] We all agree, that it is the most important part of the body politic. If the power of raising money be necessary for the General Government, it is no less so for the States. If money be the vitals of Congress, is it not precious for those individuals from whom it is to be taken? Must I give my soul—my lungs, to Congress? Congress must have our souls. The State must have our souls. This is dishonorable and disgraceful. These two coordinate, interferring unlimited powers of harrassing the community, is unexampled: It is unprecedented in history: They are the visionary projects of modern politicians: Tell me not of imaginary means, but of reality; This political solecism will never tend to the benefit of the community. It will be as oppressive in practice as it is absurd in theory. If you part with this which the Honorable Gentleman tells you is the soul of Congress, you will be inevitably ruined. I tell you, they shall not have the soul of Virginia. They tell us, that one collector may collect the Federal and State taxes. The General Government being paramount to the State Legislatures; if the Sheriff is to collect for both; his right hand for the Congress, his left for the State; his right hand being paramount over the left, his collections will go to Congress. We will have the rest. Defficiencies in collections will always operate against the States. Congress being the paramount supreme power, 5.16.16 must not be disappointed. Thus Congress will have an unlimited, unbounded command over the soul of this Commonwealth. After satisfying their uncontrouled demands, what can be left for the States? Not a sufficiency even to defray the expence of their internal administration. They must therefore glide imperceptibly and gradually out of existence. This, Sir, must naturally terminate in a consolidation. If this will do for other people, it never will do for me.}

5.16.17 . . . I shall be told in this place, that those who are to tax us are our Representatives. To this I answer, that there is no real check to prevent their ruining us. There is no actual responsibility. The only semblance of a check is the negative power of not re-electing them. This, Sir, is but a feeble barrier when their personal interest, their ambition and avarice come to be put in contrast with the happiness of the people. All checks founded on any thing but self-love, will not avail. This constitution reflects in the most degrading and mortifying manner on the virtue, integrity, and wisdom of the State Legislatures: It presupposes that the chosen few who go to Congress will have more upright hearts, and more enlightened minds, than those who are members of the individual Legislatures. To suppose that ten Gentlemen shall have more real substantial merit, than 170 is humiliating to the last degree.[38] If, Sir, the diminution of numbers be an augmentation of merit, perfection must centre in one. If you have the faculty of discerning spirits, it is better to point out at once the man who has the most illumined qualities. If 10 men be better than 170, it follows of necessity, that one is better than 10—The choice is more refined. . . .

5.16.18 Congress by the power of taxation—by that of raising an army, and by their controul over the militia, have the sword in one hand, and the purse in the other. Shall we be safe without either? Congress have an unlimited power over both: They are entirely given up by us. Let him candidly tell me, where and when did freedom exist, when the sword and purse were given up from the people? Unless a miracle in human affairs interposed, no nation ever retained its liberty after the loss of the sword and purse. Can you prove by any argumentative deduction, that it is possible to be safe without retaining one of these? If you give them up you are gone.

5.16.19 {[14 June] The means, says the Gentleman, must be commensurate to the end. How does this apply?[39]—All things in common are left with this Government. There being an infinitude in the Government, there must be an infinitude of means to carry it on. This is a sort of mathematical Government that may appear well on paper, but cannot sustain examination, or be safely reduced to practice. The delegation of power to an adequate number of Representatives; and an unimpeded reversion of it back to the people at short periods, form the principal traits of a Republican Government. The idea of a Republican Government in that paper, is something superior to the poor people. The governing persons are the servants of the people. There the servants are greater than their masters; because it includes infinitude, and infinitude excludes every idea of subordination. In this the creature has destroyed, and soared above the creator. For if its powers be infinite, what rights have the people remaining? By that very argument despotism has made way in all countries, where the people unfortunately have been enslaved by it. We are told the sword and purse are necessary for the national defence. The junction of these without limitation in the same hands, is, by logical and mathematical conclusions, the description of despotism.}

. . . Give us at least a plausible apology why Congress should keep their 5.16.20 proceedings in secret. They have the power of keeping them secret as long as they please; for the provision for a periodical publication is too inexplicit and ambiguous to avail any thing. The expression from time to time as I have more than once observed, admits of any extension. They may carry on the most wicked and pernicious of schemes, under the dark veil of secrecy. The liberties of a people never were nor ever will be secure, when the transactions of their rulers may be concealed from them. The most iniquitous plots may be carried on against their liberty and happiness. I am not an advocate for divulging indiscriminately all the operations of Government, though the practice of our ancestors in some degree justifies it. Such transactions as relate to military operations, or affairs of great consequence, the immediate promulgation of which might defeat the interests of the community, I would not wish to be published, till the end which required their secrecy should have been effected. But to cover with the veil of secrecy, the common rotine of business, is an abomination in the eyes of every intelligent man, and every friend to his country.

[Mr. Henry then, in a very animated manner, expatiated on the evil and 5.16.21 pernicious tendency of keeping secret the common proceedings of Government; and said that it was contrary to the practice of other free nations. The people of England, he asserted, had gained immortal honor by the manly boldness wherewith they divulged to all the world, their political disquisitions and operations; and that such a conduct inspired other nations with respect. He illustrated his argument by several quotations.]—He then continued,—I appeal to this Convention if it would not be better for America to take off the veil of secrecy. Look at us—hear our transactions. If this had been the language of the Federal Convention, what would have been the result? Such a Constitution would not have come out to your utter astonishment, conceding such dangerous powers, and recommending secrecy in the future transactions of Government. I believe it would have given more general satisfaction, if the proceedings of that Convention had not been concealed from the public eye. This Constitution authorizes the same conduct. There is not an English feature in it. The transactions of Congress may be concealed a century from the public, consistently with the Constitution. This, Sir, is a laudable imitation of the transactions of the Spanish treaty. We have not forgotten with what a thick veil of secrecy those transactions were covered.

5.16.22 We are told that this Government collectively taken, is without an example—That it is national in this part, and federal in that part, &c.[40] We may be amused if we please, by a treatise of political anatomy. In the brain it is national: The stamina are federal—some limbs are federal—others national. The Senators are voted for by the State Legislatures, so far it is federal.—Individuals choose the members of the first branch; here it is national. It is federal in conferring general powers; but national in retaining them. It is not to be supported by the States—The pockets of individuals are to be searched for its maintenance. What signifies it to me, that you have the most curious anatomical description of it in its creation? To all the common purposes of Legislation it is a great consolidation of Government. You are not to have a right to legislate in any but trivial cases: You are not to touch private contracts: You are not to have the right of having arms in your own defence: You cannot be trusted with dealing out justice between man and man. What shall the States have to do? Take care of the poor—repair and make high-ways—erect bridges, and so on, and so on. Abolish the State Legislatures at once. What purposes should they be continued for? Our Legislature will indeed be a ludicrous spectacle—180 men marching in solemn farcical procession, exhibiting a mournful proof of the lost liberty of their country—without the power of restoring it. But, Sir, we have the consolation that it is a mixed Government: That is, it may work sorely on your neck; but you will have some comfort by saying, that it was a Federal Government in its origin.

5.16.23 I beg Gentlemen to consider—lay aside your prejudices—Is this a Federal Government? Is it not a Consolidated Government for every purpose almost? Is the Government of Virginia a State Government after this Government is adopted? I grant that it is a Republican Government—but for what purposes? For such trivial domestic considerations, as render it unworthy the name of a Legislature. I shall take leave of this political anatomy, by observing that it is the most extraordinary that ever entered into the imagination of man. If our political diseases demand a cure—this is an unheard of medicine. The Honorable member, I am convinced, wanted a name for it.[41] Were your health in danger, would you take new medicine? I need not make use of these exclamations; for every member in this Committee must be alarmed at making new and unusual experiments in Government. Let us have national credit and a national treasury in case of war. You never can want national resources in time of war; if the war be a national one; if it be necessary, and this necessity obvious to the meanest capacity. The utmost exertions will be used by the people of America in that case. A republic has this advantage over a monarchy, that its wars are generally founded on more just grounds. A republic can never enter into a war, unless it be a national war—unless it be approved of, or desired by the whole community. Did ever a republic fail to use the utmost resources of the community when a war was necessary? I call for an example. I call also for an example, when a republic has been engaged in a war contrary to the wishes of its people. There are thousands of examples, where the ambition of its Prince precipitated a nation into the most destructive war. No nation ever withheld power when its object was just and right. I will hazard an observation; I find fault with the paper before you, because the same power that declares war, has the power to carry it on. Is it so in England? The King declares war: The House of Commons gives the means of carrying it on. This is a strong check on the King. He will enter into no war that is unnecessary; for the Commons having the power of withholding the means, will exercise that power, unless the object of the war be for the interest of the nation. How is it here? The Congress can both declare war, and carry it on; and levy your money, as long as you have a shilling to pay. . . .

. . . We are told that all powers not given are reserved.[42] I am sorry to bring forth hackneyed observations. But, Sir, important truths lose nothing of their validity or weight, by frequency of repetition. The English history is frequently recurred to by Gentlemen. Let us advert to the conduct of the people of that country. The people of England lived without a declaration of rights, till the war in the time of Charles Ist. That King made usurpations upon the rights of the people. Those rights were in a great measure before that time undefined. Power and privilege then depended on implication and logical discussion. Though the declaration of rights was obtained from that King, his usurpations cost him his life. The limits between the liberty of the people, and the prerogative of the King, were still not clearly defined. The rights of the people continued to be violated till the Steward family was banished in the year 1688. The people of England magnanimously defended their rights, banished the tyrant, and prescribed to William Prince of Orange, by the Bill of Rights, on what terms he should reign. And this Bill of Rights put an end to all construction and implication. Before this, Sir, the situation of the public liberty of England was dreadful. For upwards of a century the nation was involved in every kind of calamity, till the Bill of Rights put an end to all, by defining the rights of the people, and limiting the King's prerogative. Give me leave to add (if I can add any thing to so splendid an example) the conduct of the American people. They Sir, thought a Bill of Rights necessary. It is alledged that several States, in the formation of their governments, omitted a Bill of Rights. To this I answer, that they had the substance of a Bill of Rights contained in their Constitutions, which is the same thing. I believe that Connecticut has preserved by her Constitution her royal charter, which clearly defines and secures the great rights of mankind—Secure to us the great important rights of humanity, and I care not in what form it is done. Of what advantage is it to the American Congress to take away this great and general security? I ask of what advantage is it to the public or to Congress to drag an unhappy debtor, not for the sake of justice; but to gratify the malice of the plaintiff, with his witnesses to the Federal Court, from a great distance? What was the principle that actuated the Convention in proposing to put such dangerous powers in the hands of any one? Why is the trial by jury taken away? All the learned arguments that have been used on this occasion do not prove that it is secured. Even the advocates for the plan do not all concur in the certainty of its security. Wherefore is religious liberty not secured? One Honorable Gentleman who favors adoption, said that he had had his fears on the subject.[43] If I can well recollect, he informed us that he was perfectly satisfied by the powers of reasoning (with which he is so happily endowed) that those fears were not well grounded. There is many a religious man who knows nothing of argumentative reasoning;—there are many of our most worthy citizens, who cannot go through all the labyrinths of syllogistic argumentative deductions, when they think that the rights of conscience are invaded. This sacred right ought not to depend on constructive logical reasoning. When we see men of such talents and learning, compelled to use their utmost abilities to convince themselves that there is no danger, is it not sufficient to make us tremble? Is it not sufficient to fill the minds of the ignorant part of men with fear? If Gentlemen believe that the apprehensions of men will be quieted, they are mistaken; since our best informed men are in doubt with respect to the security of our rights. Those who are not so well informed will spurn at the Government. When our common citizens, who are not possessed with such extensive knowledge and abilities, are called upon to change their Bill of Rights, (which in plain unequivocal terms, secures their most valuable rights and privileges) for construction and implication, will they implicitly acquiesce? Our Declaration of Rights tells us, "That all men are by nature free and independent, &c." (Here Mr. Henry read the Declaration of Rights.)[44] Will they exchange these Rights for logical reasons? If you had a thousand acres of land, dependent on this, would you be satisfied with logical construction? Would you depend upon a title of so disputable a nature? The present opinions of individuals will be buried in entire oblivion when those rights will be thought of. That sacred and lovely thing Religion, ought not to rest on the ingenuity of logical deduction. Holy Religion, Sir, will be prostituted to the lowest purposes of human policy. What has been more productive of mischief among mankind than Religious disputes. Then here, Sir, is the foundation for such disputes, when it requires learning and logical deduction to perceive that religious liberty is secure. The Honorable member told us that he had doubts with respect to the judiciary department. I hope those doubts will be explained.—He told us that his object was Union. I admit that the reality of Union and not the name, is the object which most merits the attention of every friend to his country. He told you that you should hear many great sounding words on our side of the question. We have heard the word Union from him. I have heard no word so often pronounced in this House as he did this. I admit that the American Union is dear to every man—I admit that every man who has three grains of information, must know and think that Union is the best of all things. But as I said before, we must not mistake the end for the means. If he can shew that the rights of the Union are secure, we will consent. It has been sufficiently demonstrated that they are not secured. It sounds mighty prettily to Gentlemen to curse paper money and honestly pay debts. But apply to the situation of America, and you will find there are thousands and thousands of contracts, whereof equity forbids an exact literal performance. Pass that government, and you will be bound hand and foot. There was an immense quantity of depreciated continental paper money in circulation at the conclusion of the war. This money is in the hands of individuals to this day. The holders of this money may call for the nominal value, if this government be adopted. This State may be compelled to pay her proportion of that currency pound for pound. Pass this government and you will be carried to the Federal Court (if I understand that paper right) and you will be compelled to pay shilling for shilling. I doubt on the subject, at least as a public man, I ought to have doubts. A State may be sued in the Federal Court by the paper on your table. It appears to me then, that the holder of the paper money may require shilling for shilling. If there be any latent remedy to prevent this, I hope it will be discovered.

The precedent, with respect to the Union between England and Scotland, 5.16.25 does not hold. The Union of Scotland speaks in plain and direct terms. Their privileges were particularly secured. It was expressly provided, that they should retain their own particular laws. Their nobles have a right to choose Representatives to the number of sixteen.—I might thus go on and specify particulars, but it will suffice to observe generally, that their rights and privileges were expressly and unequivocally reserved.—The power of direct taxation was not given up by the Scotch people. There is no trait in that Union which will maintain their arguments. In order to do this, they ought to have proved that Scotland united without securing their rights, and afterwards got that security by subsequent amendments. Did the people of Scotland do this? No, Sir, like a sensible people, they trusted nothing to hazard. If they have but 45 members, and those be often corrupted, these defects will be greater here. The number will be smaller, and they will be consequently the more easily corrupted. Another Honorable Gentleman advises us to give this power, in order to exclude the necessity of going to war.[45] He wishes to establish national credit I presume—and imagines that if a nation has public faith and shews a disposition to comply with her engagements, she is safe among ten thousand dangers. If the Honorable Gentleman can prove that this paper is calculated to give us public faith, I will be satisfied. But if you be in constant preparation for war, on such airy and imaginary grounds, as the mere possibility of danger, your government must be military, which will be inconsistent with the enjoyment of liberty. But, Sir, we must become formidable, and have a strong government to protect us from the British nation. Will the paper on the table prevent the attacks of the British navy, or enable us to raise a fleet equal to the British fleet? The British have the strongest fleet in Europe, and can strike any where. It is the utmost folly to conceive, that that paper can have such an operation. It will be no less so to attempt to raise a powerful fleet. With respect to requisitions, I beseech Gentlemen to consider the importance of the subject. We who are for amendments propose, (as has been frequently mentioned) that a requisition shall be made for £200,000 for instance, instead of direct taxation, and that if it be not complied with, then it shall be raised by direct taxes. We do not wish to have strength to refuse to pay them, but to possess the power of raising the taxes in the most easy mode for the people. But says he, you may delay us by this mode.—Let us see if there be not sufficient to counterbalance this evil. The oppression arising from taxation, is not from the amount but, from the mode—a thorough acquaintance with the condition of the people, is necessary to a just distribution of taxes. The whole wisdom of the science of Government, with respect to taxation, consists in selecting that mode of collection which will best accommodate the convenience of the people. When you come to tax a great country, you will find that ten men are too few to settle the manner of collection. One capital advantage which will result from the proposed alternative is this, that there will be necessary communications between your ten members in Congress, and your 170 Representatives here. If it goes through the hands of the latter, they will know how much the citizens can pay, and by looking at the paper on your table, they will know how much they ought to pay. No man is possessed of sufficient information to know how much we can or ought to pay.

5.16.26 We might also remonstrate, if by mistake or design, they should call for a greater sum than our proportion. After a remonstrance, and a free investigation between our Representatives here, and those in Congress, the error would be removed.

5.16.27 Another valuable thing which it will produce is, that the people will pay the taxes chearfully. It is supposed, that this would occasion a waste of time, and be an injury to public credit. This would only happen if requisitions should not be complied with. In this case the delay would be compensated by the payment of interest, which with the addition of the credit of the State to that of the General Government, would in a great measure obviate this objection. But if it had all the force which it is supposed to have, it would not be adequate to the evil of direct taxation. But there is every probability that requisitions would be then complied with. Would it not then be our interest, as well as duty, to comply? After non-compliance, there would be a general acquiescence in the exercise of this power. We are fond of giving power, at least power which is constitutional. Here is an option to pay according to your own mode, or otherwise. If you give probability fair play, you must conclude, that they would be complied with. Would the Assembly of Virginia by refusal, destroy the country and plunge the people into miseries and distress? If you give your reasoning faculty fair play, you cannot but know, that payment must be made when the consequence of a refusal would be an accumulation of inconveniences to the people. Then they say, that if requisitions be not complied with, in case of a war, that the destruction of the country may be the consequence; that therefore, we ought to give the power of taxation to the Government to enable it to protect us. Would not this be another reason for complying with requisitions, to prevent the country from being destroyed? You tell us, that unless requisitions be complied with, your commerce is gone. The prevention of this also, will be an additional reason to comply.

He tells us, that responsibility is secured by direct taxation. Responsibility instead of being increased, will be lost for ever by it. In our State Government, our Representatives may be severally instructed by their constituents. There are no persons to counteract their operations. They can have no excuse for deviating from our instructions. In the General Government other men have power over the business. When oppressions may take place, our Representatives may tell us, We contended for your interest, but we could not carry our point, because the Representatives from Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Connecticut, &c. were against us. Thus, Sir, you may see, that there is no real responsibility. He further said, that there was such a contrariety of interests, as to hinder a consolidation. I will only make one remark—There is a variety of interests—Some of the States owe a great deal on account of paper money—Others very little—Some of the Northern States have collected and barrelled up paper money. Virginia has sent thither her cash long ago. There is little or none of the Continental paper money retained in this State. Is it not their business to appreciate this money? Yes,—and it will be your business to prevent it. But there will be a majority against you, and you will be obliged to pay your share of this money in its nominal value. It has been said by several Gentlemen, that the freeness of elections would be promoted by throwing the country into large districts.[46] I contend, Sir, that it will have a contrary effect. It will destroy that connection that ought to subsist between the electors and the elected. If your elections be by districts instead of counties, the people will not be acquainted with the candidates. They must therefore be directed in the elections by those who know them. So that instead of a confidential connection between the electors and the elected, they will be absolutely unacquainted with each other. A common man must ask a man of influence how he is to proceed, and for whom he must vote. The elected, therefore, will be careless of the interest of the electors. It will be a common job to extort the suffrages of the common people for the most influential characters. The same men may be repeatedly elected by these means. This, Sir, instead of promoting the freedom of elections, leads us to an Aristocracy. Consider the mode of elections in England. Behold the progress of an election in an English shire. A man of enormous fortune will spend 30,000 l. or 40,000 l. to get himself elected. This is frequently the case. Will the Honorable Gentleman say, that a poor man, as enlightened as any man in the island, has an equal chance with a rich man, to be elected? He will stand no chance though he may have the finest understanding of any man in the shire. It will be so here. Where is the chance that a poor man can come forward with the rich? The Honorable Gentleman will find instead of supporting Democratical principles, it goes absolutely to destroy them. The State Governments, says he, will possess greater advantages than the General Government, and will consequently prevail. His opinion and mine are diametrically opposite. Bring forth the Federal allurements, and compare them with the poor contemptible things that the State Legislatures can bring forth. On the part of the State Legislatures, there are Justices of Peace and militia officers—And even these Justices and officers, are bound by oath in favour of the Constitution. A constable is the only man who is not obliged to swear paramount allegiance to this beloved Congress. On the other hand, there are rich, fat Federal emoluments—your rich, snug, fine, fat Federal offices—The number of collectors of taxes and excises will outnumber any thing from the States. Who can cope with the excisemen and taxmen? There are none in this country, that can cope with this class of men alone. But, Sir, is this the only danger? Would to Heaven that it were. If we are to ask which will last the longest—the State or the General Government, you must take an army and a navy into the account. Lay these things together, and add to the enumeration the superior abilities of those who manage the General Government.[47] Can then the State Governments look it in the face? You dare not look it in the face now, when it is but an embryo. The influence of this Government will be such, that you never can get amendments; for if you propose alterations, you will affront them. Let the Honorable Gentleman consider all these things and say, whether the State Governments will last as long as the Federal Government. With respect to excises, I can never endure them. They have been productive of the most intolerable oppressions every where. Make a probable calculation of the expence attending the Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary. You will find that there must be an immense increase of taxes. We are the same mass of people we were before.—In the same circumstances—The same pockets are to pay—The expences are to be increased—What will enable us to bear this augmentation of taxes? The mere form of the Government will not do it. A plain understanding cannot conceive how the taxes can be diminished, when our expences are augmented, and the means of paying them not increased.

With respect to our tax-laws, we have purchased a little knowledge by sad experience upon the subject. Reiterated experiments have taught us what can alleviate the distresses and suit the convenience of the people. But we are now to throw away that system, by which we have acquired this knowledge, and send ten men to legislate for us. 5.16.28

The Honorable Gentleman was pleased to say, that the representation of the people was the vital principle of this Government. I will readily agree that it ought to be so.—But I contend that this principle is only nominally, and not substantially to be found there. We contended with the British about representation; they offered us such a representation as Congress now does. They called it a virtual representation. If you look at that paper you will find it so there. Is there but a virtual representation in the upper House? The States are represented as States, by two Senators each. This is virtual, not actual. They encounter you with Rhode-Island and Delaware. This is not an actual representation. What does the term representation signify? It means that a certain district—a certain association of men should be represented in the Government for certain ends. These ends ought not to be impeded or obstructed in any manner. Here, Sir, this populous State has not an adequate share of legislative influence. The two petty States of Rhode-Island and Delaware, which together are infinitely inferior to this State, in extent and population, have double her weight, and can counteract her interest. I say, that the representation in the Senate, as applicable to States, is not actual. Representation is not therefore the vital principle of this Government—So far it is wrong. 5.16.29

Rulers are the servants and agents of the people—The people are their masters—Does the new Constitution acknowledge this principle? Trial by jury is the best appendage of freedom—Does it secure this? Does it secure the other great rights of mankind? Our own Constitution preserves these principles. The Honorable Gentleman contributed to form that Constitution: The applauses so justly due to it, should, in my opinion, go to the condemnation of that paper. 5.16.30

With respect to the failures and errors of our Government, they might have happened in any Government.—I do not justify what merits censure, but I shall not degrade my country. As to deviations from justice, I hope they will be attributed to the errors of the head, and not to those of the heart.

The Honorable Gentleman did our Judiciary honour in saying, that they had firmness to counteract the Legislature in some cases. Yes, Sir, our Judges opposed the acts of the Legislature.[48] We have this land mark to guide us.—They had fortitude to declare that they were the Judiciary and would oppose unconstitutional acts. Are you sure that your Federal Judiciary will act thus? Is that Judiciary so well constructed and so independent of the other branches, as our State Judiciary? Where are your land-marks in this Government? I will be bold to say you cannot find any in it. I take it as the highest encomium on this country, that the acts of the 5.16.31

Legislature, if unconstitutional, are liable to be opposed by the Judiciary.

5.16.32 Then the Honorable Gentleman said, that the two Judiciaries and Legislatures, would go in a parallel line and never interfere—That as long as each was confined to its proper objects, that there would be no danger of interference—That like two parallel lines as long as they continued in their parallel direction they never would meet. With submission to the Honorable Gentleman's opinion, I assert, that there is danger of interference, because no line is drawn between the powers of the two Governments in many instances; and, where there is a line, there is no check to prevent the one from encroaching upon the powers of the other. I therefore contend that they must interfere, and that this interference must subvert the State Government, as being less powerful. Unless your Government have checks, it must inevitably terminate in the destruction of your privileges. I will be bold to say, that the British Government has real checks. I was attacked by Gentlemen, as if I had said that I loved the British Government better than our own.[49] I never said so. I said that if I were obliged to relinquish a Republican Government, I would chuse the British Monarchy. I never gave the preference to the British or any other Government, when compared to that which the Honorable Gentleman assisted to form. I was constrained to say what I said. When two disagreeable objects present themselves to the mind, we choose that which has the least deformity.

5.16.33 Mr. Chairman.—The necessity of a Bill of Rights appear to me to be greater in this Government, than ever it was in any Government before.

5.16.34 {[7 June 1788] There are certain maxims by which every wise and enlightened people will regulate their conduct. There are certain political maxims, which no free people ought ever to abandon. Maxims of which the observance is essential to the security of happiness. It is impiously irritating the avenging hand of Heaven, when a people who are in the full enjoyment of freedom, launch out into the wide ocean of human affairs, and desert those maxims which alone can preserve liberty. Such maxims, humble as they are, are those only which can render a nation safe or formidable. Poor little humble republican maxims have attracted the admiration and engaged the attention of the virtuous and wise in all nations, and have stood the shock of ages. We do not now admit the validity of maxims, which we once delighted in. We have since adopted maxims of a different but more refined nature: New maxims which tend to the prostration of republicanism.

5.16.35 We have one, Sir, That all men are by nature free and independent, and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into society, they cannot by any compact deprive or divest their posterity.[51] We have a set of maxims of the same spirit, which must be beloved by every friend to liberty, to virtue, to mankind. Our Bill of Rights contains those admirable maxims.}

. . . I observed already, that the sense of the European nations, and particularly Great-Britain, is against the construction of rights being retained, which are not expressly relinquished.[52] I repeat, that all nations have adopted this construction—That all rights not expressly and unequivocally reserved to the people, are impliedly and incidentally relinquished to rulers; as necessarily inseparable from the delegated powers. It is so in Great-Britain: For every possible right which is not reserved to the people by some express provision or compact, is within the King's prerogative. It is so in that country which is said to be in such full possession of freedom. It is so in Spain, Germany, and other parts of the world. Let us consider the sentiments which have been entertained by the people of America on this subject. At the revolution, it must be admitted, that it was their sense to put down those great rights which ought in all countries to be held inviolable and sacred. Virginia did so we all remember. She made a compact to reserve, expressly, certain rights. When fortified with full, adequate, and abundant representation, was she satisfied with that representation? No.—She most cautiously and guardedly reserved and secured those invaluable, inestimable rights and privileges, which no people, inspired with the least glow of the patriotic love of liberty, ever did, or ever can, abandon. She is called upon now to abandon them, and dissolve that compact which secured them to her. She is called upon to accede to another compact which most infallibly supercedes and annihilates her present one. Will she do it?—This is the question. If you intend to reserve your unalienable rights, you must have the most express stipulation. For if implication be allowed, you are ousted of those rights. If the people do not think it necessary to reserve them, they will be supposed to be given up. How were the Congressional rights defined when the people of America united by a confederacy to defend their liberties and rights against the tyrannical attempts of Great-Britain? The States were not then contented with implied reservation. No, Mr. Chairman. It was expressly declared in our Confederation that every right was retained by the States respectively, which was not given up to the Government of the United States.[53] But there is no such thing here. You therefore by a natural and unavoidable implication, give up your rights to the General Government. Your own example furnishes an argument against it. If you give up these powers, without a Bill of Rights, you will exhibit the most absurd thing to mankind that ever the world saw—A Government that has abandoned all its powers—The powers of direct taxation, the sword, and the purse. You have disposed of them to Congress, without a Bill of Rights—without check, limitation, or controul. And still you have checks and guards—still you keep barriers—pointed where? Pointed against your weakened, prostrated, enervated State Government! You have a Bill of Rights to defend you against the State Government, which is bereaved of all power; and yet you have none against Congress, though in full and exclusive possession of all power! You arm yourselves against the weak and defenceless, and expose yourselves naked to the armed and powerful. Is not this a conduct of unexampled absurdity? What barriers have you to oppose to this most strong energetic Government? To that Government you have nothing to oppose. All your defence is given up. This is a real actual defect.—It must strike the mind of every Gentleman. When our Government was first instituted in Virginia, we declared the common law of England to be in force.—That system of law which has been admired, and has protected us and our ancestors, is excluded by that system.—Added to this, we adopted a Bill of Rights. By this Constitution, some of the best barriers of human rights are thrown away. Is there not an additional reason to have a Bill of Rights? By the ancient common law, the trial of all facts is decided by a jury of impartial men from the immediate vicinage. This paper speaks of different juries from the common law, in criminal cases; and in civil controversies excludes trial by jury altogether. There is therefore more occasion for the supplementary check of a Bill of Rights now, than then. Congress from their general powers may fully go into the business of human legislation. They may legislate in criminal cases from treason to the lowest offence, petty larceny. They may define crimes and prescribe punishments. In the definition of crimes, I trust they will be directed by what wise Representatives ought to be governed by. But when we come to punishments, no latitude ought to be left, nor dependence put on the virtue of Representatives. What says our Bill of Rights? "That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted."[54] Are you not therefore now calling on those Gentlemen who are to compose Congress, to prescribe trials and define punishments without this controul? Will they find sentiments there similar to this Bill of Rights? You let them loose— you do more—you depart from the genius of your country. That paper tells you, that the trial of crimes shall be by jury, and held in the State where the crime shall have been committed.—Under this extensive provision, they may proceed in a manner extremely dangerous to liberty.—Persons accused may be carried from one extremity of the State to another, and be tried not by an impartial jury of the vicinage, acquainted with his character, and the circumstances of the fact; but by a jury unacquainted with both, and who may be biassed against him.—Is not this sufficient to alarm men?—How different is this from the immemoral practice of your British ancestors, and your own? I need not tell you, that by the common law a number of hundredors were required to be on a jury, and that afterwards it was sufficient if the jurors came from the same county. With less than this the people of England have never been satisfied. That paper ought to have declared the common law in force.

In this business of legislation, your Members of Congress will lose the restriction of not imposing excessive fines, demanding excessive bail, and inflicting cruel and unusual punishments.—These are prohibited by your Declaration of Rights. What has distinguished our ancestors?—That they would not admit of tortures, or cruel and barbarous punishments. But Congress may introduce the practice of the civil law, in preference to that of the common law.—They may introduce the practice of France, Spain, and Germany—Of torturing to extort a confession of the crime. They will say that they might as well draw examples from those countries as from Great-Britain; and they will tell you, that there is such a necessity of strengthening the arm of Government that they must have a criminal equity, and extort confession by torture, in order to punish with still more relentless severity. We are then lost and undone.—And can any man think it troublesome, when we can by a small interference prevent our rights from being lost?—If you will, like the Virginian Government, give them knowledge of the extent of the rights retained by the people, and the powers themselves, they will, if they be honest men, thank you for it.—Will they not wish to go on sure grounds?—But if you leave them otherwise, they will not know how to proceed; and being in a state of uncertainty, they will assume rather than give up powers by implication. A Bill of Rights may be summed up in a few words. What do they tell us?—That our rights are reserved.—Why not say so? Is it because it will consume too much paper? Gentlemen's reasonings against a Bill of Rights, do not satisfy me. Without saying which has the right side, it remains doubtful. A Bill of Rights is a favourite thing with the Virginians, and the people of the other States likewise. It may be their prejudice, but the Government ought to suit their geniuses, otherwise its operation will be unhappy. A Bill of Rights, even if its necessity be doubtful, will exclude the possibility of dispute, and with great submission, I think the best way is to have no dispute. In the present Constitution, they are restrained from issuing general warrants to search suspected places, or seize persons not named, without evidence of the commission of the fact, &c. There was certainly some celestial influence governing those who deliberated on that Constitution:—For they have with the most cautious and enlightened circumspection, guarded those indefeasible rights, which ought ever to be held sacred. The officers of Congress may come upon you, fortified with all the terrors of paramount federal authority.—Excisemen may come in multitudes:—For the limitation of their numbers no man knows.—They may, unless the General Government be restrained by a Bill of Rights, or some similar restriction, go into your cellars and rooms, and search, ransack and measure, every thing you eat, drink and wear. They ought to be restrained within proper bounds. With respect to the freedom of the press, I need say nothing; for it is hoped that the Gentlemen who shall compose Congress, will take care as little as possible, to infringe the rights of human nature.—This will result from their integrity. They should from prudence, abstain from violating the rights of their constituents. They are not however expressly restrained.—But whether they will intermeddle with that palladium of our liberties or not, I leave you to determine.

17 June 1788

[The 7th clause read.]

5.16.38 Mr. Chairman.—We have now come to the ninth section, and I consider myself at liberty to take a short view of the whole. I wish to do it very briefly. Give me leave to remark, that there is a Bill of Rights in that Government. There are express restrictions which are in the shape of a Bill of Rights: But they bear the name of the ninth section. The design of the negative expressions in this section is to prescribe limits, beyond which the powers of Congress shall not go. These are the sole bounds intended by the American Government. Where abouts do we stand with respect to a Bill of Rights? Examine it, and compare it to the idea manifested by the Virginian Bill of Rights, or that of the other States. The restraints in this Congressional Bill of Rights, are so feeble and few, that it would have been infinitely better to have said nothing about it. The fair implication is, that they can do every thing they are not forbidden to do. What will be the result if Congress, in the course of their legislation, should do a thing not restrained by this ninth section? It will fall as an incidental power to Congress, not being prohibited expressly in the Constitution. The first prohibition is, that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, but when in cases of rebellion, or invasion, the public safety may require it. It results clearly, that if it had not said so, they could suspend it in all cases whatsoever. It reverses the position of the friends of this Constitution, that every thing is retained which is not given up. For instead of this, every thing is given up, which is not expressly reserved.[55]—It does not speak affirmatively, and say that it shall be suspended in those cases. But that it shall not be suspended but in certain cases; going on a supposition that every thing which is not negatived, shall remain with Congress. If the power remains with the people, how can Congress supply the want of an affirmative grant? They cannot do it but by implication, which destroys their doctrine. The Virginia Bill of Rights interdicts the relinquishment of the sword and purse without controul. That Bill of Rights secures the great and principal rights of mankind. But this Bill of Rights extends to but very few cases, and is destructive of the doctrine advanced by the friends of that paper.

5.16.39 If ex post facto laws had not been interdicted, they might also have been extended by implication at pleasure. Let us consider whether this restriction be founded in wisdom or good policy. If no ex post facto laws be made, what is to become the old continental paper dollars? Will not this country be forced to pay it in gold and silver, shilling for shilling? Gentlemen may think that this does not deserve an answer: But it is an all important question. Because the property of this country is not commensurate to the enormous demand. Our own Government triumphs with infinite superiority when put in contrast with that paper.—The want of a Bill of Rights will render all their laws, however oppressive, constitutional.

If the Government of Virginia passes a law in contradiction to our Bill of Rights, it is nugatory. By that paper the national wealth is to be disposed of under the veil of secrecy: For the publication from time to time, will amount to nothing; and they may conceal what they may think requires secrecy. How different is it in your own Government?—Have not the people seen the journals of our Legislature every day during every session? Is not the lobby full of people every day? Yet, Gentlemen say, that the publication from time to time is a security unknown in our State Government! Such a regulation would be nugatory and vain, or at least needless, as the people see the journals of our Legislature, and hear their debates every day. If this be not more secure than what is in that paper, I will give up that I have totally misconceived the principles of the Government. You are told, that your rights are secured in this new Government. They are guarded in no other part but this ninth section. The few restrictions in that section are your only safeguards. They may controul your actions, and your very words, without being repugnant to that paper. The existence of your dearest privileges will depend on the consent of Congress: For these are not within the restrictions of the ninth section. 5.16.40

If Gentlemen think that securing the slave trade is a capital object; that the privilege of the habeas corpus is sufficiently secured; that the exclusion of ex post facto laws will produce no inconvenience; that the publication from time to time will secure their property; in one word, that this section alone will sufficiently secure their liberties, I have spoken in vain.—Every word of mine, and of my worthy coadjutor [George Mason], is lost. I trust that Gentlemen, on this occasion, will see the great objects of religion, liberty of the press, trial by jury, interdiction of cruel punishments, and every other sacred right secured, before they agree to that paper. These most important human rights are not protected by that section, which is the only safeguard in the Constitution.—My mind will not be quieted till I see something substantial come forth in the shape of a Bill of Rights. 5.16.41

5. James Madison replied that "on a candid examination of history, we shall find that turbulence, violence, and abuse of power, by the majority trampling on the rights of the minority, have produced factions and commotions, which, in republics, have, more frequently than any other cause, produced despotism." The United States is not immune from this danger, which must be guarded against. "Perhaps, in the progress of this discussion, it will appear that the only possible remedy for those evils, and means of preserving and protecting the principles of republicanism will be found in that very system which is now exclaimed against as the parent of oppression." 10. Elliot regards this sentence as an interpolation of the compiler of the debates; but there is no such indication in the original edition. It is more likely that Henry is referring to a part of Pendleton's discussion that was only partly reported. Elliot III, 53, 38–39.

11. Edmund Randolph replied: "But it is insinuated by the honorable gentleman, that we want to be a grand, splendid, and magnificent people: we wish not to become so: the magnificence of a royal court is not our object. We want a government, sir—a government that will have stability, and give us security; for our present government is destitute of the one and incapable of producing the other. It cannot, perhaps, with propriety, be denominated a government, being void of that energy requisite to enforce sanctions. I wish my country not to be contemptible in the eyes of foreign nations. A well-regulated community is always respected. It is the internal situation, the defects of government, that attract foreign contempt; that contempt, sir, is too often followed by subjugation." Elliot III, 81. Not all of the Federalists were so modest, and Henry was right in thinking that some friends of the Constitution had visions of glory. See McMaster and Stone 127–29 (A Pennsylvania Farmer); Northampton, Massachusetts Hampshire Gazette 17 October 1787 (Anon. "Observe . . ."); Virginia Independent Chronicle 28 November 1787 ("Extract of a letter from a well informed correspondent . . ."); New Hampshire Freeman's Oracle 6 June 1788 (A Patriotic Citizen); Herbert J. 13. Randolph charged that the Virginia legislature had frequently violated the constitution, giving as an example the following: "A man, who was then a citizen, was deprived of his life thus: from a mere reliance on general reports, a gentleman in the House of Delegates informed the house, that a certain man (Josiah Philips) had committed several crimes, and was running at large, perpetrating other crimes. He therefore moved for leave to attaint him; he obtained that leave instantly; no sooner did he obtain it, than he drew from his pocket a bill ready written for that effect; it was read three times in one day, and carried to the Senate. I will not say that it passed the same day through the Senate; but he was attainted very speedily and precipitately, without any proof better than vague reports. Without being confronted with his accusers and witnesses, without the privilege of calling for evidence in his behalf, he was sentenced to death, and was afterwards actually executed." Elliot III, 66–67. Henry's reply here left him open to severe criticism, which was administered by John Marshall. Elliot III, 223. It appears, however, that Henry's conduct was open to a better defense than he provided himself. See Wirt, Sketches of Patrick Henry 234–41; and the full discussion by William W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution II, 944 ff. Philips was executed not under the attainder but on trial for highway robbery—the indictment having been brought by the attorney general, Edmund Randolph.

Speech of George Mason in the Virginia State Ratifying Convention

While Patrick Henry carried the main burden of the Anti-Federalist argument in Richmond, George Mason, the only Virginia Anti-Federalist who had attended the Constitutional Convention, provided weighty assistance. Mason's first speech, printed here, was given on the first day of the debate proper, 4 June, following George Nicholas and Edmund Randolph for the Federalists and Patrick Henry for the Anti-Federalists. It is an excellent short statement, bearing many resemblances to the more extensive arguments of Richard Henry Lee. Mason is concerned with the consolidating tendency of the Constitution, and argues that popular governments can only exist in a small territory. Under the Constitution, taxes are to be laid by persons who have neither the necessary information nor a common interest or fellow feeling with the people. Mason proposes that the general government be given the alternative of laying direct taxes only if requisitions on the states are not complied with, a proposal much discussed in the subsequent debate. Admitting that the inadequacy of representation is unavoidable in the general government, Mason insists that such a government must be given powers with a very cautious hand. He is fearful, moreover, that the number of representatives in the House of Representatives will not be increased as the population grows. It is interesting to compare this speech with the Objections,[1] although it should be kept in mind that the speech is directed to the first section of the Constitution and that Mason discussed other sections later in the debate.

The speech is taken from Debates and Other Proceedings of the Convention of Virginia, Convened at Richmond, on Monday the 2d day of June, 1788, for the purpose of deliberating on the Constitution recommended by the Grand Federal Convention (Petersburg 1788–89), 3 vols.

1. See above, 2.2.

Mr. Chairman—Whether the Constitution be good or bad, the present clause clearly discovers, that it is a National Government, and no longer a 5.17.1

confederation. I mean that clause which gives the first hint of the General Government laying direct taxes. The assumption of this power of laying direct taxes, does of itself, entirely change the confederation of the States into one consolidated Government.[1] This power being at discretion, unconfined, and without any kind of controul, must carry every thing before it. The very idea of converting what was formerly a confederation, to a consolidated Government, is totally subversive of every principle which has hitherto governed us. This power is calculated to annihilate totally the State Governments. Will the people of this great community submit to be individually taxed by two different and distinct powers? Will they suffer themselves to be doubly harrassed? These two concurrent powers cannot exist long together; the one will destroy the other: The General Government being paramount to, and in every respect more powerful than, the State governments, the latter must give way to the former.[2] Is it to be supposed that one National Government will suit so extensive a country, embracing so many climates, and containing inhabitants so very different in manners, habits, and customs? It is ascertained by history, that there never was a Government, over a very extensive country, without destroying the liberties of the people:[3] History also, supported by the opinions of the best writers, shew us, that monarchy may suit a large territory, and despotic Governments over so extensive a country; but that popular Governments can only exist in small territories. Is there a single example, on the face of the earth, to support a contrary opinion? Where is there one exception to this general rule? Was there ever an instance of a general National Government extending over so extensive a country, abounding in such a variety of climates, &c. where the people retained their liberty? I solemnly declare, that no man is a greater friend to a firm Union of the American States than I am:[4] But, Sir, if this great end can be obtained without hazarding the rights of the people, why should we recur to such dangerous principles? Requisitions have been often refused, sometimes from an impossibility of complying with them; often from that great variety of circumstances which retard the collection of monies, and, perhaps, sometimes from a wilful design of procrastinating. But why shall we give up to the National Government this power, so dangerous in its nature, and for which its members will not have sufficient information?—Is it not well known, that what would be a proper tax in one State would be grievous in another? The Gentleman who hath favored us with an eulogium in favor of this system,[5] must, after all the encomiums he has been pleased to bestow upon it, acknowledge, that our Federal Representatives must be unacquainted with the situation of their constituents: Sixty-five members cannot possibly know the situation and circumstances of all the inhabitants of this immense continent: When a certain sum comes to be taxed, and the mode of levying to be fixed, they will lay the tax on that article which will be most productive, and easiest in the collection, without consulting the real circumstances or convenience of a country, with which, in fact, they cannot be sufficiently acquainted. The mode of levying taxes is of the utmost consequence, and yet here it is to be determined by those who have neither knowledge of our situation, nor a common interest with us, nor a fellow feeling for us:—The subjects of taxation differ in three-fourths; nay, I might say with truth, in four-fifths of the States:— If we trust the National Government with an effectual way of raising the necessary sums, 'tis sufficient; every thing we do further is trusting the happiness and rights of the people: Why then should we give up this dangerous power of individual taxation? Why leave the manner of laying taxes to those, who in the nature of things, cannot be acquainted with the situation of those on whom they are to impose them, when it can be done by those who are well acquainted with it? If instead of giving this oppressive power, we give them such an effectual alternative as will answer the purpose, without encountering the evil and danger that might arise from it, then I would chearfully acquiesce: And would it not be far more eligible? I candidly acknowledge the inefficacy of the confederation; but requisitions have been made, which were impossible to be complied with: Requisitions for more gold and silver than were in the United States: If we give the General Government the power of demanding their quotas of the States, with an alternative of laying direct taxes, in case of non compliance, then the mischief would be avoided; and the certainty of this conditional power would, in all human probability, prevent the application, and the sums necessary for the Union would be then laid by the States; by those who know how it can best be raised; by those who have a fellow-feeling for us. Give me leave to say, that the same sum raised one way with convenience and ease, would be very oppressive another way: Why then not leave this power to be exercised by those who know the mode most convenient for the inhabitants, and not by those who must necessarily apportion it in such manner as shall be oppressive? With respect to the representation so much applauded, I cannot think it such a full and free one as it is represented; but I must candidly acknowledge, that this defect results from the very nature of the Government. It would be impossible to have a full and adequate representation in the General Government; it would be too expensive and too unweildy: We are then under the necessity of having this a very inadequate representation: Is this general representation to be compared with the real, actual, substantial representation of the State Legislatures? It cannot bear a comparison. To make representation real and actual, the number of Representatives ought to be adequate; they ought to mix with the people, think as they think, feel as they feel, ought to be perfectly amenable to them, and thoroughly acquainted with their interest and condition: Now these great ingredients are, either not at all, or in so small a degree, to be found in our Federal Representatives, that we have no real, actual, substantial representation; but I acknowledge it results from the nature of the Government: The necessity of this inconvenience may appear a sufficient reason not to argue against it: But, Sir, it clearly shews, that we
